Cafarr dangers playing with the Flute (they being fet down quietly to take their pleafure of the view thereof , having in the mean time given their Slaves their Horses to hold) the Enemies stealing studdenly upon them, compassed them in round about, and slew a number of them in the Field, and chasing the other also that fled, followed them pell mell into their Camp. Furthermore, had not Cesar himself in perfon, and Africa Polic with him, gone out of the Camp to the refere, and staid them that sled, the War that day had been ended. There was also another skirmish where his Enemies had the upper hand, in the which it is reported, that Cafar taking the Enlign-Bearer by the collar that carried the Eagle in his hand, flaid him by force, and turning his face, told him: fee, there be thy Enemies. These advantages did lift up Scipio's heart alost, and gave him courage to hazard Battell: and leaving Afranism on the one hand of him, and King Juba on the other hand, both their Camps lying near together, he did fortifie himself by the City of THAPSACUS, above the lake, to be a fafe refuge for them all in this Battell. But whileft he was busie intrenching of himself, Casar having marvellous speedily passed through a great Countrey full of Wood, by by-paths which men would never have miftrufted : he stole upon some behind , and suddainly assailed the other before, so that he overthrew them all , and made them flie. Then following the first good hap he had , he went forthwith to fet upon the Camp of Afranius, the which he took at the first onset, and the Camp of the NUMIDIANS also, King Juba being fied. Thus in a little piece of the day onely, he took three Camps, and flew fifty thousand of his Enemies, and lost but fifty of his Souldiers. In this fort is Cafars great fet down the effect of this Battell by some Writers. Yet others do write also, that Cefar feli was Victory and not there in person at the execution of this Battell. For as he did set his men in Battell-ray the falling-Sickness took him, whereunto he was given; and therefore feeling it coming, before he was over-Cafar troubled come withall, he was carried into a Castle not far from thence where the Battell was fought, and there took his reft till the extremity of his difease had left him. Now for the Prztor and Confuls ling Sickness. that feaped from this Battell, many of them being taken Prifoners, did kill themselves, and others also Cafor did put to death: but he being specially defirous of all men else to have Cato alive in his hands, he went with all possible speed unto the City of UTICA, whereof Cate was Governour, by many whereof he was not at the Battell. Notwithstanding being certified by the way, that Cate had slain himself with his own hands, he then made open show that he was very forry for it, but why or Cafar was forty wherefore, no man could tell. But this is true, that Cafar faid at that prefent time : O Cato, I envy thy death, because thou didst envy my glory to save thy life. This notwithstanding, the Book that he wrote afterwards against Caro being dead, did shew no very great affection nor pitifull heart towards him. For how could he have pardoned him, if living he had had him in his hands, that being dead did speak so vehemently against him? Notwithstanding, men suppose he would have pardoned him, if he had taken him alive, by the elemency he shewed unto Cicero, Brutsu, and divers others that had born Arms against him. Some report, that he wrote that Book, not fo much for any Cierro wrote a private malice he had to his death, as for civill ambition, upon this occasion. Cieero had written a Book in praife Book in praife of Cato, which he intituled Cato. This Book in likelihood was very well liked of, of Gato being by reason of the Eloquence of the Orator that made it, and of the excellent subject thereof. Cefar therewith was marvelloully offended, thinking that to praise him, of whose death be was Author, was even so much as to accuse himself: and therefore he wrote a Letter against him, and heaped up a number of Acculations against Cato, and intituled the Book Anticaton. Both these Books have favourers unto this day, some defending the one for the love they bear to Cafar, and others allowing the other for Cato's lake. Cafar being now returned out of AFRICK, first of all made an Oration to the People wherein he greatly praifed and commended this his last Victory, declaring unto them, that he had conquered to many Countries unto the Empire of ROME, that he could furnish the Common-wealth yearly with two hundred thousand bushels of Wheat, and twenty hundred Fabs, the Son thousand Pound weight of Oyl. Then he made three Triumphs, the one for Ægypt, the other for of King Jubs, the Kingdom of Pont, and the third for AFRICK: not because he had overcome Scipio there, but a famous His. King Juba. Whole Son being likewife called Juba, being then a young Boy, was led captive in the shew of this Triumph. But this his imprisonment fell out happily for him : for where he was but a barbar-OUS NUMIDIAN, by the fludy he fell unto when he was prisoner, he came afterwards to be reckoned one of the wifeft Historiographers of the GRECIANS. After thefe three Triumphs ended, he very liberally rewarded his Souldiers: and to curry favour with the People, he made great Feafts and com-Cofars feating mon Sports. For he feated all the ROMANS at one time, at two and twenty thousand Tables, and gave of the Rossams them the pleasure to see divers Sword-players to fight at the Sharp, and Battels also by Sea, for the remembrance of his Daughter Julia, which was dead long before. Then after all these Sports, he made the People (as the manner was) to be mustered: and where there were at the last musters before, three hundred and twenty thousand Citizens, at this muster there were onely but a hundred and fifty thouland. Such mifery and destruction had this civill War wrought unto the Common-wealth of ROME, and had confumed fuch a number of ROMANS, not speaking at all of the mischiefs and calamities it had brought unto all the reft of ITALY, and to the other Provinces pertaining to ROME. After all these things were ended, he was chosen Confull the fourth time, and went into Spain to make War with the Sons of Pompry: who were yet but very young, but had not Cafar Conful withflanding raifed a marvellous great Army together, and shewed they had manhood and courage the fourth worthy to command fuch an Army, infomuch as they put Cefar himself in great danger of his lite. worthy to command their air Arthry, another them in all this War, was by the City of Munda. After this Battell he went into his Tent and told his friends; that he had often before fought for of Pamper, Victory, but this last time now, that he had fought for the safety of his own life. He wan this Battell on the very Feaft day of the BACCHANALIANS, in the which men fay, that Pompin the Great Went out of ROME, about four years before, to begin this civil War. For his Sons, the younger scaped from the Battell; but within few days after, Diddim brought the Head of the elder. This was the last War that Cafar made. But the Triumph he made into Rome for the same, did as Cafars Trimuch offend the ROMANS, and more, then any thing that ever he had done before : because he umph of Pomhad not overcome Captains that were strangers, nor barbarous King, but had destroyed the Sons 1991 Sons. of the noblest man of ROME, whom fortune had overthrown. And because he had plucked up his Race by the roots, men did not think it meet for him to Triumph fo for the Calamities of his Countrey, rejoycing at a thing for the which he had but one excuse to alledge in his defence, unto the gods and men, that he was compelled to do that he did. And the rather they thought it not meet , because he had never before fent Letters nor Messengers unto the Common-wealth at ROME, for any Victory that he had ever won in all the civil Wars: but did always for shame reinse the Glory . it. This notwithstanding the ROMANS inclining to Cofars prosperity, and taking the bit in the mouth, supposing that to be ruled by one man alone, it would be a good mean for them to take breath a little, after fo many troubles and miferies as they had abidden in these civill Wars, they chose him perpetual Dictator. This was a plain Tyranny for to have this Calar Dictator absolute power of Dictator, they added this, never to be afraid to be deposed: Cicero pronounced perpetuall, before the Senate, that they should give him such honours as were meet for a man: howbeit others afterwards added too, honours beyond all reason. For men striving who should most honour him, they made him hatefull and troublefom to themselves that most favoured him, by reason of the unmeasurable greatness and honours which they gave him. Thereupon it is reported, that even they that most hated him, were no less favourers and furtherers of his honours, then they that most flattered him, because they might have greater occasions to rise, and that it might appear they had just tause and colour to attempt that they did against him. And now for himself, after he had ended his civill Wars, he did to honourably behave himself, that there was no fault to be found in him : and therefore me thinks amongst other honours they gave him , he rightly deserved this, that they should build him a Temple of clemency, to thank him for his courtefie he had used unto them The Temple they mound mun a rempire of clemency, to them that had born Arms againft him, and furthermore, of clemency in his Victory. For he pardoned many of them that had born Arms againft him, and furthermore, of clemency in his Victory. did prefer iome of them to Honour and Office in the Common-wealth: as amongst others, Cassian for his and Braim, both the which were made Prators. And where Pompeys Intages had been thrown courtefie. down, he caused them to be set up again : whereupon Cicero said then , that Casar setting up Cassius and Pompeys Images again, he made his own to stand the surer. And when some of his friends did Brutus Pracounsell him to have a Guard for the safety of his person, and some also did offer themselves to serve tors. him, he would never confent to it, but faid: It was better to die once, then always to be afraid of death. But to win himself the love and good will of the People, as the honourablest Guard and best safety he could have, he made common Feasts again, and generall distributions of Corn. Fur- Good will of thermore, to gratifie the Souldiers also he replenished many Cities again with Inhabitants, which Subjects the before had been destroyed, and placed them there that had no place to repair unto: of the which beffguard and the noblest and chiefest (ities were these two, CARTHAGE and CORINTH: and it chanced also, sakey for that like as aforetime they had been both taken and destroyed together, even so were they both set on foot again, and replenished with People, at one self time. And as for great Personages, he wan themalfo, promifing some of them, to make them Prætors and Confuls in time to come: and unto others, Honours and Preferments: but to all men generally good Hope, feeking all the ways he could to make every man contented with his Reign. Infomuch as one of his Confuls called Maximu, chancing to die a day before his Confulfhip ended, he declared Caninius Rebilius Confull onely for the day that remained. So, divers going to his House (as the manner was) to falute for one day. him, and to congratulate with him of his calling and preferment, being newly chosen Officer, Cicero pleasantly faid : Come, let us make haste, and be gone thither before his Consulthip come out. Furthermore, Casar being born to attempt all great enterprises, and having an ambitious defire besides to cover great Honours, the prosperous good success he had of his former Conquests, bred no desire in him quietly to enjoy the fruits of his labours, but rather gave him the hope of things to come, fill kindling more and more in him; thoughts of greater Enterprises, and defire of new Glory, as if that which he had present were stale and nothing worth. This humor of his was no other but an emulation with himself as with another man, and a certain contention to over-

Then he was minded

Assents, Tiber to bring the Rivers of Anienes and Tiber, ftraight from Rome, unto the City of Circles with a deep Channell and high Banks cast up on either fide, and so to fall into the Sea at TERRACINA, for the better fafety and commodity of the Merchants that came to ROME to traffick there. Furthermore, he determined to drain and feaw all the Water of the Marifhes betwirt the Cities of NOMENTUM and SETIUM, to make firm land, for the benefit of many thousands of People : and on the Sea Coast next unto ROME, to cast great high Banks, and to cleanse all the Haven about OSTIA, of Rocks and Stones hidden under the Water, and to take away all other impediments that made the harbour dangerous for Ships , and to make new Havens and Arfenals meet to har-, bour fuch Ships as did continually traffick thither. All these things were purposed to be done, but took no effect. But the ordinance of the Kalendar, and reformation of the year, to take away all confusion of time, being exactly calculated by the Mathematicians, and brought to equality of the perfection, was a great commodity unto all men. For the ROMANS using then the ancient computation of the year, had not onely fuch incertainty and alteration of the Moneth and times, that the Sacrifices and yearly Feafts came, by little and little, to feafons contrary for the purpose they were ordained: but also in the revolution of the Sun (which is called Annu Solaru) no other Nation agreed with them in account : and of the ROMANS themselves, onely the Priests understood it. And therefore when they listed, they suddainly (no man being able to controll them) did thruft in a Moneth above their ordinary number which they salled in old time, *Mercedonius. Some say, that Numa Pompilius was the first that devised this way, to put a Moneth mensis interest between : but it was a weak remedy, and did little help the correction of the errours that were made in the account of the year, to frame them to perfection. But Cefar committing this matter unto the Philosophers, and best expert Mathematicians at that time; did fee forth an excellent and perfect Kalendar, more exactly calculated, then any other that was before : the which the Ro-MANS do use untill this present day, and do nothing err as others, in the difference of time. But his Enemies notwithstanding that envied his greatness, did not stick to find fault withall. As Cicero the Orator, when one faid, to morrow the Star Lyra will rife : Yea, faid he, at the commandment of Cefar, as if men were compelled to to fay and think , by Cefars Edict. But the chiefest cause that made him mortally hated, was the covetous desire he had to be called King: which first gave the People just cause, and next his secret Enemies, honest colour to bear him ill will. This notwithftanding, they that procured him this Honour and Dignity, gave it out among the People, that it was written in the Sybilline Prophefies , how the ROMANS might overcome the PARTHIANS, if they made War with them, and were led by a King, but otherwise that they were unconquerable. And furthermore they were so bold besides, that Cefar returning to ROME from the City of Alba, when they came to fature him, they called him King. But the People being offended, and Cafar also angry, he said, he was not called King, but Cafar. Then every man keeping filence, he went his way heavy and forrowfull. When they had decreed divers honours for him in the Senate, the Confuls and Prætors accompanied with the whole Assembly of the Senate, went unto him in the Market-place, where he was fet by the Pulpit for Orations, to tell him what honours they had decreed for him in his ablence. But he fitting fill in his Majefty, disdaining to rise up unto them when they camein, as if they had been private men, answered them: that his honours had more need to be cut off then enlarged. This did not onely offend the Senate, but the common People also, to fee that he should folightly esteem of the Magistrates of the Commonwealth: infomuch as every man that might lawfully go his way, departed thence very forrowfully. Thereupon also Cefarrifing, departed home to his house, and tearing open his Doublet Coller, making his neck bare, he cried out aloud to his Friends, that his Throat was ready to offer to any man that would come and cut it. Notwithstanding, it is reported, that afterwards to excele his folly, he imputed it to his difease, saying, that their wits are not perfect which have this difease of the falling-Evill, when standing on their feet they speak to the common People, but are soon troubled with a trembling of their Body, and a suddain dimness and giddiness. But that was not true , for he would have rifen up to the Senate, but Cornelius Balbus one of his friends (or rather a flatterer) would not let him, faying : what, do you not remember that you are (efar, and will you not let them reverence you, and do their duties? Besides these occasions and offences, there followed also his shame and reproach, abusing the Tribunes of the People in this fort. At that time the Feaft Lupercalia was celebrated, the which in old time, men fay was the Feaft of Shepheards or Herdmen, and is much like unto the Feaft of the LYCEIANS in ARCADIA. But how foewer it is, that day there are divers noble mens Sons, young men, (and fome of them Magistrates themselves that govern them) which run naked through the City, striking in sport them they meet in their way, with Leather thongs, hair and all on, to make them give place. And many noble Women and Gentlewomen alfo, go of purpole to fland in their way, and do put forth their hands to be flricken, as Scholars hold them out to their School-mafter, to be stricken with the ferula : perswading themfelves that being with Child, they shall have good delivery; and so being barren, that it will make them to conceive with Child, Cafar fate to behold that sport upon the Pulpit for Orations, in a Chain of Gold, apparelled in triumphant manner. Antonius who was Confull at that time, was Antonius being one of them that ran this holy course. So when he came into the Market-place, the People Consul, was made a lane for him to run at liberty, and he came to Cafar, and prefented him a Diademe one of the Luwreathed about with Lawrell. Whereupon there rose a certain cry and rejoycing, not very great, Amonius predone onely by a few appointed for the purpole. But when Cafar refuled the Diademe, then all fented the Dithe people together made an outery of joy. Then Antonian offering it him again, there was a fe- ademe to Cacond shout of joy, but yet of a few. But when Cafar refused it again the second time, then all far.

the whole People shouted. Cafar having made this proof, found that the People did not like of it. and thereupon role out of his Chair, and commanded the Crown to be carried unto Jupiter in the heads like Kings. Those, the two Tribunes, Flavim and Marallus, went and pulled down, and furthermore, meeting with them that first faluted Cafar as King, they committed them to Prison. The People followed them rejoycing at it, and called them Brutes, because of Brutus, who had in old time driven the Kings out of ROME, and that brought the Kingdom of one person, unto the Government of the Senate and People. Cafar was so offended withall, that he deprived Marullus and Flavius of their Tribuneships, and accusing them, he spake also against the People, and called them Bruti and Cumani, to wit, beafts and fools. Hereupon the Peope went straight unto Marcus Brutus, who from his Father came of the first Brutus, and by his Mother of the house of the Servilians a noble house as any was in ROME, and was also Nephew and Son in Law of Marcus Cato. Notwithstanding, the great honours and favour Cafar shewed unto him, kept him back that Cafar saved of himself alone he did not conspire nor consent to depose him of his Kingdom. For Casar did Marcus Brutus not onely fave his life, after the Battell of PHARSALIA when Pompey fled, and did at his request Battell of Pharsalia also save many more of his friends besides: but furthermore, he put a marvellous confidence in him. satia. Cassium finding Brutus ambition stirred up the more by these seditious Bills, did prick him Cassius stirred forward, and edge him on the more, for a private quarrell he had conceived against Cafar: the cir- up Brutus :cumstance whereof, we have set down at large in Brutus life. Cafar also had Cassius in great gainst Casar, faid to be feen before Cafars death. For , touching the Fires in the Element , and Spirits run- Predictions and ning up and down in the night, and also the solitary Birds to be seen at noon days sitting in the foreshews of great Market-place, are not all these Signs perhaps worth the noting, in such a wonderfull chance Casars death, warning long time afore, to take heed of the day of the Ides of March, (which is the fifteenth of Casar day of the Moneth) for on that day he should be in great danger. That day being come, Ca/ar going unto his death Prothe Senate-House, and speaking merrily unto the Soothsayer, told him the Ides of March be come : gnosticated by

So they be, foftly answered the Soothsayer, but yet are they not past. And the very day before, Cafar supping with Marcu Lepidu, fealed certain Letters as he was wont to do at the Board : fo talk falling out amongst them, reasoning what death was best, he preventing their opinions, cried out aloud, Death unlooked for. Then going to bed the fame night, as his manner was, and lying with his Wife Calpurnia, all the Windows and Doors of his Chamber flying open, the noise awoke him, and made him afraid when he faw such light : but more, when he heard his Wife Culpurnia, being fast asleep, weep and figh, and put forth many sumbling lamentable speeches: for she The Dresm dreamed that Cafar was flain, and that the had him in her Arms. Others also do deny that the of Caparnia, had any fuch dream, as amongst other, Titu Liviu writeth, that it was in this fort : The Senate Coffair Wife. having fer upon the top of Cefars House for an Ornament and setting forth of the same, a certain Pinnacle, Calpurnia dreamed that the faw it broken down, and that the thought the lamented and wept for it. Infomuch that Cafar rifing in the morning, the prayed him if it were possible, not to go out of the doors that day, but to adjourn the Seltion of the Senate untill another day.

And if that he made no reckoning of her Dream, yet that he would fearch further of the Soothfayers by their Sacrifices, to know what should happen him that day. Thereby it seemed that Casar likewise did sear or suspect somewhat, because his Wise Calpurnia until that time was never given to any fear and superstition : and that then he saw her so troubled in mind with this Dream she had. But much more afterwards, when the Soothfayers having facrificed many Beafts one after Decisis Britis another, told him that none did like them : then he determined to fend Antonius to adjourn the Session of the Senate. But in the mean time came Decisis Bruiss, sirnamed Albinis, in whom Cefer put such considence, that in his last Will and Testament he had appointed him to be his next Meir , and yet was of the conspiracy with Coffin and Brutus ; he fearing that if Cofar did adjourn the Session that day, the conspiracy would be betrayed, laughed at the Soothsayers, and reproved Cafar, faying, that he gave the Senate occasion to millike with him, and that they might think he mocked them, confidering that by his commandment they were affembled, and that they were ready willingly to grant him all things, and to proclaim him King of all his Provinces of the Empire of ROME out of ITALY, and that he should wear his Diadem in all other places both by Sea and Land. And furthermore, that if any man should tell them from him, they should depart for that present time, and return again when Calpurnia should have better Dreams, what would his Enemies and ill-willers fay, and how could they like of his Friends words? And who could perswade them otherwife, but that they would think his Dominion a flavery unto them, and tyrannicall in himself? And yet if it be so, said he, that you utterly missike of this day, it is better that you go your felf in person, and saluting the Senate, to distuits them till another time. Therewithall he took Cafar by the hand, and brought him out of his House. Cafar was not gone far from his House, but brought Cafer a bondman, a stranger, did what he could to speak with him; and when he saw he was put back into the Senate. by the great preis and multitude of People that followed him, he went straight into his House, and put himself into Calpurnia's hands, to be kept till Casar came back again, telling her that he had greater matters to impart unto him. And one Artemider wallo born in the Isle of GN105 a Doctor of Rhetorick in the Greek Tongue, who by means of his Profession was very familiar with certain of Brutus Confederates; and therefore knew the most part of all their practifes against Cafur, came and brought him a little Bill written with his own hand, of all that he meant to tell him. He marking how Casar received all the Supplications that were offered him, and that he gave them ftraight to his men that were about him pressed nearer to him, and said: Cesar, read this Memoriall to your felf, and that quickly, for they be matters of great weight, and touch you nearly. Cafar took it of him, but could never read it, though he many times attempted it, for the number of People that did salure him: but holding it still in his hand, keeping it to himself, went on withall into the Senate-House. Howbeit other are of opinion, that it was some man else that gave him that Memoriall, and not Artemidorus, who did what he could all theway as he went to give it Cafar, but he was always repulfed by the People. For these things, they may seem to come by chance; but the place where the murther was prepared, and where the tenate were affembled, and where also there stood up an Image of Pompey dedicated by himself amongst other Ornaments which he gave unto the Theater, all these were manifest proofs, that it was the ordinance of fome god, that made this treaton to be executed, specially in that very place. It is also reported, that Cassim (though otherwise he did favour the doctrine of Epicurus) beholding the Image of Pompey, before they entred into the Action of their traiterous enterprise, he did foftly call upon it, to aid him : but the instant danger of the present time, taking away his former reason, did suddainly pur him into a surious passion, and made him like a man half besides himself. Now Autonisse that was a faithfull friend to Cafar, and a valiant man besides of his hands, him Dieisse Brutus Albinus entertained out of the Senate-House, having begun a long Tale of set purpose, So Cafar coming into the House, all the Senate stood up on their feet to do him honour. Then part of Bruim company and Confederate frood round about Cafars Chair, and part of them also came towards him, as though they made suit with Metellus Cinber, to call homehis Prother again from banishment : and thus profecuting still their fuite, they followed Cafar till he was fer in his Chair. Who denying their Petitions, and being offended with them one after another, because the more they were denied, the more they pressed upon him, and were the earnester with him, Metellin at length, taking his Gown with both his hands, pulled it over his neck, which was the fign given the Confederates to fet upon him. Then Casea behind him, strake him in the neck with his Sword; howbeit the wound was not great nor mortall, because it seemed, the sear of such a divellish attempt did amaze him, and take his strength from him, that he killed him not at the first blow. But Cesar turning straight unto him, caught hold of his word, and held it hard, and they both cried out, Cefar in Latin: O vile Traitor Cafca, what doeft thou? And Casca in Greek to his Brother, Brother, help me. At the beginning of his stir, they that were prefent, not knowing of the conspiracy, were so amazed with the horrible fight they faw, they had no power to flie, neither to help him, nor fo much as once to make an outcry. They on the other fide that had conspired his death, compassed him in on every side with their Swords drawn in their hands, that Cafar turned him no where, but he was stricken at by some, and still had naked Swords in his face, and was hackled and mangled among them, as a wild beaft taken of Hunters.

magiced among them, that every man should give him a wound, because all their parts should be in this murther; and then Bruspe himself gave him one wound about his Privities. Men report also, that Cefar did ftill defend himself against the rest, running every way with his Body : but when he faw Brutss with his Sword drawn in his hand, then he pulled his Gown over his head, and made no more relistance, and was driven either casually or purposedly, by the counsell of the confoirators, against the bale, whereupon Pompeys Image stood which ran all of a goar bloud till he was flain. Thus it feemed that the Image took just revenge of Pompeys Enemy, being thrown down on the ground at his feet, and yeelding up the ghost there, for the number of wounds he had Casarliain and upon him. For it is reported, that he had three and twenty wounds upon his body: and divers of had three and the confpirators did hurt themselves, striking one body with so many blows. When Cafar was twenty wounds flain, the Senate (though Brusse stood in the middest amongst them, as though he would have upon him. faid fomething touching this Fast) prefently ran out of the house, and flying, filled all the (ity with marvellous fear and tumult. Infomuch as some did thut to the doors, others for look their Shops and Ware-houses, and others ran to the place to see what the matter was: and others also that had seen it , ran home to their Houses again. But Antonius and Lepidus, which were two of Cafars chiefest friends, secretly conveying themselves away, fled into other mens Houses, and forfook their own. Bratus and his Confederates on the other fide, being yet hot with this mur- The Murtherther they had committed, having their Swords drawn in their hands, came all in a Troop toge- ers of Cefar do ther they had committed, naving their sweets grawn in their hands, came an in a Troop roge-ther out of the Senate, and went into the Market-place, not as men that made countenance to file, ket place, but otherwise, boldly holding up their heads like men of courage, and called to the People to defend their liberry, and stayed to ipeak with every great Personage, whom they met in their way. Of them, fome followed this Troop, and went amongst them, as if they had been of the conspiracy, and fallly challenged part of the honour with them : amongst them was Caius Oft avius and Lentulus Spinther. But both of them were afterwards put to death for their vain covetousness of honour, by Antonius, and Official Cafar the younger; and yet had no part of that honour for the which they were both put to death, neither did any man believe that they were any of the Confederates or of counfell with them. For they that did put them to death, took revenge rather of the will they had to offend, then of any Fact they had committed. The next morning, Brutss and his Confederates came into the Market-place to speak unto the People, who gave them such Audience, that it feemed they neither greatly reproved nor allowed the Fact . for by their great filence they shewed that they were forry for Cafars death , and also that they did reverence Brutus. Now the Senate granted generall pardon for all that was past, and to pacific every man, ordained besides, that Casars Fund. Cefars Funerals should be honoured as a god, and established all things that he had done, and gave rais. certain Provinces alfo, and convenient honours unto Brut m and his Confederates, whereby every man thought all things were brought to good peace and quietness again. But when they had opened Casarz Testament, and found a liberall Legacy of Money bequeathed unto every Citizen of ROME, and that they faw his body (which was brought into the Market-place) all bemangled with gashes of Swords, then there was no Order to keep the multitude and common People quiet, but they plucked up Forms, Tables and Stools, and laid them all about the body, and fetting them afire, burnt the Corps. Then when the fire was well kindled, they took the Fire-brands, and went unto their Houses that had flain Cefar, to fet them afire. Other also ran up and down the City to fee if they could meet with any of them, to cut them in pieces: howbeit they could meet with never a man of them, because they had locked themselves up fastely in their Houses. There was one of Casars friends called Cinna that had a marvellous strange and terrible Dream the night before. He dreamed that Cafar bad him to Supper, and that he refused and would not go : then that Cafar took him by of Cafar, the hand, and led him against his will. Now Cinna hearing at that time, that they burnt Cafars body in the Market-place, notwithstanding that he feared his Dream, and had an Ague on him besides, he went into the Market-place to honour his Funerals. When he came thither, one of the mean fort asked him what his Name was? He was straight called by his Name. The first man told it to another, and that other unto another, fo that it ran straight through them all, that he was one of them that murthered Cafar: (for indeed one of the Traitors to Cafar , was also called The Murther Cinna as himself) wherefore taking him for Cinna the Murtherer, they fell upon him with the of Cinna. fury, that they prefently disparched him in the Market-place. This fitr and sury made Brown. and Callius more afraid then of all that was past, and therefore within few days after they departed out of ROME: and touching their doings afterwards , and what calamity they suffered till their deaths, we have written it at large in the life of Brutus. Cefar died at fix and fifty years of age, cefar fix and and Pompey also lived not passing sour years more then he. But above all, the ghoft that appeared into Bruttu thewed plainly, that the gods were offended with the murther of Cefar. The Vision was thus: Agreet comet. Bratas being ready to pals over his Army from the City of ARYDOS to the other Coast lying directly against it, slept every night (as fris manner was) in his Tent; and being yet awake, thinking of his Affairs, (for by report he was a carefull a Captain, and lived with as little fleep as ever man did) he thought he heard a noile at his Tent door, and looking towards the light of the Lamp that waxed very dim, he faw a horrible Vision of a man, of a wonderfull greatness, and dreadfull look, which at the first made him may ellouly a fraid. But when he saw that it did him to hurt, but stood by his bed-side, and said nothing; at length he asked him what he was. The Image answered him: I am thy ill Angell, Brutsu, and thou shalt see me by the City of Philippe answered him: I am thy ill Angell, Brutsu, and thou shalt see me by the City of Philippe answered him: Therewithall, the Spirit presented again, and faid; Well, I shall see thee then. The end of the Life of Julius Cafar.

ering into Confideration of Alexander and Cafar, it is an easie matter to speak, and much easier to prove, that they are two of the bravest Chieftains of War, that are to be noted in his Histories: that their Vertues out of War are excellent, and gave great resemblance together: that both of them were Nobly born, Learned, Eloquent, Liberall, Moderate, very loving to their Friends and Servants, and wonderfull much made of , and obeyed of Captains and Souldiers of their Armies, and mercifull even to their Enemies : that even from their youth they made good proof of the future greatness of their courages : that their exploits are altogether admirable: that they be two Miracles for Military Discipline, whether a man doth look into the shortness of the time of their Wars, and the Countries which they have passed through , as it were with the turning of a hand : or that they behold the Enemies they have overcome, the Towns and Provinces they have conquered; their Wildom, Valour, and Happinels, having never received repulse, but always carrying Victory in their hands , and making Valour their advantage with an affured good direction. Both of them were in marvellous danger of their Persons, the one in the City of the MALLIANS, the other in SPAIN , against the Son of Pompeims. Both of them were by Soothsayers expresly told of their death, whom they loved and respected. Both of them in the mean space (as it were blind-fold') did throw themselves into danger, from the which men would have withdrawn them. But he than meerly confiders the Life of either of them , shall find himself in a Field , whereof the eye cannot fee the end, nor the divers ways object unto it, but remaineth dazled, not knowing whether to point it, he feeth fo many things at once before him. If he come to prefer the Life of the one before the other, he entreth into an Ocean of discourse, and cannot tell which of the two he should chuse, nor to what port to go to discharge himself of this man here, before the other there; vet to encourage some body to fail in this Sea, let us row to the Shoar; and (to speak plainly without figure) let us see wherein the one doth pass the other, to leave the Reader his free judgement of that we will fay. At this prefent I will in few words shew what may be observed most memorable. in the Adolescency of the one and of the other, of their Exploits of War, of their Vices and Vertues, of their Death, and what followed after. I plead first for Alexander, not mentioning his Race, his Beauty, nor the fweetness of his Body, which they speak of so much; all that being nothing worth in respect of Vertue: his continency unto Women, and for that he did moderately use the exercises of his Body, doth so much the more condemn Cafars excess and frailty of his youth, doing and suffering filthy things, not to be ripped up any further. The ambition of Alexander came of a noble mind, as witneffeth that he spake of the running at the Games Olympicall, his difcourse with the Ambassadours of Persia, and the complaint he made to his Companions, that his Father would leave him nothing to conquer. Whereas Calar after he had remained fometime in NI-COMEDIA and in GREECE, he cast himself into the arms of the common People at ROME. being bountifull, and making Orations to gain their hearts, fuing for petty Offices finely to attain to the greater. To conclude, he took a quite contrary course unto Alexander, who traced the great Royall broad way to Vertue, to become one day the Honour of the World: and also to his School-mafter the learnedst man of all men, and shewed himself indeed a most worthy Disciple of Aristotle. But Cefar pricked forward by his natural wit, and tyrannical manners of his time. was possessed (in an unlucky hour for him and his Countrey) with the incollerable Vice of selfwill and ambition, which was cause of his death. The love that Alexander bore from his Infancy unto Learning and Learned-men, makes him far excell other Princes. The Honour that he did unto Homer the Poet, returned again to himself: how praise-worthy are his courtestes and liberality unto Diogenes, Xenocrates, and others? To the contrary, Cofar never feemed to care for any man, but for himself; or if he have regarded some, or given Gold and Silver by handfuls, it was but to gain men, and by degrees to ferve his turn to raife him to that greatness he aimed at, rather then for any other confideration. Now as may be faid of the one and the other, he was,

XANDER& (ÆSAR.

In Counsell wife: and valorous in Fight. And to speak truly, it is their true and right Title of Honour, and the advantage they have of all those that have gone before them: let us see if we can a little in particular qualifie Alexander.

A stardy Waterour, never fearing harms, And dreadfull to his Enemies in Arms:

As faith Afahilus: for what was all his War in As 1 A after the death of Philippus, but Tempefts, extream Heats, wonderfull deep Rivers, marvellous high Mountains, monstrous Beasts for greatnels to behold, wild lavage fashions of life, change and alteration of Governours upon every occasion, yea Treasons and Rebellions of some? At the beginning of his Voyage, GREECE did yet lay their heads together, for remembrance of the Wars that Philippus made upon them, the Towns gathered together, MACEDONIA inclined to some change and alteration, divers People far and near lay in wait to fee what their neighbours would do, the Gold and Silver of Persia Howing in the Orators Purses and Governours of the People in every Town did raise up Peloponnese: Philippus Treasure and Coffers were empty, and the debts were great. In despite of all these troubles, and in the middest of his poverty, a young man, but newly come to mans estate, durst in his mind think of the Conquest of Asia, yea of the Empire of the whole World, with thirty thousand Footmen, and five thouland Horse, or (as some other think) with five and forty thousand Footmen, and five thousand and five hundred Horie; having to entertain this War in ready Money but two and forty thousand Crowns, or (as Duris writeth) provision of Victuals and Money but for thirty days: howbeit he was furnished with Magnanimity, with Temperance, with Wildom and Valour, being more holpen in this Martiall Enterprise, with that he had learned of his Tutor Aristotle, then with that which his Father Philippus had left him : he was armed with a just quarrell against the PERSIANS, fworn Enemies unto GREECE, unto whom they had done infinite wrongs and injuries, his Magnanimity and Valiantness appeared in all Fights, were it in a pitched Field, or in Affaults taking of Towns; never sparing his person, having been grievously wounded in sundry Fights. What Valour shewed he in the City of the MALLIANS, he himself alone against so many barbarous People? With what conftancy did he encourage his Surgeons to pluck out a dart that fluck faft in his Breaft? Let no man, faith he, be so faint-hearted nor cowardly; no, not if my life were in question, I could not think that a man would beleeve I seared death, if he had any feeling or fear in my behalf. Now for a man in twelve years space and less, to have done these things, and to have travelled a Conquerour the most part of the World, is a commendation passing mens understanding. Cafar on the contrary part, having made his preparations long before, happily found Craffe to pay his debts he ought, to the end to corrupt the City of ROME : and happily having practifed a dangerous League with Pompeins, he taketh Arms, and entreth into FRANCE, where his fubrilities did him as good fervice as his Arms: in the mean space, he had his means, through whose aid, in theend he overthrew the whole state of the Common-wealth of ROME. Now Alexander is not fo admirable, for that by his Prowels he overcame his Enemies, as he was by the wonderfull wife and vertuous behaviour in the middeft of his Armes, where indeed he shewed himself a perfect Philosopher; whereof it is good to alleadge some examples that shall bring us to the goodly discourse of the Vertues of this Prince, surpassing Casar in that respect. Therefore we may fee his Prowels accompanied with great Justice, a fweet Temperance, an excellent Bounty, a good order and exquifite Wifdom: directing all things-by good differetion and ripe Judgement. In all his doings you shall hardly differene, that is a deed of Valour, that of Humanity, that of Patience: but all his Exploits seemed to be mingled and compounded of all the Vertues together. Yet it is true, that always in every Action, there is a Vertue eminent above the others : but that pointeth them all to one end. In Alexanders Actions they fee, that his Valiantness is gentle, and his gentleness Valiant: his Liberality, Husbandry, his choler foon down, his loves Temperate, his Pattines not idle, and his Travels gracious. What is he that hath mingled Feating with Wars, and military Expeditions with Sports? Who hath intermingled in the middet of his belieging of Towns, and in the middeft of Skirmithes and Fights, Sports, Banquets, and Wedding-Songs? Who was ever more Enemy to those that did wrong, or more gracious to the afficted? Who was ever more cruell to those that fought, or more just unto Suppliants? Let us bring forth Porsis witty sayings who being brought prisoner before Alex ander, and by him asked how he would be used the answer ed: Like a King. So Alexander following on still, asked him if he would say any thing more: No, faid he, for all is contained in that word onely. And so may they in all Alexanders deeds, to his Friends and Enemies, at the beginning and end of his Life add too this Verfe:

How lived he? Like a wife man. How carried he himself in all his exploits of War? Like a wife man. How hath he converfed amongst men openly and privatly? Like a wife main. He hath some faults in his behaviour, and we will not forget to speak of them. But as all rules have their exceptions, and yet therefore not to be taken away: and a pimple or wart shall not stain the perfections of the Face otherwise very fair : so Alexanders follies and imperfections cannot take away this Honour from him, which wife men give him. If we would here help our felves with Examples, we should write that which Plutarch hath so learnedly and briefly gathered out of so many good Authors, who took pleafure to do that in the Life of Alexander, which they judge Xenophon did in Cyrus: to wit, to fet before all menthe pattern of a Prince compleat in all Vertues. And whereas Cefar diffained his Life with a continuall violent defire to subdue his Countrey, committing a greater fault in the laft Wars, and towards the end of his Life, then if he had laien with his own Mother: as also this damnable illusion did torment him the night before he entred into ITALIE to violate the Liberty of ROME, Alexander was not pricked forward but by Vertue it felf, to begin a just War worthy of a great King, not of purpose to set his seet upon the throats of the GREEKS, but to bring all the World to a peaceable and happy Government. His Wars made the Greek's flied no tears. Cafar filled all his Countrey with fire and tears, Alexander keeping his Souldiers under obedience, suffering none of them that followed him to commit any diforders, he brought the barbarous People through the help of his Friends to be civill, Cefar undid some of his Friends, others for fook him, he filled ROME with the insolency of his Souldiers, and fowed there the grains of infinite confusions that came out of his Bloud. But what hath been the continency of Alexander, to whom all things succeeded as he wished? He would not fee the Ladies that were prisoners, and through his Temperance was as much Conquerour of their beauties, (notwithstanding, he was in the flower of his age, and of a lusty complexion) as of the Prowess of men by his Valiantness: yea he made less account of those Women they shewed him, then of those that he never faw. And where he was gracious to all fort of People, he shewed himself as untoward to them that were fair. How did he threaten Philoxenus, that would have bought him two Boys of a Merchant of TARENTUM? And if he did love Roxane and Statica, it was because he would lawfully marry them, and for the good of his affairs: and not as Casar, that forgat himfelf too much in those matters. But furthermore, what praise deserveth Alexander, that will not fteal a Victory? O how noble is his courage, that would not accept Darins offers: but would needs have GREECE command ASIA, as it was requifite! What diligence used he in following of his Enemie? and otherwise what compassion took he of the unworthy death of him? how did he punish Bessu ? All his former behaviour sheweth that he had a good and a true Kingly mind in him: that he loved not Traitours, nor Treason, and would not overcome but with honour. Cafar indeed did pursue Pompey, but he did not punish the murderers, till he had discovered that they conspired against him. Now to make an end of that we have to say for Alexander: we may gather out of the discourse of his Life, that the divine Providence made a Present unto this Prince of the Vertues most apparent in all the other Noble Greeks and ROMANS: who befides his Piety, Juftice, and Equity, in his adverfity he strengthened himself with hope : in prosperity, environed with flatterers, he was not drunk with his greatness, he did acknowledge he was mortall, and humbled himfelf many wayes : he is wonderfull patient, beareth the hard words of his familiars: he neither taketh Pen nor Sword in hand to be revenged of those that of fended him, thinking it a worthy thing in a King to fuffer himself to be blamed, and to hear ill

te to good : thewing a hearty affection and great honour to his friends, even for their fakes to forbear his own necessary commodities, to write unto them familiarly, and to have a speciall care of their persons and of their affairs. He provided his servants pay of creditors fix millions of gold due for his fouldiers. He fent out of ASIA into GREECE the like fum to build Temples again to their gods, in place of those which the Persians had overthrown. To conclude, in the midft of his affairs he shewed an aspiring and invincible valour, not being saint-hearted for any danger whatsoever. It is true that Calar in this case had many things common with him, as we will tell you hereaster. This notwithstanding Alexander always kept himself constant, and after such a manner, that he followed not vice, neither feemed he fo much to blemith goodly vertues as the other. Among other Alexanders vivices, they blame Alexander for drunkenness and choler. I will neither excuse the one nor the o-choler and ther in him: but as for his last, there was never Prince that would sooner confess his faults after he drunkenness. had done them through this vehemency of his, whereunto he was somewhat given by nature: it may be faid also that Cliss, Califthenes, and some others that selt the force of his anger, were the chief cause and motive of it, and had brought the mischief upon themselves. And to speak the troth, there is no reason that a servant much made of by his master, should stand so highly upon himself, that he will bear nothing, but willfully run his head against a stone which he might easily have avoided, if he could but have kept his tongue, and given place to his fury that could prefently undo him. Every man will condemn Alexander for his ill ulage of the INDIAN fouldiers, coming out of a Town uponhis word given them. And as for the Philosophers, it is a matter whereof somewhat may be faid, wherein they should have been more spare in their practises, to have done longer service to their Country, and not to have provoked fo much a puilfant and victorious enemy. And as for the Nation of the Cosseians, in that he utterly destroyed them for facrifice of the funerals of Haphestion, it is an unexcufable fault, what excufe soever may be made for it. But the gracious entertainments he gave Taxiles, and Porus, to so many Nations subdued, to so many Townstaken: the divers and great honours he gave unto the Captains of his Army, and the ordinary course of his life wonderfull mercitull, do somewhat salve the wounds of his unpremeditated choler, and his exceeding grief and forrow for his favourites and familiars. The which we much diftinguish from the strange hatred that Cafar hid in his heart, against all those that hindred his doings, without regard to any man. And where he pardoned some before and after victory, it was but for his advancement, not for any good will he bare them: for in AFRICK he put many of them to death whom he suspected, nay he spared nor Cato himself after his death. As for the tears he shed taking Pompeys seal, refusing to see the head of him, nor Theodotsus that brought it him: and contrariwife, favouring the fervants and friends of the dead, and writing goodly letters to ROME, which they call, Kiffing of his dead enemy: his acts that went before, and followed after, may plainly shew, that all that was but a Tragi-comedy ceremonioully ended, although otherwise they had had so many matters to deal in together, that it was not possible but that some remainder of the ancient knowledge meeting then in the heart, should ftir up iomeinward contrariety within: as also it happeneth to men of great courage, that contrary passions meeting together, do shew more without, then remaineth within. The wicked Theodorus deserved no lefs then Beffiu : but Cafar was not Alexander , neither went he into ÆGYPT but for the advancement of his affairs, which could not well be compassed but by the destruction of Pompey: the which when he had obtained, made him forget his duty openly. For Alexanders drunkennels, fome defirous to excuse it, alledge that he drank not much, but was long at the Table, and spent the time talking with his friends. As they tell of Cato UTICAN, that he fate at the table with his friends all night long, untill the morning, whereof fome faid that his bufiness in the Common-wealth was cause, which he followed all the day: his hindering him that he had no leafure to go to his book when night came; he took great delight to confer with learned men at his table. If Alexander after he had travelled about fo many affairs of the Common-wealth, the which he would never leave undone to follow his own pleasures, drank somewhat liberally among his Captains, yea suppose that he exceeded measure more then once : yet will I not conclude that he made use of it, and that he deserved the name of a drunkard. I will not excuse the fault he committed at the instance of Lais the Curtisan, nor the promife that he made of a prize of fix hundred Crowns to his Captains, unto him that could drink most: for it is not in glasses and goblets that men should show their strength. But there died at this quaffing and carroufing, one and fourty of his Captains. And as for himself, truly he was too lightly led by Medium , to go drink with him all night , and the next morning : whereupon he fell fick, and would not forbear to drink Wine for all that, which cast him into a Feaver that left him not. For whereas they fay he was poyloned, it had no likelihood of reason in it. Be it that this Prince did exceed in drinking, yet that not withfranding, Wine must not drown nor bury so many excellent ver- Alexanders tues that do shine in him in time of peace and war. Cesars intemperancy in his pleasures, and hisun-death and sucfatiable ambition, is an extremity without all comparison more vehement and dangerous then Alex- cessours. anders choler or cup. And as for his death, as the continuance and greatness of his glory was pure and unspotted, free from envy, during the ftrength of his Age, whileft he lived in this world : fo after his death this glory held out still in the wonted manner, he being lamented of all his Army, of all GREECE and EUROPE; many royall branches having forung from his fouldiers, leaving the world in division to four simple Captains, whose issue after them have continued many years in possessian on in their parts. Whereas Cafar to the contrary, having with fo great labour and travel by many obscure and obliqueways, attained to the height of a shamefull glory, and which wan him the ha tred of the chiefest members of the Common-wealth, was immediatly cast down, little lamented good mafter, not of fo many petty Lords. His wonderful forefight ferved di occurrences, being never prevented in any thing he went about, but always he he defired. His magnanimity weighed more then any other vertue they could note in him . which is as much as one would fay , that Cafar outweighed all the other Captains of the GREEKS and ROMANS. He was almost at all the battels: in the wars where he commanded he was never beaten but in his Lieutenants. For the skirmish in the which Pompey on a time had the better, it is not worth the speaking of it; because he could not tell how to follow his victory. And it is a fingular direction, favoured with a most rare happiness, that amongst so many blows given, Cafar never had one given him. If he found favour of Craffus before he went to the wars, of those that loved good laws and the good of the state, the which he lest turmoited was about wars; and which began to make some shew again under his Nephew, whom the divine providence (having regard to things much more excellent then either heaven or earth) had in his counfell desermined to make him Monarch of the world. As to the contrary, Alexander was happily stayed in BABYLON, where he was told by the divines, the wicked spirit having (according to the knowledge it pleased the just Judge to give him) conjectured and foretold formething of that which God had long time before revealed unto his by his faithfull Prophet. But yet after Augustus, the Empire of ROME fell again into new misfortunes, and was never but unconstant from that time forward, till in the end it lunk under her own weight. The like chanced to Alexanders successors, but not through his fault:

and that makes the memory of him more famous. Thus have you all I can fay of him. Let us fpeak something of Julius Casar also, not that I pretend to attain to that which may be said of Wherein Cafar him: for it would require a more fufficient man then my felf to perform that. But to make some feemed to excl comparison with Alexander, whose deeds he chancing one day to read of in a book, he fell a weeping, envying the brave exploits of the other. Let us therefore consider if he have done things that came near, or did excell the other. First of all, unto all the noble Acts that may be written of Alexander in his youth, I do object the worthy Act of Cafar against the Pirates, which were more his prisoners then he theirs, unto whom he paid randsom in such fort, that he made them repent their folly that they ever meddled with him. So that upon land they found he was very round with them, as also their Judge at Sea, though he were but a young man in their hands. That is but an example of the reft of his life, who could abide no companion, and much lefs a mafter, as being born to all great things, and delighting innothing but to be excellent in all the rareft and higheft things of the world: as his deeds did winnels, after he came to bear office in the common-wealth, even to the end of his days. Now albeit his eloquence is no small thing to be spoken of, which did him notable fervice in many troublefome encounters, though it was a wonder to fee the excellency of his file and grace, lively to express all things in so fine and goodly terms, that the smoothest Muses neither would , nor could speak more sweetly then he : yet fince we had rather stand upon good deeds then fair words , let us pass over this matter , so much to support Alexander , and let us see whether it may be received for truth of all men of understanding : that Cafar is the most excellent Captain that ever was in the world. Albeit that Alexander had but a small means, yet he was Lord of a great Kingdom, he had men and credit. But Cofar without patrimony of fuch worth without money and with few men, performed the greatest things that may be thought of. Alexander had to do with women and children, if one compare the people he fought with, to those whom Cefar overthrew : not in five or fix battells , but in more then fifty , very well ordered , where he was ever the weaker in number of men, but the greater in valour : never vanquished, but ever victor: and was never hurt that I can tell of, though he would venture even to his laft, and let his flesh go as freely as the meanest fouldier of his Legions. And yet in the mean time they shall find he was better stayed in his enterprises then Alexander, that like a swift running stream would run into any dangers, which indifferently joyneth with all that cometh against it. So he was in the heat of his age, and Cafar entred into doings being a man of ripe judgement, and well onwards in years. To say it is a great commendation for a Generall in the field, headlong to put himself into all dangers, making no difference betwirt himfelf and a common fouldier, that is fomewhat too forward; and therefore therein I find Cefar to be preferred before Alexander, onely for that he was not fo forward without great necessity. So that his happiness defended him in all parts, as also for that Alexander seemed to have sought to be beaten. Shall I tell you that Casar killed a million of enemies, hath triumphed for a million of others, and hath made an innumerable number to flie? That in lefs then ten years while the war in GAULE endured, he wan eight hundred Towns, and subdued three hundred Nations? If I should mention the wars he made in sisteen years space, it would make a whole book to speak onely but of the praises he deserved. The SWITZERS, GERMANS, GAULS, ROMANS, EGYPTIANS, AFRICANS, the ASIANS, and his five triumphs of fo many enemies, fo mighty, and in flew fo invincible, do approve his valour and fufficiency in all the parts requifite in a Chieftain of war. His vertues and happinels being his Tutors, he got about him a world of good wills of certain valiant Captains and fouldiers together, whom he ordered fo well, that he made them ready to perform what he commanded, and having such an unmatchable carriage towards them, he made them invincible with him; and in the middeft of his continuall troubles, he did read, meditate, speake, wrote, and left behind him the goodlieft book that a Martial man, and one that entertaineth the Muses, can devise to take in his hands. His Orations were a long time held in great reputation among the ROMANS. And for his respect unto men learned, valiant, and vertuous, Cafar had renounced himself, if he had shut his Gare against such men. The dangers Alexander passed through were great , but what were they in respect of Calars dangers, environed with 60 brave enemies, and in 60 great a number, as were the GAULS, and Pompey's followers? What foul parts have been played him by fome of his own people, and yet he weighed them not? But to the contrary, he futtered some of them to run what course they liked beft : he fent the carriage and goods to other : he always respected and honoured his enemies, when they made no head against him. And by his friends he fent reasonable conditions unto Pompey, before he would fight with him. Furthermore, when he entred into wars, being greatly in debt, and raifed up with hope, having the chiefest in ROMS his adversaries, he took upon him to fight with all the enemies abroad, and to make his way in despite of the world, to the soveraignity of ROME, the that cannot be imputed any blame to him, fince he always payed his friends well, and brought his enemies to reason, though they set against him. If justice accompanied the prowess of Alexander. if he have used moderation, gentleness, and humility in his victories, if he shewed himself wise and The vermes circumfpect in his purposes: what shall be faid of Ca/ar then? Whose gentleness is so much spo-and perfections ken of that men judge that was one of the occasions of his death. His pastimes were very of Casiar both ferious: and after he began to deal in affairs, he never played but in good earnest, and yet would in war and he never lose his time of recreation, and his pleasant talk and communication with his friends and I cace. familiars. But in the middest of his victories, how did he use his enemies, and those that set themfelves against him? He was a lightening of war, that did overthrow all that durst withstand him: and he never meddled with any that yeelded without refiftance. He was Faithfull, Wife, Valiant, and Couragious, and did not allow all kind of means to obtain victory: although more then once he might have fewed (as they fay) the case of the Fox, with the skin of the Lyon. But yet he followed in good time his predeceffors, although he did finely affault the most part of his enemies, and destroyed the one by the other. Cafars ambition was very extream, but he covered it in another manner of fort then Alexander did : who passing over a River , let fall certain words . plain enough, that he fought the praise of the ATHENIANS. And the false inventions to make the glory of his name to continue for ever amongst the INDIANS, do not they discover a most grofs vanity, which did but labour after that which it could not attain? But Cafar defired earnestly, and touched the end of his intentions. His prowefs is wonderfull gracious, and his gentlenefs grave and valiant; his liberality fo great, that to think what he should give, was more then the gift it felf, how great foever. Also he gathered no riches together in the wars, to live afterwards in deliciousness at his pleasure : it was a reward of vertue that he locked up, to recompence men of valour, and to leave good fouldiers a mean to live by honeftly at home, when age and their wounds did constrain them to leave wars. He was never weary of any travell more then Alexander: and gave not himself to so much ease, though he was elder, slenderer, and thinner of body, and subject to the Falling-sickness: but he hardened himself against it by continual exercise of his body, and mind, accompanied with an incredible quickness and diligence. He having left FRANCE, and running after Pompeius to BRUNDUSIUM, he subdued all IT A LIE in less then three weeks, returned again from BRUNDUSIUM to ROME; from whence he went to the heart of SPAIN, where he overcame extream hardness in the war against Afranius and Petreius, and at the long siege of MARSEILLES. From thence he returned into MACEDONIA, wan the battell of PHARSALIA, and followed Pompeius into EGYPT, which he subdued also. After that he came into SYRIA, and into the Kingdom of PONT; where he fought with Pharmaces: and from thence into AF-RICK, where he overcame Scipio and Juba. Afterwards he returned again through ITALIE and SPAIN, and there overcame the fon of Pompeius. Now weigh therewithall the travels, fights, conquefts and expeditions of Alexander: then fay plainly, what you think of it: Cafar carried it by much. The onely wars of the GAULS have been more sharp and dangerous then all the conquests of ASIA and the INDIANS. For it is not in passing over mountains and Rivers ill guarded, that shews the deeds of men: it is to overcome a subtill and puissant enemie. But I pray you, these words of Cafar to the Masters of the Brigantine (who unless they had known him , would have passed him from APOLLONIA to BRUNDUSIUM) were they not more swelling then the sea it self: Courage my friend, faid he, fail hardly: for thou carriest Cafar and his fortune. And that which he faid passing over the River of Rubicon, to enter into ITALIE: A man can be but once undene : what a courage did he shew in that? Truely a mind, that from thence did behold death, and cared for no more, but for the execution of his counsels. If a man observe the directions of Alexander in his exploits, what is that in the respect of the wildom of Casar? being wont to say, he loved victory gotten by counsell more then by force. I know that Alexander was adorned with most excellent vertues, and hurt with very few known vices. For therein it seemeth he hath lattised up Casar, and many others of the chiefest in the GREEK and ROMAN History : although I cannot diffemble also, that he was led by flatterers and women too: witness that which he did at the instigation of Law and of his minions. As also that his deeds were but wind: dangerous vices in all men, but especially in Princes: from which Cafar kept himself with better understanding. But if we bring in shew the good understanding, the spirit, the judgement, the conduct, the profound knowledge, the eloquence, the hardiness, the greatness of courage, the more then humane boldness in the middest of the greatest dangers : the travels, the pains, the bounty, the gentleness, the courtesie, the liberality, and the good fortune of Cafar: we shall have enough to speak of. They object this against him, that among the Senators and others which took Pompeius part, he spared them that could not much hart him : and others whom he thought he could not gain, he overcame them in AFRICK:

ALEXANDER

But Brutm, Cassim, and his adherents shew, that Casar sought as graciously, if his ill-willers would have let him alone. And sure it is very with him but a while longer, matters had not gone on with such a violent court with this but a write longer, matters had not gone on with luch a violent court, his death: but the efface of Rome had been governed with better Policy, and the ambust of this great person having attained his desire, had been satisfied, and would have fallen of himself. For whereas he did lean to the flatteries of Balbus and Antonius, to difdain the Senate, and to cover whereas he and figns of Royall dignity, these were but the blasts of this wicked wind, which such dangerous bellows entertained and kept in his heart. Now in this he cannot be excused. On the contrary fide, they cannot too much condemn this passion of his, which sufficiently appeared in the first voyage he made into SPAIN: when passing by a pelting Village, he preferred the first place in that to the second in ROME. This passion increased in him ever after, so mightily over-ruling all the reft, and fo absolutely possessing his mind, that it carried him whither it would, and made him that without respect of his Country or of himself he never left running, untill that his fierce horse cast him on the ground, and brake his neck. Yea, so many victories and triumphs drew horse cast him not for all that to seek rest: but (as Alexander failed up and down the Ocean, during his last fickness, and fome hours before his death) he embraced greater wars and conquest then before. For that he did in reforming the Kalender, and the enterprise of fo many buildings and works for the Commonwealth, fleweth, that that mind was a bow ever bent. For his voluptuousness, peradventure it will not become us to speak of it; and we were better with silence and shame lament mans impersection, then in deferying of noble persons, content those that are never merry, but when one seedeth on, then in deterging of mode periods, content those that are never metry, but when one recuent their malice. The ambition wherewith he was infinitely wounded, coming to fight with this wickednels after women, made him quickly leave the haunt, utterly to subdue it afterwards; to the end that his pleafures should never make him steal a minute of an hour, nor to remove one foot from the occasions offered him to raise him to greatnes. As for his death, it was violent indeed, but practi-

Augustus, and afterwards.

Cajarr death, occasions onered into to take that to whom he had given life, and who continued not long after him. It is of Rome unter the true, his high carriage of himself was cause of his death: for nothing wanted to his happines, but true, his high carriage of himself was cause of his death: for nothing wanted to his happines, but to love his City, and to continue to be more carefull then he was to pleafe the Senare and people, as to love in the common after his five triumphs, pardoning all, raifing one and other to Offices in the Commonne nau begun autri ins nive training. But yet he hath that more then 'Alexan's man alone could not easily have brought to pass. But yet he hath that more then 'Alexan's mother, wives, and children that his death was revenged. To the contrary Alexanders mother, wives, and children that his death was revenged. dren made a poor end; his Army remaining as a body without a head, and he had a good grace that compared it to Cyclope Polypheme, when Ulyste had put out his eye. His Captains and fuccessours devoured one another by long wars. As for Casar, he lived fill inthe person of his fuccessour Augustus, who having overcome a world of hard adventures, established a Monarchy: the which in delpite of a million of tempefts, hath continued many hundreds of years. And specially the name of Calar, by excellent priviledge hath remained unto those that after him reigned in the of precedency any the name of Capital, 37 actions particles was, and yet is to this day defired of all men, that by valourous betwith Alex. Empire of ROME; and his valiantness was, and yet is to this day defired of all men, that by valourous which of the two I should give the precedency : but fince the world hath been too little for the one and which of the other, I should go too far if I plainly spake what I thought. Now that I have spoken for the other, I cease, and leave you to your judgement.

THE LIFE OF

Ann. Mund.

Ant. Christ.

HE Orator Demades on a time flourished in Athens, because in all his doings and fayings in the administration and government of the Commonwealth , he always favoured the MACEDONIANS and Antipater: in refpect whereof he was eftfoons compelled, both in his counfell and laws, to prefer many things to the dishonour of his City, saying, that they must pardon him, because he governed the shipwracks of his Countrey. This Demades arewas an arrogant speech : but yet referring it to the government of Phocion gant saying. he said truely. For indeed Demades self was the shipwrack of the Common-wealth, because he lived so insolently, and governed so lewdly. Insomuch as Antipater faid of him, after he was very old : that there was nothing left of him, no more then of a beaft facrificed, but the tongue and belly. But the vertues of Phocion which had to fight against the cruel and bitter enemy of the time, were so obscured by the calamities of GREECE, that his same was nothing so great as he deserved. For we must not credit Sophocles words, making vertue of it felf but weak, in these verses:

When storms of sore adversities (O King) do men assail, It dannts their courage, cuts their combs, and makes their hearts to quail.

But we must onely give place to fortune, who when she frowneth upon any good and vertuous man. her force is fo great, that where they deserve honour and favour, she violently heapeth falle and malicious accufations against them, which maketh their vertue lame, and not of that credit which indeed The power of it deserveth. And yet it seemeth to many, that free Cities are most cruell unto their good Citizens in vertue and fortime of prosperity: because they flow in wealth and live at ease, which maketh them of haughty tune. minds. But it is clean contrary. For advertity commonly maketh mens manners fowre, cholerick, and very hafty: befides, flow to hear, churlish, and offended with every little sharp word. For he that Advertity macorrected them that offend, feemeth to cast their adversity in their teeth : and he that telleth them kethmenhasty plainly of their faults, seemethalso to despise them. For like as honey sweet by nature, applied unto wounds, doth bring both fmart and pain : even fo, fharp words, though profitable, do bite the unfortunate man, it they be not tempered with discretion and courtese. And therefore Homer the Poet calleth sweet and pleafant things persons, as yeelding, and not striving with contrariety, against that part of the mind, whereby we be angry and froward. For even as fore eyes do like to look on black and dark colours, and cannot abide the bright and glaring : fo in a City, where for want of forefight and government, things go not well, men be fo divers and unwilling to hear of their own faults and estate, that they had rather continue in their folly and danger, then by sharpness of words be rebuked and reftored. So that it being unpossible to amend one fault with a greater, that Comved directly contrary; but fetching a compals a little overthwart; maketh an oblique circle, and by variety of approaching and departing prefervethall things, and keepeth the world in good temperature : even fo, too severe government, contrarying the peoples minds in all things, is not good : as also it is marvellous dangerous not to correct offendors when they offend, for fear of the peoples difpleasure. But the mean, sometime to yeeld unto the people to make them the more willing to obey, and to grant them things of pleasure, to demand of them again things profitable, that is a good way to govern men the better by. For , by gentle means they are brought to do many profitable things, when they feek it not of them by rigor and authority. Indeed this mean is very hard to be observed, because authority is hardly tempered with lenity. But when they meet together, there is no harmony more mulical, nor concordance more perfect then that : and therefore it is faid that thereby God doth govern the world, working rather a voluntary then a forced obedience in men. But this fault of severeness was in Cato the younger, for be could not fashion himself to the peoples manners, nor did they like his : neither did he win his ethination in the Common-wealth by flattering of them : Citero's faying and therefore Citero faid, that he was put by the Confulthip, for that he behaved himfelf as though of Caro and the he lived in the Common-wealth devited by Plato, and not among the difordered and corrupt posterity of Romulus. Methinketh I can liken him properly unto timely fruit : the which though men do take pleasure to see and wonder at, yet they eat them not. Even so, the ancientest simplicity of Cato's manner (having so long a time been out of use, and coming then to shew it self in that cormanneroceame not the corresper rupt time and ill manners of the City) was indeed much praise worthy; but yet not the convenientest, nor the fitteft for him, because it answered nor respected not the use and manners of the time. For he found not his Countrey (as Phocion did) utterly destroyed, but to fled in a dangerous tempest : and being not of authority like the Pilot to take the stern in hand, and govern the ship, he took himself to tricking the fails, and preparing the tackle, so to affift men of greater power. And yet being in no greater place, he fo thwarted fortune (which feemed to have form the overthrow of the flate of ROME) that with much ado, with great difficulty, and a long time after, she executed her malice. And yet the Common-wealth had almost gotten the victory of her, by means of Caro and his vertue: with whom I do compare the vertue of Phacian, who yet in my opinion were not in all things alike, neither in their honesty, nor policy of government. For there is difference betwixt manhood and manhood, as there was betwixt that of Alcibiades and that of Epaminondas: betwixt wildom and wisdom, as betwirt that of Aristides, and that of Themissocles : and betwirt justice and justice, as betwixt that of Numa, and that of Agefilam. But the vertues of these men (to him that shall superficially regard, and lightly confider them) feem all one in quality, in manner, and use, both alike in temperance of courtefie with feverity, and manhood with wildom: a valiant care for other, with prefence of courage and fecurity of mind for themselves, abhorring all filthiness and corruption, and imbracing constancy and love of justice: that for any man to discern the difference between them, it requireth an excellent good wit and judgement. Now touching Cato, every man knoweth that he was of a noble house, as we will shew you hereafter in his life: but for Phocion, I guess he came of no base The paramage parentage. For if he had been the fon of a Spoon-maker, as Idomeness teffifieth, Glaucippus the fon of Hyperides, having in an invective he wrote against him, reheared all the mischiefs he could of him, he would not have forgotten to have upbraided him with his base parentage; neither himselfalso (if that had been true) had been fo well brought up as he was. For when he was a young man, he was Plato's Scholer, and afterwards Xemerater Scholer, in the School of Academia : and fo, even from his first beginning, he gave himself to follow them that were learned. For as Duris writeth: never ATHENI-AN faw him weep nor laugh, nor wash himself in any common bath, nor his hands out of his sleeves Phocion never when he wore a long Gown. For when he went to the wars, he would always go on foot, and never wore Gown, unless it were extream cold and then the fouldiers to mock him withall, would fay it was a fign of a sharp Winter, when they saw Phoeien in his Gown. Now though indeed he was very courteous and gentle of nature, yet he had fuch a grim look withall, that no man had Phocions manany defire to talk with him, but fuch as were of his familiar acquaintance. And therefore when Chares the Orator, one day mocking bim for the bending of his brows, and that the ATHENIANS fell in a laughing withall: My Mafters, quoth Phocion, the bending of my brows hath done no hurr, but the loolery and laughing of thefe flatterers have made ye oftentimes weep. Furthermore, his manner of speech was very profitable, for the good sentences and counsels he uttered; but it was mixed with an imperious, auftere, and bitter shortness. For as Zeno the Philosopher faith, that the wife man should temper his words with wit and reason, before he utter them : even so was Phociens speech, the which in few words comprehended much matter. And thereupon it seemeth that Polyentlus Spaettian faid, that Demosthenes was an exellent Orator, but in speech Phocion was very witty. For like as coins of Gold or Silver, the lighter they weigh, the finer they be of good-Wherein ex- nefs : even to the excellency of speech confisheth in signifying much by few words. And touching cellency of this matter, it is reported that the Theater being full of people, Phoesion walked all alone upon the Scatspeech confidence of this matter, it is reported that the Theater being full of people, Phoesion walked all alone upon the Scatfold where the Players played, and was in a great mule with himfelf: whereupon, one of his friends feeing him to in his mules, faid unto him. Surely Phocion, thy mind is occupied about fornewhat. Indeed it is so, said he: for I am thinking with my self, if I could abridge any thing of that I have to fay to the people. For Demosthenes self little efteeming all other Orators , when Phocion role up to monwealth must be in great danger, that when it hath most need of help, and he also hazardeth himself, thar plainly telleth them their faults. Like as it tican faith, that the Sun doth not altogether follow the motion of the highest be and his friends in the ears; and told them : See, the cutter of my words rifeth ; nt it by his manners also. For when a good man speaketh, a wink of the eye, or how of his head, doth countervail many artificiall words and speeches of Rhetoricians. Eura thermore, when he was a young man, he went to the wars under Captain Chabrias, and foli- Photions first lowed him : of whom he learned to be a perfect fouldier , and in recompence thereof , he reformed fouldier-lare. many of his Captains imperfections, and made him wifer than he was. For Chabria otherwife being very dull and flortifull of himfelf, when he came to fight, he was to hot and couragious, that he would thrust himself into danger with the desperarest perions; and therefore for his rashnels it afterwards coft him his life in the City of CHIO, where lanching out with his Galley before the reft he preffed to land in despite of his enemies. But Photion being wate to look to himself, and very quick to execute on the one fide quickened Chabrias flownels, and on the other fide also, by wildom cooled his hear and fury. Chatrias therefore, being a good man and courteous, loved Photion very well, and did prefer him in matters of service, making him samous among the GRECIANS, and employed him in his hardeft enterprifes. For by his means he atchieved great fame and honour in a battell by fea, which he won by the Isle of Naxos, giving him the left Wing of his Army, on which fide the fight was sharpest of all the battell, and there he soonest put the enemies to flight. This battell being the first which the City of ATHENS wan with their own men onely, after it The victory of had been taken, gave the people cause to love Chabrias, and made them also make account of Phocion Phocion in the as of a noble Souldier, and worthy to have charge. This victory was gotten on the Feaft day of Ifle of Naxot. the great mysteries, in memory whereof Chabrilas did yearly in the fixteenth day of the moneth Badromion (now called Angult) make all the people of ATHENS drink. After that time Chabrias fending Photion to receive the tribute of the Islanders their confederates, and the Ships which they should fend him, he gave them twenty Gallies to bring him thither. But Phocion then (it is reported) faid unto him : If he fent him to fight with his enemies , he had need to have more thips: but if he fent him as an Ambaffadour unto his friends, that one ship would serve his turn. So went with one Galley onely; and after he had spoken with the Cities, and courteously dealt with the Governours of every one of them, he returned back, furnished of their confederates, with a great Fleet of Ships and money, to carry unto ATHENS. So Phocion did not onely reverence Chabrias while he lived, but after his death also he took great care of his friends and kinsmen, and sought to make his fon Ctefippus an honest man, whom though he saw very wild and untoward, yet he never left to reform him, and hide his fault. It is faid also, that when this young man did trouble him much with vaine frivolous questions, serving then under him, he being Captain, and taking upon him to give him counsell, to reprove him, and to teach him she duty of a Captain, he could not but fay : 0 Chabrias, Chabrias, now do I pay for the love thou diddeft bear me when thou wert alive . in bearing with the folly of thy fon. But when he saw that the heads of the City of ATHENS had (as it were) by lot divided among themselves the Offices of war and peace : and that some of them, as Eubulus, Aristophon, Demosthenes, Lycurgus and Hyperides were common speakers and preferrers of matters in Councils and Senate : and that others , as Diophites, Menesthem, Leosthenes and Chares became great men by the wars, and had charge of Armies: he determined rather to follow the manner of government of Pericles, Ariftides and Solon, as being mingled of both. For either of them feemed (as the Poet Archilocus faith ,)

> To the both Champions front , of Mars's warlike band , And of the Mules eke, the Arts to understand.

He knew also that Pallas the goddess and Protector of ATHENS, was called Polemica, and Politica, to wit, skilfull to rule both in war and peace. So, having thus disposed of himself in Government, he always perswaded peace and quietness, and yet was often chosen Captain, and had charge of Armies, being the onely man that of all the Captains afore him, and in his time, did never fue for charge, neither yet refused it at any time, when he was called to serve the Commonwealth. It is certain that he was chosen five and fourty times Prætor, and was always absent at the Elections, but yet fent for. Whereupon all the wifemen wondered to fee the manner of the people towards him , confidering that Phocion had never done nor faid anything to flatter them withall , but commonly had been against their defires: and how they used other Governours notwithstanding. that there were more pleasant and delightfull in their Orations, like men to sport at; as it is faid of Kings, who after they have washed their hands to go to their meat, do use to have jesters and statterers to make them merry: but on the other fide, when they had occasion of wars indeed, how then like wife men they would bethink themselves, and chuse the wifest and stoutest man of the City, and that most would withstand their minds and desires. For on a time an Oracle of Apollo Delphias, being openly read before them, which faid, that all the other ATHENIANS being agreed, yet there was one among them that was contrary to all the rest of the City: Phocion stepping forth before them all, bad them never feek further for the man, for it was he that liked none of their doings. Another time he chanced to fay his people before all the people, the which they all praised and approved: but when he faw they were so suddenly become of his mind, he returned back to his phocions nofriends, and asked them: alas, had not fome evil thing flipped my mouth unwares? Another time able fayings. a generall collection being gathered of the people at ATHENS, towards the folemnifing of a fa-crifice; other men of his state having payed their part, he was often called upon to pay his:

and brought their wives, flaves, and cattell, and all their goods into

but he answered them again, Ask them that be rich, for it were a shame thing, being yet in this mans debt, pointing to Callicles the usurer, who had when they left him not for all this, to cry out upon him for the contribution, he is when they tert min not for all times a coward preparing to go to the wars, and as he was ready, to depart, he heard the Ravens what a crying they made, and taking it for an ill figne, he put off his harnels, and kept him at home. After that he put on his harnels again, and went on his way toward the Camp, the Ravens began again to make a goodlier cry behind him : but thereupon he flayed flraight, and at length faid: Ye shall croak as loud as ye lift, before ye feed on my carcals, Another time the ATHENIANS being in war under his charge would needs have him to lead them to give charge upon their enemies , but he would not. Thereupon they called him coward, and faid, he durft not. Well faid he again, It is not you can make me valiant, no more then my felf can make you cowards; and yet one of us know another. Another time in a marvellous dangerous time, the people handled him very churliffly, and would needs have him prefently deliver account of his the people nandiculum very comming, and would need that preceding common associated account of the people becharge: but he aniwered them, O my friends, first fave your felves. Furthermore, the people becharge: ing very lowly and humble, for fear, in time of wars, and prefently in peace again waxing brave in words against Photion, charging him that he had taken the victory out of their hands, he onely faid thus to them: You are happy that have a Captain that knows you, elfe you would fing a new long. Another time there was a quarrell betwint the BOEOTIANS and them, about their bounds and Fronounce time there was a quality of the work of the which they would not try by law, but by battell: But Phocion told them, they did they wife not what, and counfelled them rather to fight it out in words, in which they were the ftronger, and not with weapons, where they were the weaker. Another time they fo much milliked his opinion in the affembly, that they would not abide to hear him, nor fuffer him to speak. Well, my Mafters, quoth he then, you may make me do that which is not to be done: but you shall never compell me against my mind, to say that which is not to be spoken. He would as gallantly also gird the Orators his adverfaries, when they were busic with him. As on a time he aniwered Demossiumes, that faid unto him: The people, Phocion, will kill thee one day, and if it take them in the heads: Yea thee, quoth he, if they be wife. Again, when Polyentin Spaettian, in a hot day perfeadrea tnee, quotin ne, it they be write. Dean, when two problems, wearing, and with much ado fetching ed the people of ATHENS to make war with king Philip, swearing, and with much ado fetching his breath, being a far man, that he was driven oftentimes to drink water, to end his Oration: Surely faid Phoeton, ye shall do marvellous wifely, to make war at such a mans motion. Why, what think ye will he do, when he had his Curaces and his Target upon him, and that the enemies be ready to fight: that now in making an Oration onely before you, which he hath studied long before, is almost stifled? Another time also when Lycurgus in his Oration had openly reproved him for many things before the people, and among the reft, for that Alexander demanding ten Citizens of ATHENSIO do with them what he thought good, that he had counfelled them to deliver them: Phocion answered him, I have oftentimes countelled them for the best, but they would never follow my counsell. There was one Archibiades at that time in ATHENS, that counterfeited the LACE-D.EMONIAN, with a marvellous long beard, a beggarly cloak, and a fowr look. Photon being chekt one day before the people, appealed unto Archibiades for a witness, to confirm that he fpake. But he rifing up, counfelled the people contrarily, to flatter them withall. Phocion perceiving it, took him by the beard, and faid unto him: Alas Archibiades, why diddeft thou not then clip Ariflogiton, 2 thy beard, feeing thou wouldest needs flatter? There was another great pleader, one Ariflogiton, that Sycophan, and in all the Affemblies of the City, did nothing but buzze wars continually in their ears. Afterwards Coward when men were to be leavied and mustered, and their names entred that should go to the wars, Aristogiven came halting into the Market-place with a staff in his hand, and both his legs bound up, to make the people believe that he was fick and difeased. Phocion spying Ariflogiston far off, cried out to the Cleark that wrote the bills: Put in Ariftogiton, lame, and impudent. So that oftentimes it makes me Photion called mufe, how, or wherefore fo sharp and fevere aman (as by these examples it appeareth he was) could come to the furname of good. Norwithstanding, in the end I find it a hard thing, but not impossible, that a man should be like wine, both sweet and sharp together: as there are others to the contrary, that at the first fight, feem very courteous and gentle of conversation, and upon better acquaintance, by furname, prove churlish and dogged. It is reported also, that Hyperides the Orator one day should say to the ATHENIANS : I gray you (my Lords) note me not for my fharpness, but confider if my fharpnels be without profit. As who should fay, men are not troublesome, but for coverousnels onely, and as if the people did not rather fear and hate them, that of infolency and malice, did abuse and contemn their authority. Phocios on the other side, never did Citizen hurt, for any psivate malice he bare him: but was ever fharp and cruell to them which were against any matter he preferred for the benefit of the Commonwealth. For in all other things he shewed himself marvellous lowly and courteous to every body, and would be familiar with his adverfacies, and help them, if they wanted, or were otherwise in danger of displeasure with the state. Insomuch as his friends therefore reproved him on a time, when he tpake in the behalf of a naughry man, an Offender: O faid he, honeft men need no help. Another time, Arifogiton the Sycophant, being clapped up in prison, sent unto Phocion to pray him to come and speak with him, after he was condemned. Phoesion went into the prison to him, and when his friends perfwaded him to the contrary, he answered them: O let me alone, faid he, for where could I fee Ariftogiton more gladly than in prifon? Furthermore, when there went any Army to Sea out of ATHENS, if there were any other chosen Generall but Phocion, the Towns and Islands all along the Sea coast (which were friends and consederates of the ATHENIANS) fortified

The fadey had been enemies, and open war proclaimed. Contrarily alfo, or war proclaimed. Contrarily alfo, or with and General, they would fend out their Ships to the Sea to meet him to their Ships to the Sea to meet him to their Caries. Colored with Curriands in token of common joy, and to would bring him to their Cities. and marifed the Towns by Tyrants to rebell : whereupon Plutark ERETRIAN prayed aid of the ATHENIANS, to take this Mand from the MACEDONIANS, which they daily won more and more, if they came not presently to aid them. So Phocion was fent General thirther, but with a few men onely, because they made account the men of that Country would straight joyn with him, for Phacions jourthe good will they bare him. But when he came thither, he found them all Traytors and Rebels, and ney into Euless. bribed with King Philips money, which he lavished out amongst them: fo that he was brought into great danger. Thereupon he retired to a little hill fevered from the plain of TAMINES with a great large valley, and therefortified himself with that little Army he had. Then he perswaded his great large valley, and there forthed minich with that fittle string it had. Then he pertwated his Photion per-Captains not to care for all those rebels, pratters, and cowards which fled out of their Tents, swadenh his and forfook their Enfigns and Captains, but that they should let them go out of the Camp where Captains, to they would. For, faid he, fuch disobedient fouldiers here will do us no service, and moreover will suffer the muhinder them that have good will to ferve well : and at home also, knowing themselves in fault, for tinous soulthat they forfook the Camp with licence, they dare not complain upon us. Afterwards when diers and cothe enemits came to fer upon him, he commanded his men to Arm, and put themselves in readiness when wards to de-and not to firr untill he had done facrifice: but he stayed long before he came, either because he could have no lucky figns of the facrifices, or elfe for that he would draw his enemies nearer. Thereupon Plutark ERETRIAN supposing he deferred to march for fear, went himself first into the field. with certain light horsemen he had in pay. Then the men of Arms seeing them give charge, could hold no longer, but followed him also, stragling out of the Camp one after another disorderly, and so did set upon their enemies. The first being overthrown, all the other dispersed themselves, and Plutark himself fled. Then certain bands of the enemies thinking all had been theirs, followed them even into their Camp, and came to throw down their Rampiers. In the mean time, Phocion having ended his facrifice, the ATHENIANS came out of their Camp, and fet upon them, and Photions vimade part of them flie immediately, and part of them also they flew hard by the Trenches of their Gory in Eules. Camp. Then Phocion commanded that the battell should fland still, to receive their men that were feattered up and down the fields: in the mean space he himself, with the choisest men of his Army, gave charge upon the enemies. The fight was cruell between them. For the ATHENIANS fought very valiantly, venturing their persons: but of them all, two young men fighting by their General (Glancus the fon of Polymedes, and Thallus the fon of Cineas) carried the praise away. And to did Cleophines that day also shew himself very valiant. For he crying out still upon the horsemen that fled, and perswading them to come and help their General that was in danger, brought them back again, and thereby got the footmen the victory. After this battell, he drave Plutark out of ERETRIA, and took the Castell of ZARETRA, standing in a very commodious place for this war, where the life draweth to a straightness, environed on either fide with the sea : and would not fuffer his men to sake any GRECIANS prisoners, fearing lest the Orators at ATHENS might move the people, suddenly in a rage, to put them to death. After all these things were done, Phocion returned back to ATHENS. But that did the confederates of the ATHENIANS straight wish for his justice and courtefie; and the ATHENTANS themselves also knew his skillfulness and manhood. For his fucceffor Mobiffins, that was General for the reft of the war, dealt fo undifcreetly, that he himself was taken prisoner there. Then King Philip being put in marvellous great hope, went with all his Army into HELLESPONT, perfivading himfelf, that he should straight take all CHERRONESUS, the Cities of PERINTH and BIZANTIUM. The ATHENIANS thereupon determining to fend aid, to prevent King Philips coming, the Orators made great fuite, that Chares might be chosen Captain: but he being sent thither with a good number of ships, did no service worthy commendation, neither would the Cities receive his Navy into their havens : but being suspected of every man, and despised of his enemies, he was driven to fail up and down, and to get money of the Allies. The people being incenfed by the Orators, were marvelloufly offended, and repented themselves that they had fent aid unto the BIZANTINES. Then Phocion rising up, spake unto the people, and told them, that it was no reason that mistrusting their consederates, they should be offended with them : but to be angry with their Captains that deferved to be miftrufted. For they, faid he, do make your confederates airaid of you, who without you notwithstanding cannot save themfelves. The people changing their minds by his Oration, made Phocion again their Captain, and fent him with an Army into HELLES PONT to help the confederates there, which was of great importance to fave the City of BIZANTIUM. Furthermore, Phocions fame was fo great, that (lon, the Phocion faved greatest man of vertue and authority in BIZANTIUM, having before been Phocions companion and the City of familiar in the Academy, made fute for him unto the City. Then the BIZANTINES would not Byzantium. fuffer him (though he defired it) to Camp without the walls of their City, but opening their gates, received him in , and mingled the ATHENIAN's amongst them. Who , perceiving how much the Photion drave Crizens trufted them, did to honeftly behave themselves in their conversation amongst them, that Philipout of they gave them no manner of cause to complain of them : and shewed themselves so valiant befides in all battells and conflicts, that Philip (which before was thought dreadful and invincible, every man being afraid to fight any battell with him) returned out of HELLESPONT without any thing done, and to his great discredit: where Phocion wan some of his the strong holds, in the which he had placed his Garrisons. Furthermore into his Countries, he destroyed his borders: till that at length he was for Photion joyned to return home again, by mean of a great Army that came against him to detect Shortly after, the MEGARIANS fecretly fent unto him, to deliver their City into his himself cion fearing if the BEOTIANS understood it, that they would prevent him, he called a common affembly early in the morning, and told the people what message the Megarians had fent unto him. The people upon this motion being determined to aid them, Phocios straight founding the Trumpet at the breaking up of the affembly, gave them no further leifure, but to take their weapons; and so led them instantly incontinently to MEGARIA. The MEGARIANS receiving him, Phocion thut up the haven of Nis & A, and brought two long walls from the City unto it, and to joyned it unto the fea : whereby he stood not greatly in fear of his enemies by land ; and for the sea, the ATHENIANS were Lords of it. Now when the ATHENIAN'S had proclaimed open war against King Philip, and had chose other Captains in his absence, and that he was returned from the Isles, above all things, he perfusaded the people (King Philip requiring peace, and greatly fearing the danger) to accept the conditions of peace. Then one of their buffe Orators that was ftill acculing one or other, faid unto him: Why Photion, how darest thou attempt to turn the ATHENIANS from war, having now their fwords in their hands? Yes truely, faid Phoeien: though in war I know I shall command thee, and in peace thou wilt command me. But when the people would not hearken to him, and that Demoss hine, carried them away with his perswassons, who counselled them to fight with King Philip, as far from ATTICA as they could: I pray the friend, quoth Phosion unto him, let us not dispute where we shall fight, but consider how we shall overcome; the which if we can so bring to pals, be fure we shall put the war far enough from us : for men that are overcome, be ever in fear and danger, wherefoever they be. When the ATHENIANS had loft a battel against Philip, the feditious Orators, that hunted after innovation, preferred Charidenna to be chosen Generall of the ATHENIANS: whereupon the Magistrates and Senators being afraid, and taking with them all the Court and Senate of the AREOPAGITES, they made such earnest sute to the people, with the tears in their eyes, that at last (but with much ado) they obtained, that the affairs of the City might be put into Phocions hands and government. He thought good to accept the Articles and gentle conditions of peace which Philip offered them. But after that the Orator Demades moved, that the City of ATHENS would enter into the common Treaty of peace, and common affembly of , the flate of GREECE, procured at King Philips request, Phocies would not agree to it, untill they might understand what demands Philip would make at the assembly of the GRECIANS. When his opinion through the perverfenels of time could not be liked of them, and that he law the ATHENIANS foon after repented them that they did not follow his counfell, when they heard they should furnish King Philip with ships and horsemen : then he told them; the fear whereof ye now complain, made me to withftand that, which now ye have confented unto. But fithence it is fo that you have now past your confents, you must be contented, and not be discouraged at it: remembring that your Ancestors in time past have sometime commanded, and otherwhile obeyed others; and yet have fo wifely and difcreetly governed themselves in both fortunes, that they have not onely faved their City, but all GREECE besides. When news came of King Philips death, the people for joy would ftraight have made Bonfires and Sacrifices to the gods for the To rejoyce at good news : but Photien would not fuffer them, and faid, that it was a token of a bale mind, to any mans but rejoyce at any mans death; and befides that, the Army which overthrew you at CHERONEA, hath fleweth a bale not yet look but one man. And when Demalthrent also would commonly social ill of Alexander and theweth a bale not yet loft but one man. And when Demosthenes also would commonly speak ill of Alexander, and mind, and vile not yet loft but one man. specially when he was near THEBES with his Army , Phoeins rehearled unto him these veries of

How great a folly is it to stand Against a cruell King , Which being arm'd, and having sword in hand,

What , when there is such a great fire kindled , wilt thou cash the City into it? For my part there-Seeks fame of every thing? fore, though they were willing, yet will I not fuffer them to cast themselves away; for to that end have I taken upon me this charge and government. And afterwards also, when Alexander had razed the City of THEBES, and had required the ATHENIANS to deliver him Demostheres, Lycurgus, Hyperides, and Charidemus; and that the whole affembly and councell not knowing what an liver to make, did caft their eyes upon Phocion, and cried unto him to fay his opinion: he then rofe up, and taking one of his friends unto him called Nicotles, whom he loved and trufted above all man also he field they carried unto him to fay his opinion. men elfe, he faid thus openly unto them: These men whom Alexander requireth, have brought this City to this extremity, that if he required Nicocles here, I would give my confent to deliver him: for I would think my felf happy to lofe, for all your fafety. Furthermore, though I am right heartily forry (faid he') for the poor afflicted THEBANS, that are come unto the City for fuccour: yet I affure you, it is better one City mourn, then two. And therefore I think it is best to intreat the conquerour for both, rather then to our certain destruction to fight with him that is the stronger. It is faid also that Alexander refused the first decree which the people offered him upon Phoesions requeft, and fent away the Ambassadours, and would not speak with them. But the second which Photion himself brought, he took, being told by his fathers old fervants, that King Philip made.

countell. For Photion perswaded him, if he loved quietnels, to leave war: if Alexander padites fame, then that he should make war with the barbarous people, but not with the GRE- cified with the So Photien feeding Alexanders humor with such talk and discourse as he thought would Athenians by like him beft, he so altered and softned Alexanders disposition, that when he went from him, he Photions mean, willed him that the ATHENIANS should look to their affairs, for if he should die , he knew no people fitter to command then they. Furthermore, because he would be better acquainted with Phocion, and make him his friend, he made so much of him, that he more honoured him then all the rest of his friends. To this effect, Duris the Historiographer writeth, that when Alexander was grown very great, and had overcome King Darius, he left out of his letters this word Cheerin (to wit, joy and health) which he used commonly in all the letters he wrote; and would no more honour any other with that manner of falutation, but Phocion and Antipater. Chares also writeth the fame. And they all do confess, that Alexander fent Phocion a great gilt out of Asia, of a hundred filver talents. This money being brought to ATHENS, Phocion asked them that brought it, why Alexander gave him such a great reward, above all the other Citizens of ATHENS. Because faid they. he onely efteemed thee to be a good and honest man. Phoeion replied again, then let him give me leave to be that I feem, and am whileft I live. The messengers would not so leave him, but followed him home to his house, where they saw his great husbandry and thriftiness. For they found his wife her felt baking, and he himfelt drew water before them out of the well to wash his feet. But when they were more earnestly in hand with him then before, and prayed him to take the Kings present, and were offended with him, faying, it was a shame for Alexanders friend to live so milerably and beggarly as he did. Then Phocion feeing a poor old man go by, in a thread bare Gown, asked them whether they thought him worse then he? No, God sorbid, answered they again. Then replied he again . he lives with less then I do , and yet is contented , and hath enough. To be short, faidhe, Phocions verme if I should take this sum of money and occupy it not, it is as much as I had it not; on the other and intregrity fide, if I occupy it, I shall make all the City speak ill of the King and me both. So this great pre- intesusing of fent was fent back from ATHENS: whereby he shewed the GRECIANS, that he was richer that Alexanders needed not fuch gold and filver, then he that gave it him. But when Alexander wrote again to Phocion, that he did not reckon them for his friends, that he would take nothing of him . Phocion notwithstanding would not take the money, but onely requested him for his fake, that he would fet these men at liberty which were kept prisoners in the City SARDIS for certain accusations laved against them : Echecratides the Rhetoricion, Athenodorus born in the City of IMBROS, and two CORINTHIANS, Demaratus and Spartus. Alexander prefently fet them at liberty, and fent Crateriu into MACEDON, commanding him to give Phocion the choice of one of these four Cities of ASIA which he liked best: CIOS, GERGITHA, MYLASSIS, ELEA: fending him word. that he would be much more angry with him now if he did refuse his offer than he was at first But Pho- Photion, house cion would never accept one of them : and Alexander shortly after died. Phocions house is seen yet and Wives. at this day in the Village of MILITA, fet forth with plates of Copper, but otherwise very mean, and without curiofity. For the wives he married, there is no mention made of the first, faving that Cephilodotius the Image Graver was her brother. But for his fecond wife she was no less famous at ATHENS, for her honesty and good huswifery, then Phocian for his justice and equity. And for proof thereof, it is reported that the ATHENIANS being one day affembled in the Theater, to fee new Tragedies played, one of the Players when he should have come upon the Scaffold to have played his part, asked the fetter forth of the Playes the apparell of a Queen, and certain Ladies to wait upon her, because he was to play the part of a Queen. The setter forth of the playes denying him, the Player went away in a rage, and left the people staring one at another, and would not come out upon the Stage. But Melanthius the fetter forth of the Playes , compelling him ; brought him by force on the Stage, and cried out unto him : Doest not thou fee Phocions wife that goeth up and down the City with one maid onely waiting upon her? and wilt thou play the fool and mar the modesty of the women of ATHENS? The people hearing his words, filled all the Theater with joy and clapping of hands. The same Lady, when a certain Gentlewoman of IONIA came at ATHENS to fee her, and shewed her all the rich Jewels and precious Stones she had she anfwered her again: All my riches and Jewels, is my husband Phocion, who these twenty years toge- Phocus Phother hath continually been chosen Generall for the ATHENIANS. Phocions fon telling his father cions fon what on a time, that he was defirous to contend with other young men for the victory, who should cunninglieft leap out, and get up again into the Chariots or Coaches, running full course at the feafts Panathenaa at ATHENS: his father was contented he should; not that he was desirous his fon should have the honour of the victory, but because by this honest exercise he should grow to better manners, for that he was a diffolute young man, and much given to Wine. Yet he wan the victory at that time, and there were divers of his fathers friends, that prayed him to do them that honour, that they might keep the feaft of this victory in their houses. Phocion denied them all but one man, and him he suffered to shew his good will unto his house, and went thither himself to supper to him. Where amongst many fine and superstuous things prepared, he sound passing Bathes of Wine and sweet smelling Spices to wash the seet of the bidden guests as they came to the feast.

Whereupon he called his fon to him, and asked him, how canst thou abide Phoens, that our friend should thus disgrace thy victory with excess: But because he would withdraw his son from that licentious life, he brought him to SPARTA, and placed him there among young boyes brought up after the

LACONIAN discipline. The ATHENIANS were much offended at it, to see that Phocion did so much despite his own Countrey manners and fashions. Also when Da faid unto Phocion : Why do we not perswade the ATHENIAN'S to live and ner? As forme, faid he, if thou wilt make one to fet it forward, I am ready move the matter. Indeed quoth Phocion, thou art a meet man to perswade the Artistics to move the matter. Indeed quoting 100,000, mode at a meet man to praite Lycurgus traight law, that live LACONIAN-like in common together at their meals, and to praite Lycurgus traight law, that art thy felf commonly fo perfumed, and fine in thy apparell. Another time when Alexander wrote letters unto ATHENS to fend him fome ships, and the Orators perswaded them not to grant him, the people called upon Phocion chierly to fay his opinion: then Phocion told them plainly, methinks ye must either make your selves the strongest in wars, or being the weaker, procure to be friends unto the stronger. Pithin a new come Orator, being full of tongue, and impudent, would still make one to speak in every matter: wherefore Phosius said to him, Good gods I will this Novice never leave babling? And when Harpalm King Alexanders Lieutenant of the Province of Babylon, fled out of Asia, and came to Attica with a great fum of gold and filver, ftraight these men that fold their tongues to the people for money, flocked about him like a fight of Swallows. And that four tient tongues to the property and piece of money to baffe them with: for it was a trifle to him, confidering the great fums of money he brought. But to Photion himself he fent seven hundred talents, and offered himself and all that he had into his hands of trust. But Photion gave him a sharp answer, and told him that he would make him repent it, if he corrupted the City of ATHENS in that Phiclos despitements. So Harpalus being amazed therewith, left him at that time, and went unto them that the the Harpalus taken money of him. But thortly after, when the ATHENIANS sate in councell about him, he perceived that those which had taken his money were shrunk from him, and that they did accuse him, where they should have excused him, to blear world, that men should not suspect them they had been corrupted : and that Phocios on the other fide which had refuted his morey, having respect to the Common-wealth, had also some regard to save his life: he once more attempted all the ways he could to win him. Howbeit he found him so constant, that no money could carry the man Then Harpalus falling in friendship with Charites (Plocions fon in Law) he made him to be ill fpoken of, and greatly suspected, because men saw that he trusted him in all things, and imployaportion, and greatly impected, octain find any time to the making of a sumptious Tomb for Ty-ed him in all his affairs: as in committing to his trust the making of a sumptious Tomb for Tythouse the famous Curtifan that was dead, whom he loved, and by whom he had a daughter: the taking upon him whereof was no less shame unto Charites, then the sinishing thereof was difgrace unto him. This Tomb is feen unto this day in a place called Hermism, in the high way from Athens to Eleusine: the workmanship thereof being nothing like near the charge of thirty talents, which was reported to be given by Ha. palsu unto Chariles, for the finishing of the fame. Furthermore, after Harpalsa death, Chariks and Photos took his daughter, and carefully brought her up. Afterwards also, Chariles being accused for the money he had taken of Harpalm, he belought his father in law Phocian, to help to ease him in his judgement. But Phocian flatly Photiss refuted denied him, and faid: Chariles I took thee for my fon in law, in all honeft and just causes onely. Furthermore, when Asclepiades the son of Hisparchus, brought the first news of the death of Alexander, Demades the Orator would not believe him: for faid he, if it were true, all the earth would finell of the favor of his Corps. Phoesen then perceiving the people began to be high minded, to defend his and fought innovation, he went about to bridle and pacific them. But when many of the Orators got up to the Pulpit for Orations, and cried out, that Afelepiades news was true of Alexan ill caufe. anders death: well then quoth Phocion, if it be true to day, it shall be true also to morrow, and the next day after. And therefore my mafters, benot too hafty, but think of it at better leifure, and fer your affairs at a fure ftay. When Leofthener also by his practife had brought the City of ATHENS into the war called the GREEKS war, and in foorn asked Phocies that was offended at it, what good he had done unto the Common-wealth fo many years together, as he had been Generall over the ATHENIANS: Placion answered him, No imal good saidhe, for all my Countrey men have been buried at home in their own graves. Another time also, Leosthems speaking proudly and insolently unto the people, Photion one day had faid unto him: Young man my friend, thy words are like unto the Cypress Tree, which is high and great, but beareth no fruit. Then Hyperides rifing up, asked Phocion: When wilt thou then counfell the ATHENIANS to make war? When I shall see young men, said he, not to for sake their ranks, rich men liberal, and Orators leave to rob the Common-wealth. When the ATHENIANS wondred to fee fuch a goodly great Army as Leoshbenes had leavied, and that they asked Phocion how he liked it: It is a goodly Army, quoth he for a furlong, but I fear their return, and the continuance of this war: for I do not fee the City able to make any more money, nor more ships, neither yet any more fouldiers then these. The which proved true as it fell out afterwards: for at the first, Leaftheres did many notable exploits. He overcame the BOEDITANS in battell, and drave Astipater into the City of LAMIA: the which did put the ATHENIANS in fuch a hope and jollity, that they made continuall feafts and factifices through the City, to thank the gods for their good news. And there were fome among them, that they made the city is to thank the gods for their good news. And there were fome among them, that to the state of the state o among them, that to take Phocion in a trip, asked him if he did not with that he had done all those things? Yes indeed, answered he, I would I had done them, but yet I would not have given the counsell to have done them. Another time also when letters came daily, one after another, bringing good news, Good gods, faid he, when shall we leave off to overcome? But when Leofthenes was dead in this voyage, they that feared Phocion should be appointed

Captain, in his place, and that he would pacifie the war, did thrust in a man of mean behaviour,

The following the People that they would spare Phocion, because they had not such and that they would make Antiphalus Generall of the Army. The People were well contented withall. But then Phocion stood up, and faid, that this man was never Scholar with him, neither did he ever know him before that time : but now, faid he, from henceforth I will take thee for my friend, for thou haft given the People the best counsel for me. The People notwithfranding determining to make War with the BOEOTIANS, Phocion spake against it all he could. Therefore his friends bidding him beware of fuch speeches, how he did offend the People, left they killed him, he answered them : They shall wrongfully sut me to death. quoth he, speaking for the benefit of my Countrey, but otherwise they shall have reason for to do it, if I fpeak to the contrary. But when he faw nothing would pacifie them, and that they went on still with their intent, then he commanded the Herauld to proclaim by found of Trumpet, that all Citizens from fourteen years unto threefcore, able to carry Weapon, should prefently upon the breaking up of the Affembly, arm themselves, and follow him with five days Provision for Victuals; then was there great ftir amongst them in the City, and the old men came and complained unto him, for his overstraight commandment. He told them again, I do you no wrong; for I am fourscore my felf, and yet will go with you. By this means he pacified them at that time, and quenched their fond defire of War. But when all the Sea-coaft was full of Souldiers, both of the MACEDONIANS, and other strangers which were led by Micion their Captain, that landed in the Territory of the Village RHAMNUS, and spoiled the Countrey thereabouts, then Photion led the ATHENIANS thither. But when he was there, divers taking upon them the Office of a Lieutenant, and going about to councell him, fome to lodge his Camp upon fuch a Hill, and others to fend his Horfemen to fuch a place, and others to camp here: O Hercules, quoth he, how many Captains do I fee, and how few Souldiers! Afterwards when he had fet his Footmen in Battle ray, there was one among them that left his rank, and stepped out before them all. Thereupon one of his Enemies also made towards him to fight with him; but the ATHENIANS heart failed, and he went back again to his place. Then faid Phocion unto him: Art thou not ashamed, young lout, to have forsaken thy rank twice? the one, where thy Captain had placed thee; and the other, in the which thou hadft placed thy felf? So Phocion giving Charge upon the Enemies, he overthrew them, and flew Micion their Captain, and divers others. Furthermore, the Army of the GRECIANS being at that time in THESSAand divers of the Battle of Antipater, and Leonatus that joyned with him, with the MACEDONI- Physicians Vi-Ans which he brought out of Asia: where Leonatus was flain in the Field, Antiphilus being story of the Generall of the Footmen, and Menon Thessalian Colonell of the Horsemen. Shortly after Macedonians. Craterus coming out of Asia into Europe with a great Army, they fought a Battle by the City The Greeting of CRANON, where the GRECIANS were overthrown: yet was not the overthrow nor flaughter overcome be Antipater. great, although it came through the disobedience of the Souldiers to their Captains, which were but young men, and used them over-gently. Moreover, when Amipater practifed to make the Cities revolt, they betrayed them, and shamefully forfook to defend their common liberty: whereupon Antipater marched forthwith with his Army to the City of ATHENS. Demosthenes and Hyperides understanding that, forsook the City. Then Demades, that was in disgrace and defamed for lack of payment of fuch fines as were fet upon his head (being feven feveral times condemned, because he had so many times moved matters contrary to the Law) and could not therefore be suffered any more to speak in the Assembly, was then dispensed withall, and licensed to speak : whereupon he moved the People to fend Ambassadors unto Antipater, with full Commission and Authority to treat with him of Peace. The Feople fearing to put to any mans truft this absolute Authority to treat of Peace, they called for Phocion, faying, that he onely was to be trufted with the Ambaffade. Then Phocion answered them: If you had believed my former counsels I always gave you, such weighty matters should not now have troubled you at all. So the Decree being confirmed by the People, Pho- Phocion Amcion was fent Ambaffador unto Antipater, that lay at the Caftle of Cadmea, being ready at that baffador unto time to invade the Countrey of ATTICA. Phocion first requested him, that before he removed Antipater. from thence, he would make Peace with the ATHENIANS. Graterin presently answered him: Phocion thy request is unreasonable, that lying here we should eat our friends, and destroy their Countrey, when we may live of our Enemies, and enrich our felves with their spoil. But Antipater taking Craterus by the hand, told him: we must needs do Phocion this pleasure. And for the rest, touching the Capitulations of Peace, he willed that the ATHENIANS should fend them a blank, and refer the Conditions of Peace to them: like as himself being befieged in the City LAMIA, had referred all Capitulations and Articles of Peace, unto the discretion of Leosthenes their Generall. So when Phocion was come back to ATHENS, the ATHENIANS feeing there was no temedy, were compelled to be contented with fuch offer of Peace, as the Enemy made them. Then Phocion was fent back Xonocrates auagain to Antipater at THEBES, with other Ambassadors joyned in Commission with him: amongst thority. whom also was that famous Philosopher, Xenocrates. The estimation of his vertue was so great with all men, that it was thought there was no living man fo proud, cruel, disdainfull, nor hasty of nature, but that the onely look of Xenocrates would foften and qualifie him, and make him to reverence him: but yet with Antipater it fellout contrary, by his perverse nature, which hated all ver- spiled of Antue: for he embraced all the reft, and would not once falute Xenocrates. Whereupon fome fay, that tipuer.

Xenocrates said then, Antipater doth well to be assamed, to see me a wants of an and evil he meaneth unto the Athenians. So when Xenocrates began to pet and evil he meaneth unto the Athenians. would not abide to hear him, but interrupted him, and checked him, and in the him tohold his peace. When Phocion had spoken, Amipater answered them, that he would make peace with the Athenians, fo they delivered him Demofthenes and Hyperides: that they flould keep their ancient Laws and Government; that they should receive a Garrison into the Haven of Munychia, that they should defray the charges of this War, and also pay a ransom besides. All the other Amballadors but Xenocrates, willingly accepted these Conditions of Peace, as very reasonable and savourable: but he said, that for Slaves Antipater did handle them savourably, but for Free-men, he dealt too hardly with them. Then Photion belought him that he would yet releafe them of their Garrison. But Antipater (as it is said) answered him: Phocion we would gladly grant thee any thing, faving that which would undo thee, and us both. Some other write notwithstanding, that Antipater laid not so, but asked him if he would become surery for the ATHENIANS, that they should attempt no alteration, but faithfully keep the Articles and Conditions of this Peace, if he did release them of this Garrison. Phoeion then holding his peace, and delaying answer, there was one Callimedon firnamed Carobin (a bold man, and hated the liberty of the People) that brake forth in these words: If Photion were so fond to give his word for the ATHENIANS, wouldest thou Amipater believe him therefore, and leave to do that thou haft determined ? Thus were the ATHENIANS driven to receive the Garrison of the MACEDO-NIANS, of the which Menylliu was Captain, an honest man, and Phocion's friend. This commandment to receive the Garrison within the Haven of Munychia, was found very stately, and done by Antipater gather of a vain glory to boaft of his Power, then for any profit could otherwise come of it. For not long after, on that day when he took possession of the Castle, he further encreased their grief: because the Garrison entred the twentieth day of Bredromion (to wir, the Moneth of August) on the which the Feast day of their Mysteries was celebrated, at what time they make their Procession called Iacchus, from the City of ATHENS, unto ELEUSIN. Therefore the folemnity of this holy Feaft being thus confused, many began to confider, that in Prelages of the old time when their Realm did flourish, there were heard and seen Voices and Images of the receives of the gods on that day, which made the Enemies both afraid and amazed : and now in the contrary manner in the very felf-fame folemnity of the gods, they faw the greatest calamity that could have happened unto GREECE. And the holiest Feast which was kept all the year through before, became then to be profaned with the Title of the greatest misfortune and event that ever happened unto the Grecians, which was, the lofs of their liberty. For not many years before, there was brought an Oracle from DODONE unto ATHENS: that they should look well to the Rocks of Diana, that strangers should not possess them. And about that time also, the Coverings with the which they do adorn the holy Beds of the Mysteries, being wet with water, became from a purple colour which they had before, to look yellow and pale, as if it had been the covering of a dead body. Yea, and that which was most to be wondered at of all other, was this: that taking other Coverings which were not holy, and putting them in the same water, they did without changing keep their colour they had before. When one of the Ministers of the Temple also did wash a white Pig in the Sea, in a clear place by the Wharfe, there suddenly came a great Fish that bit at it, and carried the hinder parts of the Pig clean away with it. Whereby men conjectured that the gods did fignifie unto them , that they should lose the lowest part of their City, nearest unto the Sea, and should keep the highest parts thereof. This notwithstanding, the Garrison did not offend nor trouble the ATHENIANS, because of the honesty of their Captain Menyllus. Now there were above twelve thouland Citizens , that for their poverty loft the benefit of their Freedom, of the which, part of them remained at ATHENS, unto whom it feemed that they offered great wrong and injury: and part of them also went into THRACIA, where Antipater affigned them Towns and Lands to inhabit. They feemed to be men like unto them, that had been taken by affault, or by fiege within a City, which had been compelled to forfake their Countrey. Furthermore, the shamefull death of Demosthenes in the Isle of CALAURIA, and of Hyperides by the City of CLEONES, whereof we have written heretofore) were almost occasion given them to lament the times of the reign of King Philip and Alexander. As it is reported, that when Anigonus was flain, they that had overcome him, were fo cruel unto their Subjects, that a labourer in the Countrey of PHRYGIA digging the Earth, being asked what he fought for, answered fighing: I feek for Antigonus. Then many men began to fay as much, when they remembred the noble minds of those two Princes, how mercifull they were to pardon in their anger, forgetting their displeasure: not like unto Antipater, who crastily cloaked his ryrannical Power, which he usurped, by being familiar, going fimply apparelled, and faring meanly, and yet shewed himself notwithstanding a more cruel Lord and Tyrant unto them whom he had overcome. Nevertheles, Phacion obtained of him the reftoring again of divers men, whom he had banished : and those whom he could not get to be restored, yet he procured that they should not be banished into so far Countreys, as others which had been sent beyond the Mountains Acroceraunians, and the head of Tanarus out of GREECE, but that they had liberry to remain within the Countrey of Peloponnesus: among the which was one Agnonides a Sycophant, and false accuser. Furthermore, he governed them that remained in ATHENS, mide, and lenity, and fuch as he knew to be good men and quiet, them he alwaies preferred of ome; Office: but such as he saw were fantastical People, and desirous of change, he kept them from Office, and took all occasion from them, so that they vanished away of themselves, and learned in time to love the Countrey, and to follow Tillage. When he saw Xenocrates also pay a certain Pension or Tribute to the Commonwealth, which all strangers dwelling in A-THENS did use yearly to pay, he would have made him a Free-man, and offered to put his name amongst the number of the free Citizens. But Xenocrates refused it, faying, he would have no part of that freedome, for the hinderance whereof he had been fent Ambaffador. And when Photion refu-Menyllus had fent Photion Money, he made him answer, that Menyllus was no greater Lord then feth Menyllus Alexander had been, neither had he at that time any greater occasion to receive his Present, gifts. then when he had refuled King Alexanders Gift. Menyllus replying again, faid, that if he had no need of it for himself, yet he might let his Son Phocus have it. But Phocion answered: If my Son Phocus will leave his naughty life, and become an honest man, that which I will leave him, shall serve his turn very well; but it it be so, that he will still hold on the course he hath taken, there is no riches then that can suffice him. Another time also he answered Antipater more roundly, when he would have had him done an unhonest thing: Antipater (said he) cannot have me to be his friend and flatterer both. Antiparers felf was wont to fay, that he had two friends at ATHENS, Phocion and Demades: of the which he could never make the one to take any thing at ATHERS, Amount and the other he could never fatisfie. And truly Phocions Poverty was a great glory Phocion loved unto his Vertue, fithence he was grown old, continuing in the fame, after he had been fo many poverty, times Generall of the Athenians, and had received such friendship and courteste of so many Kings and Princes. Where Demades to the contrary delighted to shew his riches, in things that The infolency were contrary to the Laws of the City. For a Decree being made at ATHENS, commanding of Donates that no stranger, upon forfeiture of a thousand Drachma's to be payed to the defrayer of the Dances of the City, should be any of the Dancers that Danced at any common Plays or Sports: Demades one day making certain Games and Sports at his own charges, brought a hundred Dancers of strangers at one time, and withall brought also a hundred thousand Drachma's to pay the forseiture thereof. Another time when he married his Son Demas, he said unto him: Son. when I married thy Mother, there was fo fmall roft, that my next Neighbour knew not of it; where now at thy Marriage, Kings and Princes are at the charge of the Feaft. Furthermore, when the ATHENIANS were importunate with Phocion to go unto Amipater, to entreat him to take his Garrison out of their City, he still refused the Ambassade, either because he had no hope to obtain it, or for that he faw the People more obedient unto reason, for fear of the Garrison. Howbeit he obtained of Antipater, that he should not be too hasty in the demanding of his Money, but should defer it untill a further time. So the ATHENIANS perceiving they could do no good with Phocion, they entreated Demades, who willingly took the matter upon him, and went with his Son into MACEDON; whither doubtless his deftiny carried him to his utter destruction, even at that very time when Antipater was faln sick of a disease whereof he died: whereby the affairs of the Realm went through the hands of Cassander his Son, who had intercepted a Letter of this Demades, which he had fent unto Antigonus in ASIA, willing him to come in all possible speed to win GREECE and MACEDON, which hung but of an old rot. Cassander King ten thread, mocking Antipater in this manner. Wherefore Caffander being advertised of his ar- Antipaters on rivall, he made him prefently to be apprehended; and fetting his Son hard by him, slew him before his Father, fo near him, that the blood of his Son sprang upon him, so that the Father was all bloodied with the murder of his Son. Then Caffander cafting in Demades teeth his ingratitude, and treacherous Treason against his Father, giving him all the reproachfull words he could devise, at the length he flew him with his own hands. Now Antipater before his death had established Poly- The unfortuperchon Generall of the Army of the MACEDONIANS, and Cassander his Son onely Colonell nate end of of a thouland Footmen. He notwithstanding, after his Fathers decease, taking upon him the go- Donader. vernment of the Realm, fent Wicanor with speed to succeed Menyllus in the Captainship of the Posperchon Garrison of ATHENS, before his death should be revealed, commanding him first in any case to the Army of take the Castle of Munychia, which he did. Shortly after the Athenians understanding of the Macchant the death of Antipater, they accused Photion, for that he had known of his death long before, and ant. yet kept it fecret to please Nicanor. But Phocion regarded not his accusation, but fell in acquaintance notwithstanding with Nicanor; whom he handled fo wifely, that he made him not onely friendly unto the ATHENIANS, but furthermore perswaded him to be at some charge to give the People the pastime of common Plays, which he made to be done at his cost. In the mean time, Polyperchon, who had the Government of the Kings person, meaning to give Cassander a slampant and blurt, he fent Letters Patents unto the People at ATHENS, declaring how the young King did reftore unto them their popular state again, and commanded that all the ATHENIANS should use their former ancient Laws of their City. This was a wife and crafty fetch against Phocion. For Polyperchon devifing this practife to get the City of ATHENS into his hands (as it fell out afterwards by proof) confinered a had no hope to obtain his purpose, unless he found means first to banish Photion: and thought gainst Photion. that he should easily bring that to pals, when such as had before been put off their freedom by his means, should come again to have voices in the Assembly, and that the seditious Orators and Accufers might be turned at liberty again, to fay what they would. The ATHENIANS having heard the Contents of these Letters Patents, began to be somewhat quickened and movement upon Nicanor desiring to speak with the ATHENIANS in their Senate, which in the Haven of PIREA, he went and hazarded his person amongst them, upon Mostons faith and word. Dercyllus Captain for the King, being fecretly advertised thereof, and in the Field not far from the City, did what he could to take Nicanor: but Nicanor having warning of it in time, faved himself. Then it appeared that Nicanor would presently be revenged of the City, and they accused Phocion because he kept him not, but did let him go. Whereunto he answered, That he trufted Nicanors word, and that he did not think he would offer the City any hurt; but if it offer an injury. should fall out otherwise, he had rather the World should know, that he had no wrong offered him, then that he should offer any. This truly appeared to be nobly spoken; in respect of himfelf: but considering that he being then Generall, did thereby hazard the safety of his Countrey, I cannot tell whether he did not break a greater faith which he ought to have had to the fafety of his Countreymen. Neither could he also alledge for his excuse, that he did not lay hands on Nicanor, for fear to bring the City into manifest War: but that for a colour he did prefer the faith which he had fworn and promifed unto him, and the justice that he would observe in his behalf, that for his fake, Nicanor should afterwards keep himself in peace, and do no hurtto the ATHENI-ANS. Howbeit in truth it feemed, that nothing deceived Phocion, but the over-trust he had in this Nicanor. The which feemeth to be fo, because when divers came to him to complain of Nicanor, that he fought all the fecret means he could to furprize the Haven of PIREA, and that he daily passed over Souldiers in the Isle of SALAMINA, and practised to bribe certain of the Inhabitants within the precincts of the Haven, he would never hear of it, and much less believe it. Furthermore, when Philomedes LAMERIAN made a motion, that the ATHENIANS should prepare to be in readiness to wait upon their Captain Phocion, to do as he commanded them : he made no account of it, until he faw Nicanor come out with his Souldiers from the Fort of Muny-CHIA, and that he began to cast Trenches to compass in the Haven of PIREA. But then, when Phocion thought to lead out the People to prevent him, he found they mutined against him, and no man would obey his commandment. In the mean time Alexander the Son of Polyperchon Alexander the came with an Army, pretending to aid them of the City against Nicanor, where indeed he meant Son of Poly-(if he could) to get the reft of the City into his hands, then especially, when they were in greatest chiled Treason broil one against another; and the rather, because the banished men entred hand over head with him, and divers ftrangers also, and other defamed men: fo that there was a confused Council and Affembly of Omnigatherum kept within the City, without any order: in the which Phocion was deprived of his Office of Generall, and others were also chosen Captains in his place. And had they not feen this Alexander talking alone with Nicanor, and returning many times hard to the Walls of the City, which made the ATHENIANS afraid and miftruftfull, they had never faved it from ta-Procion accu- king. At that time Procion was prefently accused of Treason by the Orator Agnonides: the which fed of Treason. Callimedon and Pericles searing, got them out of the City betimes. And Phocion also with his friends that were not fled, went unto Polyperchon: with whom also Solon PLAT.EIAN and Dinarchus Co-RINTHIAN went for company, who thought to have found friendship and familiarity with Polyperchon. Howbeit Dinarchus falling fick by the way in the City of ELATIA, they stayed there many days, hoping of his recovery. But in the mean time, the People at the perswasion of the Orator Agnonides, and at the request of Archestratus, stablished a Decree, to fend Ambassadors unto Polyperchon, to accuse Phosion: infomuch as both parties met at one self-time, and found him in the Field with the King about a Village of the Countrey of PHOCIDE, called PHARYGES, standing at the foot of the Mountain Acrorion, which they firname also Galaten. There Polyperchon commanded a Cloth of Gold to be fet up, and caused the King to be set under the same, and all his chief-Polyperchon did eff friends about him. But to begin withall, he made Dinarchus to be taken, and commanded them to put him to death, after they had racked him: then he willed the ATHENIANS to tell what they had to fay. Then they began to quarrel, and to be loud one with another, accusing one another in put Dinarchus the presence of the King and his Council, untill Agnonides at length stepped forth, and said: My Lords of Macedon, put us all in Prison, and then send us bound hands and feet to ATHENS, to give account of our doings. The King laughed to hear him fay fo. But the Noblemen of MACE-DON that were present then, and divers strangers besides to hear their complaints, made sign to the Ambassadors to utter their acculations before the King, rather then to refer them to the hearing of the People at ATHENS. Howbeit both parties had not a like indifferent hearing: for Polyperchon checked up Phocion oftentimes, and did ftill cut off his tale as he thought to purge himfelf; infomuch as in an anger he beat his staff he had in his hand against the ground, and commanded him at length to hold his peace, and to get him thence. And when Hegemon also told Polyperchon, that he himself could best witness, how Phocion had alwaies faithfully served and loved the People, he angrily answered him: Come not hither to lie fallly upon me in the presence of the King. Therewith the King role out of his feat, and took a Spear in his hand, thinking to have killed Hesemon, had not Polyperchon suddenly embraced him behind, and staid him. So the Council rose, and brake up, but prefently Phocion was apprehended, and they that stood by him. Certain of his friends feeing that, which stood farther off, muffled their faces, and straight conveyed themselves away. The rest were sent Prisonersto Athens by Clitus, not so much to have their causes heard there, as to have them executed for condemned men. Furthermore, the manner of the carrying of Phocion fent thens to be conthem to ATHENS was shamefull. For they were carried upon Carts through the great street Ceramicum unso the Theatre, where Citim kept them untill the Senate had affembled the People, excepting no Bondman, no stranger, nor defamed person out of this Assembly, but left the Theatre wide open to all comers in, whatfoever they were, and the Pulpit for Orations free for every man that would speak against him. So first of all the Kings Letters were read openly, by the which he did advertise the People, that he had found these offenders convicted of Treason: notwithstanding, that he referred the sentence of their condemnation unto them, for that they were Free-men. Then Clitus brought his Prisoners before the People, where the Noblemen when they saw Phocion. were ashamed, and hiding their faces, wept to fee him. Howbeit, there was one that rose up, and faid : My Lords, fith the King referreth the judgement of fo great persons unto the People, it were great reason all the Bondmen and strangers which are no free Citizens of ATHENS, should be taken out of this Assembly. The People would not agree to it, but cryed out, that such Traitors Thefury of the should be stoned to death, that favor the Authority of a few, and are enemies of the People: Athenians awhereupon filence was made, and no man durft speak any more for Phocion. Nevertheless when gainst Phocion. Phocion with much ado had obtained audience, he asked them : My Lords, will ye justly or wrongfully put us to death? Some answered him, justly. How then can you do it, quoth he, that will not hear our justification? Yet could they not be heard for all this. Then Phocion coming nearer, faid unto them: For my felf, my Lords, I confess I have done you wrong, and have in Government committed faults deferving death; but for these Prisoners with me, what have they done why you should put them to death? The common People answered him, Because they are thy friends. With this answer Phocion departed, and spake never a word more. Then the Orator Agnonides holding a Decree in his hand ready written, read it openly to the People, declaring how they should be judged by voices, whether the offenders had deserved death or not; and if it were found they had, then that they (hould all be put to death. And there were, that when this Decree The crucky of was read, cryed out, that they should add further unto the Decree, that before Phocion should be the Athenians put to death, they should first torment him: and therewithall commandment was given, that the unto Photion. Wheel should be set up to break his joints upon it, and also that the Hangman should be sent for. But then Agnonides perceiving that Clitus was offended with it, and thinking besides it were too beaftly and barbarous a part touse him in that fort, he faid openly: My Lords, when you shall have fuch a Varlet in your hands as Callimedon, then you may cast him on the Wheele; but against Phocion, I would not wish such cruelty. Then roseup a Nobleman among them, and added to his words: Thou hast reason to say so, Agnonides, for if Phocion should be laid on the Wheel, Phocion conwhat should we then do with thee? The Decree being confirmed according to the Contents there-demned to of, judgement was given by voices of the People, no man fitting, but all standing up, and most death. of them with Garlands on their heads, for the joy they had to condemn these Pritoners to death, With Phocion there were condemned Nicocles, Thudippus, Hegemon, and Pithocles : but Demetrius PHALERIAN, Callimedon and Charicles, were also in their absence condemned to die. Now when the Assembly was broken up, and that the persons condemned were carried back to Prison, from thence to be conveyed to execution: others embracing their friends, and taking their laft leave of them as they went, wept, and lamented their curfed fortune. But Phocion looking as chearfully of it as he was wont to do being Generall, when they honourably waited on him to his House from the Assembly, he made many of them pity him in their hearts, to consider his constancy and noble courage. On the other fide also, there were many of his Enemies that came as near unto him as they could, to revilehim, amongst whom there was one that stepped before him, and did spit in his face. Then Phocion turning him unto the Magistrates, said: Will ye not cause this impudent fellow to leave his railing? When they were in Prison, Thudippus seeing the Hemlock which they brayed in a Mortar to give them drink, he began desperately to curse and ban. faying, that they wrongfully put him to death with Phocion. Why, faid Phocion again, and doeff The confiance thou not rather rejoyce to die with me? When one that ftood by, asked Phocion if he would any and courage of thing to his Son Phocus: Yes, quoth he, that I will: bid him never revenge the wrong the A. Phocion, being thing to his son rnoem: 1es, quote he, that will be him friends, prayed him to let him drink die. the poyfon before him. Phocion answered him, Thy request is grievous to me, Nicocles: but because I never denied thee any thing in my life, I will also grant thee this at my death. When all the rest had drunk, there was no more poison left, and the Hangman faid he would make no more, unless they gave him twelve Drachma's, for so much the pound did cost him: Phocion perceiving then that the Hangman delayed time, he called one of his friends unto him, and prayed him to give the Hangman that little Money he demanded, fith a man cannot die at ATHENS for nothing, Photion gare without coft. It was the nineteenth day of the Moneth of Munichion, (to wit, March) on which Money to be day the Knights were wont to make a folemn Procession in the honour of Jupiter: howbeit some put to death. of them left off the Garlands of Flowers which they should have worn on their heads, and others also looking towards the Prilon door as they went by, burst out a weeping. For they whose hearts were not altogether hardened with cruelty, and whose judgements were not wholly suppreffed with envy, thought it a grievous Sacriledge against the gods, that they did not let that day pass, but that they did defile so solemn a Feast with the violent death of a man. His Enemies notwithstanding, continuing still their anger against him, made the People pass a Decree, that his body (hould be banished, and carried out of the bounds of the Countrey of ATTICA, forbidding the ATHENIANS that no fire should be made for the solemnizing of his Penerals. For this respect no friend of his did once touch his body. Howbeir a poor man called Conopion, that was wont to get his living that way, being hired for Money to burn mens bodies, he took his Corle, and was wont to go in a transfer and serving fire out of a Womans House of MEGARA, carried it beyond the City of ELEUSIN; and getting fire out of a Womans House of MEGARA, Photions Fune- he folemnized his Funerals. Furthermore, there was a Gentlewoman of MEGARA, who coming by chance that way, with her Gentlewoman, where his body was but newly burnt, the caused the Earth to be cast up a little where the body was burnt, and made it like to a hollow Tomb, whereupon the did use such sprinklings and effusions, as are commonly done at the Funerals of the dead : and then taking up his bones in her lap in the night, the brought them home, and buried them in her hearth, faying: O dear hearth, to thee I bequeath the Relicks of this noble and good man, and pray thee to keep them faithfully, to bring him one day to the Grave of his Ancestors, when the ATHENIANS to neep unturanting, final come to confels the fault and wrong they have done unto him. And truly it was not long after, that the ATHENIANS found by the untowardness of their Affairs, that they had put him to death, who onely maintained Justice and Honefty at ATHENS. Whereupon they made his Image to be fet up in Brais, and gave honourable burial to his Bones, at the charges of the City. And for his Accufers, they condemned Agnonides of Treason, and put him to death themselves. The other two, Epicarin and Demophilm being fled out of the City, were afterwards met with by his Son Phocus, who was revenged of them. This Phoem, as men report, was otherwise no great good man, who fancying a young Maid, which a Bawd kept, coming by chance one day into the School of Lyczum, he heard Theodorus the Atheist (to wit, that believed not there were any gods) make this Argument: If it be no fhame, faid he, to deliver a mans friend from bondage, no more shame is it to redeem his Lemman which he loveth: even fo it is all one to redeem a mans Lemman, as his friend. This young man tawinest the tortain a ferve his turn, believing that he might lawfully do it, got the young Maid he loved from the Bawd. Furthermore, this death of Phocion did also revive the lamentable death of Socrates unto the GRECIANS: formen thought that was a like hainous offence, and calamity unto the City of ATHENS.

THE LIFE OF CATO UTICAN.

Ann. Mund. 389 .

He Family and House of Cato took his first Glory and Name of his great Grand- The Parentage father Cato the Cenfor : who for his vertue (as we have declared in his Life) of Cato. was one of the famouseft and worthiest men of ROME in his time. This Cato whom we now write of, was left an Orphan by his Father and Mother, with his Brother Capio, and Porcia his Sifter. Servilia was also Cato's half Sifter by his Mothers fide. All these were brought up with their Uncle Livius Drusus, Livius Drusus at that time the greatest man of the City : for he was passing eloquent, and very Cato's Uncle. honeft, and of as great a courage befides, as any other Roman. Men report, that Cato from his childhood shewed himself both in word and countenance, and also in all his Pastimes and Recreations, very constant and stable. For he would go through with that he took upon him Cato's manto do, and would force himself above his strength; and as he could not away with flatterers, fo was ners. he rough with them that went about to threaten him. He would hardly laugh; and yet had ever a pleasant countenance. He was not cholerick, nor easie to be angered; but when the blood was up, he was hardly pacified. When he was first pur to School, he was very dull of understanding, and flow to learn: but when he had once learned it, he would never forget it, as all men elfe commonly do. For fuch as are quick of conceit, have commonly the worft memories: and contrarily, they why quick that are hard to learn, do keep that better which they have learned. For every kind of learning with have no motion and quickening of the mind. He feemed befides not to be light of credit, and that may ver good mebe some cause of his slowness in conceit. For truly he suffereth somewhat that learneth, and there-moy. of it cometh, that they that have leaft reason to resist, are those which do give lightest credit. For young men are easilier perswaded then old men, and the sick then the whole. And where a man hath least reason for his doubts, there he is soonest brought to believe any thing. This notwithstanding, it is reported, that Cato was obedient unto his School-mafter, and would do what he commanded him: howbeit he would ask him ftill the cause and reason of every thing. Indeed his Schoolmafter was very gentle, and readier to teach him, then to strike him with his fift. His name was Sar- Surpedo Cato's pedo Furthermore, when Cato was but a young boy, the People of IT ALY which were Confede- School-mafter rates of the ROMANS, fued to be made free Citizens of Rome. At that time it chanced one Fampedius Silo, a valiant Souldier, and of great estimation among the Consederates of the Ro-MANS, and a great friend besides of Drusus, to be lodged many daies at his House. He in the time falling acquainted with these young Boys, faid one day unto them: Good Boys, entreat your Uncle to speak for us, that we may be made free Citizens of Rome. Capio smiling, nodded with his head that he would. But Cato making no answer, tooked very wifely upon the strangers that lay in the House. Then Pompedius taking him aside, asked him: And thou, my pretty Boy, what fayeft thou to it? Wilt thou not pray thine Uncle, as well as thy Brother, to be good to his Guefts?

Boyes, that when Sylla made the Game of young Boys running on Horse-back, which the Ro-MANS call Troia; to appoint them before that they might be ready at the day of the Show, are having gotten all the young Boys of Noble-houses together, appointed them two Captains. Of them, the Boys took the one, because of his Mother Merella, which was the Wife of Sylla : but they would note of the other called Sexius, who was Nephew to Pompey the Great, neither would they be exercifed under him, nor follow him. Wherefore Sylla asked them, which of them they thither, and put to death. Cato being then but fourteen years of age, and perceiving that there were many heads brought which were faid to be of great men, and that every Lody fighed and mourned to feethem, he asked his Schoolmafter, how it was possible the Tyrant scaped, that some one eyes on fire with choler, he marvelled much at it, and afterwards had a very good eye unto him, left rashly he should attempt something against Sylla. When he was but a little Boy, some asked him whom he loved beft? My Brother, faid he. Then the other continuing ftill to ask him, and who length he that asked him, was weary with asking him to oft. Yea and when he was come of age alfo, Caso's sufferity hear their request. Then Pompedim taking him up in his arms, did put him out of the window, as if he would have let him have gone, and speaking more sharply to him then he did before, he cast him many times out of his arms without the window, and faid, Promife us then, or elfe I will let thee fall. But Cate did abid it a long time, and never quinched for it, nor shewed countenance of sear. Thereupon Pompedim fetting him down again, told his friends that stood by him: O what good lous constancy hap doth this Child promise one day unto ITALY, if he live? Sure if he were a man, I believe we should not have one voice of all the People on our side. Another time there were some of Cato's near Kinimen, that keeping the Feaft day of his birth, had many young Boys to supper, and amongst others this Cato. The Boys to occupy themselves till Supper was ready, gathered themselves to-gether great and small, into some private place of the House. Their play was, counterseiting pleadings before the Judges, accusing one another, and carrying them that were condemned to Prison. Amongst them a goodly young Boy was carried by a bigger Boy into a little Chamber, bound and a condemned person. The Boy perceiving he was locked up, cryed out unto Cato: who mistrusting what it was, went straight to the Chamber door, and putting them by by force that with stood him to come unto it, he took out the young Boy, and carried him very angerly with him to his own House, and all the other young Boys followed him also. So Cato had such a name among the young he then confirmed the love he bare to his Brother in his deeds. For twenty years together he never Supped without his Brother Capio, neither went he ever out of his House into the Market-place, nor into the Fields without him : but when his Brother did anoint himself with sweet oyles of perfume, he would none of that, and in all things elfe, he led a straight and hard life. So that his Brother Capio being commended of every man for his temperance, honefty, and fober life, he granted indeed, that in respect of others, he led a sober and temperate life : but when I do (faid he) compare my life with my Brother Cato's, methinks then there is no difference betwirt me and Scippim. This Scippi-111 was at that time noted and pointed at, for his fine and curious effeminate life. After that Cato was once chosen Apollo's Prieft, he went from his Brother, and took his portion of the Goods of his Father, which amounted to the fum of an hundred and twenty Talents. Then he lived more Antipater the hardly then he did before. For he fell in acquaintance with Antip ter Tyrian, a Stoick Philoso-Scolet, Gain's pher, and gave himself chiefly unto the study of Moral and Civil Philosophy, imbracing all exercise Schoolmaster. of vertue with such an earnest desire, that it seemed he was pluckt forward by some god : but above all other vertues, he loved the feverity of justice, which he would not wreft for any gift nor favour. He studied also to be eloquent, that he might speak openly before the People, because he would there should be certain warlike Forces entertained in civil Philosophy, as also in a great City. Notwithflanding, he would not exercise it before any body, neither would he ever have any man to hear him speak when he did learn to speak. For when one of his friends told him one day, that men did millike he spake so little in company : It skilleth no matter, quoth he, so they cannot reprove my life, for I will begin to speak, when I can say something worthy to be spoken. Hard by the Marketplace there was the common Palace or Town-house of the City, called Basilica Porcia, the which Porcius Cato the elder had built, in the time of his Cenforship. There the Tribunes were wont to keep their audience, and because there was a Pillar that troubled their seats, they would either have taken it away, or else have set it in some other place. That was the first cause that made Cato against his will to go into the Market-place, and to get up into the Pulpit for Orations, to speak against Bahlica Porcia them, where having given this first proof of his eloquence and noble mind, he was marvellously efteemed of. For his Oration was not like a young man, counterfeiting fineness of speech and affectation, but flout, and full of wit and vehemency: and yet in his shortness of his sentences. had fuch an excellent grace withall, that he marvelloufly delighted the hearers; and furthermore. shewing in nature a certain gravity besides, it did so please them, that he made them laugh. He had a very full and laudible voice, that might be heard of a marvellous number of People, and fuch a strong nature besides, that he never fainted, nor brake his speech : for many times he would speak a whole day together, and was never weary. So when he had obtained his Cause against the Tribunes, he returned again to keep his former great filence, and to harden his body with painfull Exercises, as to abide heat, frost and show bare-headed, and alwaies to go on foot in the Field, where his friends fee. that did accompany him rode on horseback; and sometime he would come and talk with one, sometime with another, as he went on foot by them. He had a wonderfull patience also in his sickness: for when he had any ague, he would be alone all day long, and fuffer no man to come to fee him. untill he perceived his fit was off him, and that he found he was better. When he supped with his friends and familiars, they drew lots who should choose their parts. If he chanced not to choose, his friends notwithstanding gave him the preferment to choose: but he refused it, saying, it was no reafon, fith the goddes. Vensu was against him. At the first he did not use to fit at the Table : but after he had drank one draught onely, he would straight rife. But when he came to be elder, he fate Cato's drinklong at the Table: fo that often times he would fit it out all night with his friends, till the next mor- ing. ning. But they feeking to excuse it, said, that his great business and affairs in the Commonwealth was the cause of it; for following that all the day long, having no leifure nor time to study, when night came he delighted to talk with learned men, and Philosophers at the Board. Wherefore when Memmius on a time being in company, faid, that Cato did nothing but drink all night; Gicero taking Cicero's faying his tale out of his mouth, answered him: Thou doest not add this unto it, that all the day he doth nothing but play at dice. To be short, Cato thinking that the manners and fashions of mens lives in his time were fo corrupt, and required fuch great change and alteration, that to go uprightly, he was to take a contrary course in all things: therefore when he saw the purple, red, and the lightest colours were best elteemed of, he in contrary manner desired to wear black. And many times also after dinner, he would go abroad bare-footed without shooes, and without any gown: not because he would be wondered at for any fuch strangeness, but to acquaint himself to be assamed onely of shameless and dishonest things: and to despise those which were not reproved, but by mens opinions. Furthermore, Land being left him to the value of an hundred Talents by the death of a Coufin of his that likewife was called Cato, he put it into ready Money, to lend to his friends that lacked; and without usury. And there were some of his friends also that would morgage his Land, or his Slaves. to the Chamber of the City, for their own private business: the which he himself would either give them to morgage, or else asterwards confirm the Morgage of them. Furthermore, when he was come of age to marry, having never known Woman before, he was made sure to Lepida. This Lepida had been pre-contracted unto Metellus Scipio: but afterwards the pro-contract being broken, he forfook her, fo that she was free when Cato was contracted to her. Notwithstanding, be- Cato's Matriafore Cato married her, Scipio repenting him that he had refused her, made all the means he could to ges. have her again : and so he had. Cato took it so grievously, that he thought to go to Law for her, but his friends diffwaded him from it. Then feeing no other remedy, to fatisfie his angry mind, he wrote Verses against Scipio, in the which he reviled him all he could : using the bitter taunts of Archilorus Verses, but not such impudent, lewd, and childish reproaches as be there. After that he Attilia, Cato's married Attilia, Soranus Daughter, being the first Woman he ever knew : yet not the onely Wo- Wife. man whom he did know, as is reported of Lalius, Scipio's friend, who therein was counted the hap- Lalius Marripier, because all that long time wherein he lived, he never knew other Woman but his first Wife. age. Furthermore, in the War of the Bond-men (otherwise called Spartacus War) one Gellius was chosen Prator of the Army, under whom Cato served of his own good will, for the love he bare Cato's first unto his Brother Capio, who in that Army had charge of a thousand Footmen. Now Cato could Souldier fare not as he wished, shew his valiantness and good service, because of the insufficiency of the Practor, the Bondmen. that gave ill direction. This notwithstanding, in the midst of all the riot and insolency of them in the Camp, he shewing himself a stayed man in all his doings, valiant where need was, and very wife also, all men esteemed him to be nothing inferiour unto Cato the elder. Whereupon Gellius the Prætor gave him many honours in token of his valiantness, which are given in reward of mens good fervice: howbeit Cato refused them, and faid, that he was nothing worthy of those honours. These things made him to be thought a marvellous strange man. Furthermore, when there was a Law made, forbidding all men that fued for any Office in the Commonwealth, that they should have no prompters in any of the Affemblies to blow into their ears the names of private Citizens: he alone making fuit to be Colonel of a thousand Footmen, was obedient to the Law, and committed all the private Citizens names to memory, to speak unto every one of them, and to call them by their names: fo that he was envyed even of them that did commend him. For, by how much they knew his deeds praife-worthy, by fo much more were they grieved, for that they could not follow them. So Cato being chosen Colonell of a thousand Footmen, he was sent into MA CEDON, unto Rubrim, Prætor there. Some say, that at his departure from thence, his Wife lamenting and weeping to fee him go, one Munation a friend of his faid unto her: take no thought Attilia, and leave tum.

weeping, for I promise thee I will keep thy Husband for thee. It is well said, answered Cato.

Then when they were a days Journey from Rome, Cato after Supper said unto this Munatius: Thou must look well to thy promise thou hast made Attilia, that thou wouldest keep me for her, and therefore forfake me not night nor day. Thereupon he commanded his men that from thenceforth they should prepare two beds in his Chamber, that Munatim also might lie there : who was rather pleafantly himself looked unto by Cato, then Cato by him. He had fifteen Slaves with him, two Freemen, and four of his friends which rode, and he himself went on foot fometime talling, two freemen, and four of his friends which rode, and he himself went on foot fometime talling two freemen, and four of his friends which rode, and he himself went on foot fometime talling two freemen, and four of his friends which rode, and he himself went on the Camp, where there were with one, other while with another as he went. When he came to the Camp, where there were many Legions of the ROMANS, the Prator immediately gave him charge of one of them : who thinking it small honour to him for himself onely to be valiant, sith he was but one man, he practifed to make all his Souldiers under him, like unto himfelf. The which he did not by fear and terrour, but by lenity and gentle perswasions, training and instructing them in every point what they should do: adding to his gentle instruction and perswassions, reward to those that did well, and punifament to them that offended. Whereby it was hard to judge, whether he had made them more quiet then warlike, more valiant, then just. So dreadfull they shewed themselves to their Enemies, and courteous to their friends : fearfull to do evil, and ready to win honour. Whereof followed that which Cate leaft accounted of, that is, he wan fame and good will: for his Souldiers did greatly honour and love hins, because he himself would ever first set his hand to any thing he commanded them; and because also both in his diet, in his apparel, and in any journey or pains, he was rather like unto the meanest Souldier, then any of the other Captains. In contrary manner also, in good nature, noble courage, and eloquence, he far exceeded all the other Colonels and Captains, for the true love of vertue (to wit, the defire to follow it) taketh no roots in mens minds, unless they have a fingular love and reverence unto the person, whom they desire to sollow. When Cato understood that Athenodorm, firnamed Cordylion, a Stoick Philosopher, excellently well learned, dwelt at that time in the City of PERGAMUS, being a very old man, and one that fliffy refused the friendship of Kings, Princes, and Noblemen, desirous to have him about them: to write to him, he thought it was lost labour. Wherefore having two moneths liberty by the Laws of the ROMANS, to follow his own affairs, he took Sea, and went into Asia to him, hoping he should not lose his Journey, for the great vertues he knew in him. So when he had spoken with him, and talked of divers matters together, at length he brought him from his first determination, and carried him to the Camp with him; esteeming this Victory more then all the Conquests of Lucullus or Pompey, who had conquered the most part of all the Provinces and Realms of the East parts of the World. In the mean time, whileft he lay at his charge in the Camp, being Colonel of a thousand Footmen, his Brother preparing to go into Asia, fell fick in the City of Enus, in the Countrey of THRACIA. Cato having specdy intelligence thereof, took Sea prefendly, when it was marvellous rough and boilterous, and imbarked in a little Crayer of a Merchants of THESSALY, with two of his friends, and three Bondmen onely, and did escape drowning very narrowly: and yet by good fortune arrived fafely, a little after his Brother Capio's death. He took his death more forrowfully then became a Philosopher, not onely mourning and lamenting for him, embracing the dead Corps of his Brother: but also for the exceeding charge and fumptuous Funerals which he bestowed upon him, in perfumes, sweet favours, and fumptuous filks that were burnt with his body: and furthermore, in the stately Tomb ing for his Brother Ceptio's of THRACIAN Marble which he made for him, and fer up in the Market-place of the ENIANS, Brother Ceptio's of THRACIAN Marble which he made for him, and fer up in the Market-place of the ENIANS, that coft eight Talents. Some did millike this vain charge that Cato bestowed, considering the modefty and temperance he used in all thingselse, not regarding with judgement his tender love and affection towards his Kinfmen, which was mingled in him with his feverity, and hardness, against all voluptuouinels, fear, and shamelels requests. Divers Cities, Princes and Noblemen, sent him many fundry Prefents, to honour the Funerals of his Brother Capio: howbeit he took no Money of all them, faving onely spices, and sweet savours, and such other ornaments as honoured the obsequies of the dead, and yet payed for them, unto those that brought them, as much as they were worth. Furthermore, in the Land that fell unto him, and a little Daughter of his, by the death of his Brother, notwithstanding the charge he had been at his Funerals, he did not reckon it in the partition of the Land betwirt him and his Brother Capio's Daughter. All the which things when they were folemnized, some * write notwithstanding, that he did cleanse the embers where his Brothers body had been to be meant of burnt, through a fieve or riddle, where-through they cleanse Corn, and all to get out the Gold and Silver that was molten there: but such think that their Writings should be as far from controllment as their doings. So when Cato's time of his charge was expired, they did accompany him at his departure, not onely with ordinary praifes, vows, and prayers to the gods for his health; but with embracings, tears, and marvellous lamentations of the Souldiers, which spread their garments on the ground as he went, and killing of his hands, which honour the ROMANS did but to very few of their Generals. Furthermore, Cato being determined before he returned to ROME to deal in the affairs there, to go and fee Asia, partly to be an eye witness of the manners, customes, and power of every Province as he went: and partly also to satisfie King Deiotarm request, who having been his Fathers friend, had earneftly entreated him to come and fee him, he went the journey, and uled it in this fort, First, by peep of day, he fent his Baker and Cook before, where he meant to lie that night. They coming foberly into the City or Village, inquired if there were none of Caro's friends and acquaintance there, and if they found none, then they prepared his supper in an Inne, and troubled no man; but if there were no Inne, then they went to the Governours of the Town, and prayed them to help them to lodging, and did content themselves with the first that was offered them. Oftentimes the Townsmen did not believe they were Cato's men, and made no account of them, because they rook all things fo quietly, and made no ado with the Officers. Infomuch as Cato sometime came himself, and found nothing ready for him; and when he was come, they made as small account of him, seeing him fer upon his Carriages, and speak never a word : for they took him for some mean man, and a timerous perfon. Notwithstanding, fometime he called them unto him, and told them: O poor men, learn to be more courteous to receive travelling Romans that pass by you, and look not alwaies to have Cato's to come unto you: and therefore fee that you use them with such courteste and entertainment. that they may bridle the authority they have over you: for you shall find many that will defire no better colour nor occasion by force to take from you that they would have: because you unwillingly also do When he came to Antioch, he found a great number of People divided on either fide of the ftreet, matter happed standing a row one by another very decently, the young men by themselves in fair cloaks, boys by unto Cato. themselves in seemly array, and Priests and other Officers of the City also, all in white garments, crowned with garlands. Cato thought straight they had made this folemn Procession to honour him, and fell out with his men he had fent before, because they did suffer them to make such preparation for his coming, So he made his friends light from their Horses, and go on foot to accompany him. But when they came near to the Gate of the City, the Mafter of the Ceremonies that had affembled all that company (an old man, having a rod in his hand, and a Crown on his head) came to Cato without faluting of him, and asked him onely, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come. This Demetrius a Demetrius had been one of Pompey's Slaves, and because Pompey's fame was great with all men, his fer- Slave, great vant Demetrisus also was much honoured and made of above his defert, for that he was in great credit with Pompos with Pompey. Cato's friends hearing what question the old man asked him, burst out a laughing as they went through this Procession. Cato being ashamed of it, faid no more then, but : O unfortunate City! Afterwards notwithstanding, when he told it to any body, he would laugh at it himself. But Pompey rebuked them that through ignorance had failed to honour Cato. When Cato came to the City of EPHESUS, and was coming towards Pompey to falute him, being the elder man, and of greater dignity and estimation then he, who at that time also was General of a great and puissant Army. Pompey feeing him come towards him afar off, would not tarry till he came to him, fitting in his Chair of estate, but rising up went to meet him, as one of the greatest and noblest persons of Cato honoured ROME; and taking him by the hand, after he had embraced and welcomed him, he presently fell in Asia. praise of his vertue before his face, and afterwards also commended him in his absence, when he was gone from him. Whereupon every man after that had him in great veneration for those things which before they despised him in, when they considered better of his noble and courteous mind. For men that faw Pompey's entertainment towards him, knew well enough that Cato was a man which he rather reverenced, and for a kind of duty observed, more then for any love he bare him: and they noted further, that he honoured him greatly while he was with him, but yet that he was glad when Cato went from him. For he fought to keep back all the young Gentlemen of ROME that went to fee Pompey rather him, and defired them to remain with him: but for Cato, he was nothing defirous of his company, then loved him, for that in his presence he thought he could not command as he would, and therefore was willing to let him go, recommending his Wife and his Children to him, the which he never did before unto any other ROMAN that returned to ROME: howbeit indeed Cato was partly allied unto him. After that time, all the Cities whereby he paffed, devifed (in emulation one of the other) which of them should honour him most, and made him great Feasts and Banquets : in the which he prayed his friends to have an eye to him, left unawares he should prove Curio's words true. For Curio sometime being his friend, and a familiar of his, milliking notwithstanding his severity, asked Cato if he would go fee Asia, when his charge were expired. Cato answered again, that it was his full determination. O well faid, quoth Curio, I hope then thou wilt return more pleasant and civill. And these were Curio's words. Furthermore, Deiotarus King of GALATIA, being a very old man, fent for Cato to come into his Countrey, to recommend his Sons and House unto him: who when he arrived Cato's Tourney there, had great rich Prefents of all forts offered him by the King, entreating him all he could to take unto King them. This to much milliked and angred Cato, that he coming thither in the evening, (after he had Deiotarus, and tarried there one whole day onely) the next morning he went his way from thence at the third hour. his abitine from gifts. Howbeit he had not gone one days journey, but he found greater gifts that tarried him, with Deiotarm Letters, at the City of PESSINUNTA: in the which he instantly requested him to take them, or at the leaft if he would refuse them himself, that then he would let them be divided amongst his friends, fith every way they did deserve it, but specially for his lake, for that his goods also were not fo great, as could content all his friends. But Cato would not fuffer them to take any jot of it more then before, although he faw well enough, that there were fome of them fo tender-hearted, that they complained of him, for that he would not suffer them to take any of it. For he told them, that otherwise corruption and bribery could lack no honest colour to take: and for his friends, they should alwaies have part with him of that which was his own justly. So he returned King Deio-tarm Presents back again. Now when he was ready to imbark, to pass over the Sea again unto

BRUNDUSTUM, some of his friends perswaded him, that it was better to put the ashes of his Brother

Capio's bones into another Ship. But he answered them, that he would rather lose his own life, then to leave his Brothers reliques. Thereupon he prefently hoised fail, and it is reported that he paffed over in great danger, where other Ships arrived very fafely. When he was returned unto ROME, he was always either talking Philosophy with Athenodorus the Philosopher, or else in the Marketplace, to pleasure his friends. When his turn came that he was to make suit to be Quartor, he would never fue for it, before he had first diligently perused all the Ordinances touching the Office of Quartor, and that he had particularly made enquiry of men of greatest experience, to know what the Authority of the Office was. So he no fooner came to his Office, but he prefently made great alteration amongst the Clearks and Officers of the Treasury: who having the Laws and Records in their hands, and exercifing the Office commonly under young men which were choien Treasurers (who for their ignorance and lack of experience, stood rather in need of Masters to teach them, then that they were able to correct others) they themselves were the Officers and controlled them. But Caso not contenting himself with the name and honour of the thing, did throughly understand what the Clearks and Registers should be, and therefore would have them to be as they ought to be, Ministers under the Quzitors onely ; telling them of their bribery and corruption which they committed, and reformed them also that faultred through ignorance. And when he saw some insolent and impudent persons, that curried savour with other Treasurers to be against him, he caused the chiefest of them to be condemned for falshood, in making division betwirt two co-heirs; and conse-Catalar Luits quently turned him clear out of his Office, for ever doing any thing there any more. He accused another allo for forging of a Will, whom Catulus Lustratius defending, being then Cenfor, and a man of great honour for the dignity of his Office, but chiefly for his vertue, being counted the justest man one of them in his time at ROME, and of those also that highly commended Cato, was conversant with him for his honest life; when he perceived that he could not defend this man by no reason, he prayed him at his request that they would pardon him. But Cato would in no wife grant it. But Catulus carneftly entreating still for him, then Cato plainly faid unto him: It is shame for thee (Catalus) thou that art Centor, and should reform all our lives, thus to forget the duty of thine Office, to please our Ministers. Catulus looking at Cato when he had spoken, as though he would answer him: whether it were for shame or anger, he went his way, and faid never a word more. Yet was not the party condemned, though there was one voice more that did condean then clear him, because of the absence of one of the Judges. For Marcus Lollius, one of Cato's Colleagues in the Quartorship, being sick at that time, and absent, Catalus sent unto him, to pray him to come and help the poor man. Thereupon Lollius being brought thither in a Litter, after judgement given, gave his last voice, which absolutely cleared him. Cato, this notwithstanding, would never use him as a Cleark, nor pay him his Wages, nor would count of Lolling voice among others. Thus having pulled down the pride and stomach of the Clearks, and brought them unto reason, in short time he had all the Tables and Records at his commandment, and made the Treasure-Chamber as honourable as the Senate it felf: fo that every man thought, and said, that Cate made the Cate had added unto the Quartership the dignity of the Consulfhip. For finding divers men indebted before unto the Commonwealth, and the Commonwealth also unto divers men, he set down such an order, that neither the Commonwealth should be deceived by any man, nor that any man also should have wrong of it. For being rough with them that were indebted to the Chamber, he compelled them to pay their debt, and willingly and quickly also paid them to whom the Chamber ought any thing: fo that the People were ashamed to fee some pay which never thought to have paid any thing, and on the contrary part also others paid, which never looked to have hid any part of their debts paid them. Furthermore, divers men did before make false Bills of their debts, and brought them to to be put into the Coffer of the Quartors; and many times also his Predecessors were wont of favour and friendship to receive false Messages. But whilst he was Quastor, he never did pass any matter to lightly. For one day, he being doubtfull of a Meffage that was fent unto him, to know whether it was true or no: albeit divers men did witness it was true, yet would he not believe it, untill fuch time as the Confuls themselves came in their own persons to justifie it was true, and to swear, that it was so ordained. Now there were many unto whom Lucius Sylla (being Dictator) had appointed in his fecond Proscription twelve thousand filver Drachma's for every Citizen and Out-law which they had flain with their own hands. These men, though every man did hate venged of Syl- them, and knew them to be wicked People and cruell murderers, yet no man durft offer to be revenged of them. Cato called these men in suit, as those that did wrongfully detain the Money of the common Treasure, and compelled them to repay it back again: sharply reproving (and justly) the wicked devillish fact they had committed. So when they had repayed the Money, they were straight accused by others for murder; and as if they had been wrongfully condemned by one judgement, they were brought into another, to the great joy of all the ROMANS, who then thought they faw all the Tyranny of that time rooted out, and Sylla himself punished. Besides all this, Cato's continual pains and care of the Treasure, was so well thought of and liked of the People as could be. For he was always the first that came to the Cossers of the Treasurers, and also the last that went from thence, and was never weary of any pains. Furthermore, he never missed to be at any Affembly of the People, or Senate, fearing and being always carefull, left lightly by fayour, any Money due to the Commonwealth should be forgiven, or else that they should abare the Rent of the Farmers, or that they should give no Money but to them that had justly deserved it. Thus having rid all Acculers, and also filled the Coffers with Treasure, he made men see that the Commonwealth might be rich without oppreffing of any man. Indeed at his first coming into the Office, his Colleagues and Companions found him marvellous troublesome and tedious, for that they thought him too rough and fevere: howbeit they all loved him in the end; because he onely withflood the complaints and cryes of all men against them (which complained that they would not for any mans respect or favour let go the Money of the common Treasure) and was contented his Companions should excuse themselves unto their friends that were importunate, and lay the fault upon him, faying, that it was impossible for them to bring Cato unto it. The last day that he went out of his Office, being very honourably brought home to his house by the People. it was told him that Marcellus being in the Treasure-chamber, was attempted and environed with many of his friends, and men of great authority, that were earneftly in hand with him to record a certain fum of Money, as a thing that had been due by the Common-wealth. This Marcellus had been Cato's friend even from their Child-hood, and whileft Cato was in Office, he did orderly execute his Office with him : but when he was left alone, he was of fogentle a nature, that he would easily be entreated, and was as much ashamed to deny any man, as he was also over-ready to grant every man that he required. Cato straight returned back upon it, and finding that Marcellus had yielded unto their importunacy, and recorded the Gift, he caused the Books to be brought unto him, and did raze it out before his face, Marcellus speaking never a word to the contrary. After that, Marcellus brought Cato home, and never once repined against that he had done, neither then, nor at any time after, but continued still in friendship with him, as he had done before. But now though Cato was out of his Office of Quæftor, he was not without Spials of his men in the Treafure- Cato's care and chamber, who marked alwaies, and wrote what was done and paffed in the Treasury. And Cato integrity to himfeli, having bought the Books of Accompt for the fum of five Talents, containing the re-the Commonvenew of the whole State of the Common-wealth, from Sylla's time untill the very year of his Qua-wealth. storship: he ever had them about him, and was the first man that came to the Senate, and the lastthat went out of it. There many times the Senators tarrying long before they came, he went and fate down in a corner by himfelf, and read closely the Book he had under his Gown, clapping his Gown before it, and would never be out of the City on that day when he knew the Senate should affemble. After that, Pompey and his Conforts perceiving that it was unpossible to compell Cato. and much less to win or corrupt him, to favour their unjust doings, they fought what means they could to keep him from coming to the Senate, and defending certain of his friends Caules, and to occupits him some other ways about matters of Arbitrement. they heard of his intent, why he made fuit for the Tribuneship, all his friends and Noble-men straight took part with him, confirmed his determination, and encouraged him to go on withall, for that he did it rather to ferve the Common-wealth then his own turn; confidering that where many times before he might (without refiftance or deniall) have obtained the fame, the State being toward no trouble, he then would never fue for it, but now that he faw it in danger, where he was to fight for the Common-wealth, and the Protection of her liberty. It is reported that there were fuch a number of People about him to favour his fuit, that he was like to have been stifled among them, and thought he should never have come to the Market-place, for the press of People that fwarmed about him. Thus when he was chosen Tribune with Metelliss and others, he perceived how they bought and fold the voices of the People when the Confuls were chosen : whereupon he made an Oration, and sharply took them up for this detestable Merchandize; and after his Oration ended, folemnly protested by Oath, that he would accuse him, and bewray his Name which had given money to be chofen Confull. Howbeit he spake nothing of Syllansus, whose Sifter Servilia he had married: but he flatly accused Lucina Murana, that had obtained to be Confull with Syllansa, by means of his Money. Now a Law being provided, that the party accused might have a Keeper or Spiall to follow the Accuser, to see what he would accuse the party with, that he might the better be able to defend himself, knowing what should be objected against him : Murana baving one for him to wait upon Cato, to confider throughly what course he took, when he saw that he went not maliciously to work, but took a plain common way of a just Accuser, he had so great confidence in Cato's upright mind and integrity, that not regarding the narrow fifting of him otherwise, he did one day ask him himself in the Market-place (or at home in his own house) if that day he were determined to profecute any matter against him touching his Accusation. If Cato answered that he did not, then he went his way, and simply believed him. When the day came indeed that his Cause was to be heard and pleaded unto, Cicero being Confull that year, defending Murana, played to pleasantly with the Stoick Philosophers, and their strange Opinions, that he made all the Judges laugh: infomuch as Cato himfelf fmiling at him, told them that were by him : See, we have a pleatant Confull that makes men laugh thus, So Murana being discharged by this judgement, did never after malice Cato for that, but so long as he remained Confull, he was alwaies ruled by his Counsell in all his Affairs, and continued ever to lionour him, following his Counfell in all things touching his Office. Hereof Cato himself was cause, who was never rough nor terrible, but in matters of Counsell, and in his Orations before the People, for the maintenance onely of equity and justice : for otherwife he was very civill and courteous to all men. But before he entred into his Tribunethip, Cicero being yet Confull, he did help him in many things touching his Office, but specially in bringing Casilines conspiracy to good end which was a noble Act done of him. For Catiline did practife a generall commotion and stirr in the Common-wealth, to overthrow the whole State of Roma, by civil discord within Rome, and open Wars abroad : who being discovered and overcome by Cicero, be was driven in the end to flie ROME. But Lemulus, Cethegus, and many other of the accomplices of this conspiracy; blamed Catiline for his faint and cowardly proceeding in it. For their parts, they had determined to burn the whole City of ROME, and to put all the Empire thereof in aproar, by strange Wars, and rebellious forrein Nations and Provinces. Howbeit this Treason being discovered, as appeareth more largely in the life of Cicero, the matter was referred unto the judgement of the Seriate, to determine what was to be done therein. Syllania being the first who was asked his Opinion therein faid, that he thought it good they should fuffer cruell pains, and afterbim alfo, all thought faid the like untill, it came to Cufar. Cefar being an excellent spoken man, and that rather defined to nourith then to quench any fuch fittrs or feditions in the Common-wealth, being fit for his purpole Cate's Oration long determined of, made an Oration full of fweet pleafant words declaring unvertient, that so put fuch men as they to death without lawfull condemnation, be thought it altogether unreasonable, and coucaing cartrather that they should do better to keep them in Prison. This Oration of Geler to altered all the rest of the Senators minds, for that they were afraid of the People, that Syllas w felf mended his Opinion again, and faid, that he meant not they thould put them to death, but keep them fait in Prifon; because that to be a Prisoner, welche greatestipain a RONAN Catizen dould shide... Thus the Sanators minds being fo fuddenly changed, and bena to a more favourable fentences, Gasorising up to fay his Opinion, began very angenty with marvellous Eloquence, gricontilly to reprove Syllenae for changing his mind, and, that ply to take up Cafar, that sinder a popular femblance, and mask of dweet fugred words, he fought under-hand to defirry the Continuon-wealth, and also to terraine and make the Schate afraid : where he himself (hould have been sized, and think himself happy of the could scape from being suspected, giving fauch apparent cause of suspinion as he did, going about so openly to take the Enemies and Traitors of the Common wealth our of the hards of inflice, feating to have no sury nor compassion of his natural City, of such Nobility, and Fame, being esca brough in manner to urter deftruction; buil emben to lamenwebe fortime of whole swicked men, that it was pitty they were ever born, and whole death professed Roses infrant a thouland Murches, and Mitchel Of all the Orations that ever Care made, that colely was kepe is for Cicerosthe Confulk, that they had differend divers Pen-men in fundry places of the Senate-house, which baddnarvellous (withhouse and had further taughs thom how to make busef blittes and in Bridgements, implicibit few Lines the wed many words. ners, as the very pattern and impression of his mind: it is reported, that when Caso that day was fo hot and vehement against Cefar, that all the Senate could but look at them, to hear them both, a Letter was delivered Cefar, fent him into the House. Cate began presently to suspect it. and so earneftly misliked of it, that many of the Senators being offended, commanded his Letter should be seen and read openly. Casar thereupon reached his Letter unto Cato, that sate not far from him. When Cate had read it, and found that it was a Love-letter, which his Sifter Servilla. had written unto Cafar, whom she loved, and had known, he cast it again to Cafar, and faid. There drunkard. After that he went on again with his matter, which he had begun before. In Caso unfortufine, it feemeth that Cato was very unfortunate in his Wives : for this Servilia, as we have faid, nate in his had an ill Name by Cefar. And the other Servilia also, which was his Sister, was worse defamed: for the being married unto Lucullin, one of the greatest men of ROME, by whom the had a Son, was in the end put away from him, for her naughty life. But worft of all, his own Wife Attilia also was not altogether clear without suspition : for though he had two Sons by her, yet he was driven to be divorced from her, she was so naught and common. After that, he married Martia, the Daughter of Philip, which by report feemed to be a very honest Gentlewoman. It is she that is so Maria Care's famous among the ROMANES. For in the life of Caro, this place (as a Fable or Comedy) is dif-Wife. putable, and hard to be judged. For thus it was, as Thrafeas writeth, who referreth all to the report and credit of one Munatius, Cato's very familiar friend. Among many that loved Cato's Vertues and had them in admiration, some of them did shew more what he was, then other some did : amonest the which was 2. Horsensim a man of great honesty and authority. He desiring not onely to be Caro's friend and familiar, but also joyn with him in alliance, and by affinity to make both their Houses one, was not abashed to move him to let him have his Daughter Porcia in marriage (which was Bibulus Wife, and had brought him two Children) that he might also cast abroad the Seed of goodly Children, in that pleafant tertile ground. And though to men this might feem a strange mind and defire, yet that in respect of nature, it was both honest and profitable to the Commonwealth, not to fuffer a young Woman in the prime of her youth to lose the fruit of her Womb, being apt to bear Children : nor also that he should impoverish the Son-in-law with more Children then one house needed. And further, that communicating Women in this fort from one to another, specially being bestowed upon worthy and vertuous men, that Vertue thereby should be in- Platoes sellowcreased the more, being so dispersed in divers Families; and the City likewise should be the stronger, ship and comby making alliances in this fort together. And if it be fo, quoth he, that Bibulus do love his Wife munity of Wo-To dearly, that he will not depart from her altogether, then that he would restore her to him again men. when he had a Child by her, that thereby he might be the more bound in friendship to him, by means of this communication of Children with Bibulus felf, and with him. Cate answered him. that he loved Hortenfus well, and liked of his alliance, howbeit that he marvelled he would speak to him to let him have his Daughter to get Children of, fith he knew that she was married to another. Then Hortenfius altering his tale, stuck not to tell him his mind plainly, and to defire his Wife of him, the which was yet a young Woman, and Cato had Children enough. But a man cannot tell whether Hortensius made his suite, because he saw (ato made no reckoning of Martia, for that she was then with Child by him. In fine, Caro feeing the earnest desire of Hortensius he did not deny him her, but told him, that he must also get Philips good will, the Father of Martia. He knowing that Cato had granted his good will, would not therefore let him have his Daughter before that Cato himself by his presence did confirm the contract and marriage with him. Though these things were done long after, yet having occasion to talk of Cato's Wives, I thought it not amis to anticipate the time. Now Lentulus and his Conforts of Catilines conspiracy being put to death, Celar to cloak the Accufations wherewith Cato charged him in open Senate, did put himself into the Peoples hands; and gathering the rake-hels and feditious persons together, which sought to set all at fix Cato personaded and feven, he did further encourage them in their mischievous intent and practiles. Whereupon, Corn to be Cato fearing leaft such a rabble of People should put all the Common-wealth in uproar and danger, distributed unhe perswaded the Senate to win the poor needy People that had nothing, by distributing Corn to the People. amongst them, the which was done : and the charge thereof amounted yearly unto twelve hundred and fifty Talents. This liberality did manifeftly drink up and quench all those troubles which they stood in fear of. But on the other side, Metellus entring into his Tribuneship, made certain feditious Orations and Affemblies, and preferred a Law to the People, that Pompey the Great should presently be called into ITALY with his Army, that he should keep the City by his coming from the present danger of Carilines conspiracy. These were but words spoken for fashions sake, into Pompeys hands. Hereupon the Senate affembled, wherein Cato at his first coming spake somewhat gently, and not too vehemently against Metellus, as his manner was to be strarp unto them that were against him : but modestly perswaded him, and sell to intreat him in the end, and highly to extoll his house, for that they had alwaies taken part with the Senate and Nobility. But Mezellus therewith took such pride and conceit of himself, that he began to despise Caro, thinking he had used that mildness, as though he had been afraid of him : informech as he gave out Cato refilteth would never fuffer Pompey to come into ROME with his Army. The Senate hearing them both, thought neither of both well in their wits, but that Metellus doings was a fury, which proceeding of a cancred stomach and extreme malice, would put all in hazard : and that which Cato did, was a ravishment and extaste of his Vertue, that made him beside himself, contending for justice and equity. When the day came that this Law should pass by voyces of the People, Metellus failed not to be in the Market-place with a world of Strangers, Slaves, and Fencers, armed, and fet in Battell-ray, besides a number of the common People that were desirous to see Pompeys return, hopeing after change. Besides all those, Cefar then being Prætor, gave aid likewise with his men, in the behalf of Metellus. On the contrary part also, the Noble-men and Senators of the City were as angry as Caro, and faid, it was a horrible shame : howbeit they were his friends, rather in millikeing the matter, then in defending the Common-wealth. Whereupon, all his friends at home, and his whole Family, were marvellously perplexed and forrowfull, that they both refused their Meat, and also could take no rest in the night for sear of Cato. But he, as one without sear, having a good heart with him, did comfort his People, and bade them not forrow for him : and after he had supped (as he commonly used to do) he went to bed, and slept foundly all night, till the morning that Minutius Thermus, his Colleague and fellow Tribune, came and called him. So they both went together into the Market-place, accompanied with a very few after them. Whereupon divers of their friends came and met them by the way, and bade them take heed unto themselves. When they were come into the Market-place, and that Cato saw the Temple of Cassor and Pollux full of armed men, and the degrees or fteps kept by Sword-players and Fencers, and Metellus on the top of them fet by Cofar: turning to his friends, he faid, See I pray you the Coward there, what a number of armed men he hath gotten together, against one man naked and unarmed. Therewithall he straight went forward with his Companion Thermus unto that place, and they that kept the degrees, opened of themselves to let him pass, but they would let no other go up but himself; but Cato with much ado, taking Minutius by the hand, got him up with him; and when he was come up, he fet him down betwixt Metellus and Cafar, to keep them afunder, that they should not whifper one in anothers ear. Neither of them both could tell what to fay to him : whereupon the Noble-men that confidered Caro's countenance and boldness, wondering to see it, drew near, and by their cries willed him not to be afraid, but encouraged one another to flick by him that flood for defence of their liberty. So, there was a Servant that took the written Law in his hand, and would have read it to the People, but Cate would not let him. Then Metellus took it himself in his hands to read it, but Cato also snatched it out of his hands. Metellus notwithstanding, having it perfect without book, would needs declare the effect of it by heart. But Thermus clapped his hand before his mouth to keep him that he should not speak. Metellus feeing these two men bent by all means to keep this Law from passing, and that the People did lean to their fide, he beckned to his men to go for the armed men which were at home in his house, that they should come with terrour and cries to make them afraid, and so they did. The People thereupon were dispersed here and there for fear, that Cato was left alone in the Market-place, and they threw Stones at him from beneath. But then Murana, who had before accused Cato for buying of the Consulship, forsook him not in that danger, but holding his long Gown before him, cried out unto them beneath that threw at Cato, to,leave. So fhewing him the danger he had brought himself into, holding him still by the Armes, he brought him into the Temple of Cafter and Pollux. Then Metellus feeing the Pulpit for Orations voided, and his Enemies flying out of the Market-place, he thought he had won the Goal : whereupon commanding his Souldiers to depart, then proceeding gently, he attempted to pass this Law. But his Enemies that fled for fear, being gathered again together in the Market-place, began afresh to cry out against Metellus, with greater boldness and courage then before. Then Metellus and his Adherents being afraid and amazed, doubting that their Enemies had gotten. Weapons, and were provided, and therefore were the bolder, they fled, and all of them left the Pulpit for Orations. So when Metellus and his Company were gone, Cato came again to the Pulpit for Orations, and greatly commended the People for the good will they had shewed, and perswaded them to continue in their well-doing. Whereupon the common people were then against Metellus; and the Senate also being affembled gave order, that Caro should have better aid then he had before, and that by all means possible they should result Metellus Law, which onely tended to move Sedition and civill War in ROME. For Merellus felf, he was yet vehemently bent to follow his attempt and Enterprize; but perceiving that his friends were marvelloufly afraid of Cato, as a man whom they thought invinfible, he fuddainly came into the Market-place, and affembling the People, told them many reasons in his Oration, supposing to bring Caroin difference with the People : and amongst other things he faid, that he would withdraw himself out of this tyrannical power of Cato's, and his configuracy against Pompey, the which peradventure the City before it were long should repent, for that they had shamed and defaced so Noble a man. After that he prefently departed ROME, and went into ASIA to inform Pampey of all this matter. Cats on the other fide, was greatly effected for his doings, for that he had freed the Common-wealth from the great trouble of such a foolish Tribune, and by overthrowing. Metellus, he had also supprefied the power of Pompey. But yet he was much more commended, when he was against the Senate, who would have noted Metellus of Infamy, and deprived him of his Office, the which be would not fuffer them to do. The common People thought him of a courteous and gentle nature, because he would not tread his Enemy under his foot when he had the upper hand of him. nor be revenged of him when he had overcome him; but wife men judged it otherwife, that it was wisely done of him not to provoke Pompey. About this time returned Lucultus from the War of the which it seemed that Pompey had taken the honour and glory from him for the ending of it, and was likely allo to have been put from his honour of Triumph, for that Caisa Memmis was his Adversary, who laid many Accusations against him before the People, rather to please Pompey, then for any malice he had towards him. But Cato, both for that Lucullus was his Brother-in-law. and Gato's doings had married his own Sifter Servilia, as also for that he saw they did him wrong, refifted this Memmius, and defended many Acculations against him. So that in the end, though Memmins had laboured that Cato should be deprived of his Office, as from a tyrannical power, yet Cato compelled Memmius at the last to leave off his Acculations, and to profeture Law no more against him. Thus Lucullus having obtained honour of Triumph, did embrace Cate's friendship more then before, taking him for a fure Bulwark and defence against the power of Pompey the Great. But Pompey shortly after returning home again, with great honour from his Conquetts, trufting that for respect of his welcom he should be denied nothing at the Peoples hands when he came home, sent before unto the Senate; to pray them for his fake to defer the Election of the Confuls, until he came to ROME, that being prefent he might favour Pifees fuit, fuing to be Conful. Thereunto the most part of the Senate gave their confent, but Caro on the other fide was against it, not that the deferring of time was a matter of Caro relisted fuch Importance, but to cut all hope from Pompey to go about to attempt any new devices : infomuch Pompey. that he made the Senate change opinion again, and Pompey's Request was denied. Pompey being mar-velloully troubled withall, and perceiving that Cato would be against him in all things, if he found not some device to win him, he sent for his friend Munatius, by his means to demand Cato's two Neeces of him which were marriagable; the eldeft for himself, and the youngest for his Son. Others say also, that they were not his Neeces, but his own Daughters, Munatius did Pompey's Melfage, and brake the matter unto him, his Wife, and his Sifters, who marvellously defired Pompey's alliance, for the greatnels and dignity of his Person. But Cato making no further delay, without other deliberation, as not Cato refuseth greatly pleased with the motion, answered him presently: Munasius, go thy way unto Pompey again, alliance with and tell him that Cato is not to be won by Women, though otherwise I millike not of his friendship: and withall, that to long as he shall deal uprightly in all Causes, and none otherwise, he shall find him more affuredly his friend, then by any alliance of marriage : and yet, that to fatisfie Pompey's pleafure and will against his Countrey, he will never give him such Pledges. The Women and his friends at that time were angry with his answer and refulal, faying it was too stately and uncourreous. Burafterwards it chanced, that Pompey fuing to have one of his friends made Conful, he fent a great Sum of Money to bribe the Voyces of the people, which liberality was noted, and spoken of, becambe the Money was told in Pompey's Garden. Then did Cato tell the Women of his house, That if he had now been bound by alliance of Marriage unto Pompey, he should then have been driven to have been partaker of Pompey's shamefull Acts. When they heard what he had told them, they all confessed then that he was wifer to refuse such Alliance, then they were that wished and defired it. And yet, if men should judge of Wildom, by the success and event of things: I must needs say, that Caro was in great fault for refuting of this Alliance. For thereby he was the cause of Pompey's marching with Cafar, who joyning both their powers together, was the whole destruction of the Empire of Rome : whereas peradventure it had not fallen out fo, if Caro fearing Pompey's light faults, had not caused him by increasing his power with another, to commit far greater faults. Howbeit those things were yet to come. Furthermore, Pompey being at jar with Lucullus, touching certain Ordinances which he had made in the Realm of PONTUS, because both the one and the other would have their Ordinances to take place: Caro favoured Lucullus, who had open wrong. Pompey therefore feeing that he was the weaker in the Senate, took part with the people, and put forth the Law for dividing of the Lands a- Lex Agraries mongst the Souldiers. But Caro stouty resisting that Law again, the put it by, and made Pompey thereby in a rage to acquaint himself with Publins Clodins, the most sedimus and boldest person of all the Tribunes, and besides that, made alliance even at that time with Cafar, whereof Cato himself was the onely Authour. Cafar returning out of SPAIN from his Pretorfhip, required the honour of Triumph, and withall made fuit to be Conful. But being a Law to the contrary, that they that fued to be Confuls should be present themselves in the City, and such also as defired honour of Triumph. should be without the City: he earnestly required the Senate, that he might sue for the Confulship by his friends. The most part of the Senate were willing unto it, but Cate was flatly against it. He perceiving that the other Senatours were willing to gratifie Cafar, when it came to him to deliver his opinion, he spent all the whole day in his Oration, and by his policy prevented the Senate; that they could not it controlled any thing. Then Cafar letting fall his Triumph, made fuit to be Coisful; and entring the City, joyned friendship with Pompey. Hereupon he was chosen Consul; and immediately after married his Daughter Julia unto Pompey : and to having made in manner a confpiracy against the Com- The alliance mon-wealth between shemiclyes, Cefar preferred the Law Agraria, for diffributing the Lands unto and friendfully the Cuizens, and Primprisms preferr to maintain the publication thereof: Linealist and Cicero on the beautiful and Primer. other lide taking part with Bibalus the other Conful, did what they could against it, but specially and Pompey. Wherefore, Cafar and his frends fearing fo great Enemies, fell to open force. For to begin withall, as the Conful Bibulus was going to the Market-place, there was a Basket of Dung poured upon his head : and furthermore , the Officers Rods were broken in their hands, which they carried before him. In fine, Darts were thrown at them out of every corner, and many of them being hurr, they all at length were driven to fly, and leave the Market-place. But Cato he came laft of all, keeping his wonted place, and often cast back his head, and cursed such Citizens. So, they did not onely pass this Law Agraria by voyces of the People, but furthermore they added to it: that the Senate should be sworn to stablish that Law, and be bound to defend the same (if any attempted the alteration thereof) upon great Penalties and Fines to be fet on his head, that should refuse the Oath, All the other Senators swore against their wills, remembring the example of the mischief that chanced unto the old Metellu, who was banished out of ITALY, because he would not swear to such a like Law. Whereupon, the Women that were in Cato's house, befought him with the tears in their eyes, that he would yeeld and take the Oath : and fo did also divers of his friends besides. Howbett, he that most inforced and brought Cato to swear, was sicero the Oratour : who perswaded him, that Cherr by his or man more into the would be thought unreasonable, that being but one man, he should seem to mislike Oration brake personnel in which all other had thought meet and reasonable : and that it were a sond part of him wilfully to put himfelf in fo great a danger, thinking to hinder a matter already past remedy. But yet that befides all this, a great inconvenience would happen, if he forfook his Countrey (for whofe fakehedid all thefe things) and left it a Prey unto them, which fought the utter subversion of the same, as if he were glad to be rid from the trouble of detending the Common-wealth. For (faid he) though Cato have no need of ROME, yet ROME hath need of Cato, and so have all his friends: of the which, Cicero faid he was the chief, and was most maliced of Publim Clodim the Tribune, who fought to drive him out of the Countrey. It is faid that Cato, being won by these like words and perswasions at home, and openly in the Market-place, they fo loftened him, that he came to take his Oath last of all men, but one Phaonim, a very friend of his. Cafar,'s heart being then lifted up, for that he had brought his purpose to gas : he began now to prefer another Law, to divide all CAMPANIA, and the Countryy called TERRA DI LAVORO (the Land of Labour) unto the poor needy People of ROME, and no man stood against him but Cato. Whereupon Cafar made his Officers to take him from the Pulpit for Orations, to carry him to Prifon. All this made not Cato ftoop, nor leave his frank speech, but as he went he still spake against this Edict, and perswaded the People to beware of them that preferred Cato commitfuch Laws. All the Senate, and the best fort of Citizens followed Cato with heavy hearts, shewing ted to Prifon by their filence that they were offended and angry for the Injury they did unto him, being fo worthy a man. Infomuch as Cafar's felf perceived that the People were offended with it, and yet of ambition and fromach, he looked always when Cato would have appealed unto the People. So when he faw that Cato meant no such matter, at length overcome with shame and dishonour, he himself procured one of the Tribunes to take Cato from the Sergeants. In fine, all Cafar's practile rended to this end, that when he had won the Peoples favour by fuch Laws: they should then grant him the Government of all the GAULS (as well on this fide, as beyond the Mountains) and all ILLYRIA, with an Army of four Legions, for the space of five years, notwithstanding that Caso told the People before, that they themselves with their own voyces did set up a Tyrant, that one day would cut P. Clodius Tritheir throats. They did also choose Publisu Cloding Tribune of the People, which was of a noble house: a thing directly contrary to the Law. But this Glodisu had promifed them, so that they would bune of the help him to banish Cicero out of Rome, to do all that he could for them. Furthermore, they made The crafty Calphorniu Pife (Cafar's Wives Father) and Galbiniu Paulus (aman wholly as Pompey's comjuggling be-twixt Cafar mandment, as they write which knew his Life and Manners) Confuls the next year following. Now, and Pompey notwithflanding they had the Rule of the Common-wealth in their own hands, and that they had won with P. Clopart of the City with Bribes, and the other part also with fear : yet they were both afraid of Cato. when they confidered what trouble they had to overcome him which they did very hardly nowife flanding, and to their great fhame, being driven one force, and yet thought they should never have done it. Furthermore, Clodism unerly despaired that the could possibly bandh Cicera is long as Catowis there. So devising wayshow to do it, when he had taken possession of his Office, the fehr for Care, and began to tell him, That he thought him the boneficth and justest man of ROM B, and this the was ready to perform it to him by deed. For, where many made fuit unto him to be fent into Ovienus, to make War with King Realowy: he thought none fo wouthy as himielf, and therefore for the good will be bore him, he was very willing to offer him that pleafure. Cate firnight cryed out with open mouth that this was a device to intrap him, not to pleafure him. Then Clodius proudly and feetely uniwered him.

Well, feeing thou wile not go with good will, thou shalego then against thy will a and so he did. For fuch dishonour, such extream pains, and such passing great Gifts and Presents, as he should throw away, to satisfie the covetousness of the Rulers at Rome, the which was so unsatiable, that if all the Realm of ÆGYPT were converted into Silver to give among them, it would scarce suffice them: in respect whereof, he counselled him to return back with his Navy, and to reconcile himself again with his Subjects, offering himfelf also to go with him, to help to make this Peace. Then Prolomy coming to himself, and repenting him of his folly, knowing that Case told him truly, and wisely, he determined to follow his counsel, had not his friends turned his mind to the contrary. So when Ptolomy came to ROME, and was driven to wait at the Gates of the Magistrates that were in Authority, he fighed then, and repented his folly, for that he had not onely despited the counsel of a wife man, but rather the Oracle of a god. Furthermore, the other Ptolomy that was in Cy-PRUS, (a happy turn for Cato) poyfoned himfelf. Cato being also informed that he left a wonderfull fum of Money behind him, he determined to go himself unto BYZANTIUM, and sent his Nephew Brutus into Cyprus, because he durft not trust Canidius so far. Then having restored the banished menunto the Peoples favour again, setting agreement betwixt them, he returned into CYPRUS. Therehe found a marvellous great Treasure, and Plate both of Gold and Silver, Tables, precious Stones, Hangings, and Purple Silks, all the which he was to make ready Money of. There Gaso's diligence he took great care and pains to raife all things to the utmost and dearest prices that could be, and he in Cyprus. himself was present at all, to keep the reckoning of the last Peny. Wherefore, to bring this to pass, he would not stand to the common use of the sale of the Cryer, but suspected them all, both Criers, Praisers, and his own Friends, and therefore talked himself with the Praisers, and made them fet high Prifes upon every thing that was to be fold. And thus were the most part of their Goods fold and carried away, at the dearest Prises. This did marvellously offend the most part of his Friends, when they saw that he did mistrust them : but Munatim specially, his dearest Friend, took it so inwardly, that he thought never to be friends with him again. Insomuch as in the Book Cafar wrote against Cato, in this place he forceth most the acculation against him. Munatius The envy benotwithstanding writeth, That he was not angry fo much with Caro for that hemistrusted him, but twist Caso and for a certain difdain he had himself of Cato, and for the emutation betwirt him, and Canidius. Munatius. For Munating wrote a Book of Caro's Deeds and Sayings, whom Thrafeas in his History chiefly followed. In this Book he sheweth that he came late into Cypkus, and wasvery ill lodged. And furthermore also, that when he would have come into Cato's House, they kept him out of the Gates, for that Catowas busic, doing fomething with Canidius. He modeftly complaining of it unto Cato, had this churlith answer: Over-much love (faith Theophraftus) offentimes causeth hate. So fareth Too much love it with thee, who over-loving me, doest think that I esteem thee not as thou deservest, and there-oftentimes fore art angry with me. And for Canidias, I must tell thee truly, I do rather imploy him for his causeth have skill and faithfulness in things, then any man else: for that he hath been with me from the beginning, and as far as I learn, was never bribed, but clean handed ftill. These words Cato told Munatius fecretly betwirt them two, but afterwards he knew that he had also reported them unto Canidius. When he saw that, he would no more go and Sup with Cato as he was wont; and when he was also called to Counfel, he would not come there neither. Whereupon Caro threatned him, that he would feize upon all his Goods and Carriage, as they use to handle them that are disobedient unto Justice. This notwithstanding, Municius cared not for it, but took Sea, and returned again to ROME, bearing Caro grudge along time. Then Martia, being at that time Caro's Wife, spake with him, and were both bidden to Supper together unto a friend of theirs called Barca. Thereupon Cato also arrived', and carte thither when they were all fet at Supper, and asked where he should fit : Barca told him again, where it pleafed him. Then caffing his eyes about, he faid, He would fit by Munatime: and for fetching a compals about the Board, he went and fare by him, but offered him no friendship and familiarity all Supper-time. Afterwards notwithstanding, at the request of Martia, that was earnestly in hand with Cato for him, he wrote unto him, and willed him to come and speak with him. Munatins went to Cato's house in the morning, where Martia stayed him, and kept him company, until all the reft that came to fainte Caro were departed. Then Cato coming to him, embraced him in his Arms, and made very much of him. We have the willingtier dilated this matter at length, because mens Natures and Manners might be discerned even in these small matters of Money gotten friendship privately, as otherwise in the greatest publick Causes. Now touching Cato's Commission, together by he got together little less then Seven thousand Silver Talents. Furthermore, fearing the farness of Cate in Cyprus, the journey he had to go by Sea, he made divers little Coffers, and put into every one of them two Talents, and five hundred Drachmaes, and tyed unto each of them a long Rope, and a great piece of Cork; because that if the Ship should fortune to miscarry those Corks might shew where the Chefts with Money lay in the bottom of the Sea. Thus was all the Money faved, faving a little, and brought fafely to ROME. Cate having made two Books, wherein he had Noted all things done in his Journey, he could neither fave the one nor the other of them. For one of his Bond-men made free, called Philargyrus, took the one way; who taking Ship at the Haven of CENCHREES, was himfelf drowned, and the Book he had also, loft with him. The other Book which he himself had kept until he came to Corrou, he lying in the Market-place of the City in his Tents which he caufed to be fet up; the Mariners being very cold in the Night, made fo great a Fire, that it burnt the Tents, be fet up; the Mariners being very cold in the Night, made fo great a Fire, that it burnt the Tents, Stuff, Book and all. Notwithstanding, be brought certain of the late King Prolomy's Slaves with him, who while he lived, had the charge and custody of all his Treasures and Riches, the which he brought as Witnesses to stop the mouths of his malicious Enemies, that would have accused him in any thing. But yet the loss of them did grieve him, not fo much for the great care and pains be had taken in fetting down the account of his charge, for the juftification and proof of his fidelity and good fervice; but also for that they might have served for a good Memorial and Example unto all o-Case received by and by all the Magistrates, the Priests, the Senate, and the most part of the People also went out to

thers, to have been alike carefull in their charge, as himself. But the gods denied him this good hap. News being brought that he was come to ROME by Water; when they understood he was at hand, into Rome with meet him by the Rivers-fide: so that both fides of the River of Tyber were full of People, and the great honour of receiving of him in, feemed not inferiour to the entry of a Triumph. Notwithstanding, fome thought him very prefumptuous, that the Confuls and Pretours coming out to meet him, he did not ftay his Galley, but rowed still up the Stream (being in a Kings Galley of fix Oars to every Bank) and never flayed until all his Fleet arrived in the Haven. This notwithftanding, when the Coffers with Money were carried through the Market-place into the Treasure-chamber, the People wondred to see so great a quantity of it. And thereupon the Senate being affembled with great and honourable words they gave Cato an extraordinary Pretorship, and Priviledge also, at any common Sports to wear a Purple Gown. Cato refused all these Honours, and onely belought the Senate to make Nicias a Freeman, Steward of the late deceafed King Ptolomy, being a Witnels of his faith and great pains he had taken in this Service. Philip the Father of Martia, was that year Conful, fo that after a fort, the Authority of the Conful was in Cato: because Lemulus, Colleague and fellow Conful with Philip, did no less reverence Cato for his Vertues, then Philip did for his Alliance with him. Furthermore, when Cicero was reftored again from his Banishment, the which Publins Clodius (being then Tribune of the People) had put upon him, and being again grown to great credit, he went one day into the Capitol, in the ablence of Clodius, by force to take away the Tables which Clodius had confectated there, in the which were comprised all his doings during the time he was Tribune. Thereupon the Senate being affembled, Clodins did accuse Cicero of this violent Fact. Cicero answered him again, That because Clodius was chosen Tribune, directly against the Law, therefore all his doings were void, and of no validity. Then flood up Cato, and faid, He knew that all that which Clodins did when he was Tribune, was fcantly good and allowable, but yet if generally any man should undo all that he had paffed by that Authority, then all that he himself had done likewise in Cyprus, must of necessity be revoked. For the Commission that was granted unto him, (by vertue whereof he had done many things) should be unlawfull: because the Tribune also that did grant it him, was not lawfully chofen. And therefore that Publius Clodius was not made Tribune against the Law, who by content of the Law was taken out from a Noble House, and made a Popular Person: howbeit, if he had behaved himself undutifully in his Office, as other men happily had offended, then he was to be accused to make him mend his fault, and not to deftroy the Authority of the Officer, which in it felf was lawfull. After that, there fell misliking betwixt Cicero and Cato, for this Counterbuff be had given him: and Cicero continued along time after, before he did shew him any countenance of Friendship as he had at other times done. But afterwards they were reconciled together again, by this occasion. Pompey and Craffus having been with Cafar to talk with him (who for that purpole came out of GAUL beyond the ALPES) made an agreement there betwirt them, to demand the second Consulfhip together, and when they had it, then to prorogue Cafar's Government for five years more, and also they would have the best Provinces and greatest for themselves, with great Armies and Money enough to pay them with. This was indeed a plain Confpiracy, to divide the Empire of ROME between them, and utterly to overthrow the State of the Common-wealth. At that time there were many Noble men, wich came to make fuit for the Confulship. But when they saw Pompey and Crassus offer to make fuit for it, all the reft gave over , but Lucius Domitius that had married Porcia, Cato's Sifter : through whose perswasion he would not relinquish his suit, considering that it was not the Office onely of the Consulship that was the chiefest matter of Importance, but the liberty of the Senate and People. Straight there ran a Rumour through the most part of the People, that they were not to fuffer Pompeys power to be joyned with Craffus, by means of this Office: for then his Authority would be too great and firong, and therefore, that of necessity one of these two were to be denied. ATO UTICAN.

For this cause therefore, the good men took Domitim part, and did encourage him to go on with his fuit, affuring him of aid under-hand of divers, which durft not be feen openly for fear of those two great men, who at the day of the Election would procure him voyces in his favour. Pompey and Graffus mistrusting this, made Domitius be set upon, going with Torch-light before day into the Field of Mars, where the Election was alwaies made : and first striking the Torch-bearer that went before him, they hurt him fo fore, that he fell down dead at his feet. Then they laid at the rest in like case, who finding themselves cruelly hurt, ran away every man of them, and left Domitim and Cato postalone. But Cato, notwithstanding he was hurt in one of his Arms, still held Domitius fast. and prayed him to tarry, and not to leave to detend the liberty of their Country, against Tyrants. which plainly shewed after what manner they would govern, fith by such wicked means they aspired to tyrannical Government. All this notwithstanding, Domities would tarry no longer, but betook him to his leggs, and ran home. Thus were Craffus and Pompey without denial proclaimed Confuls. Why Cato fued Cato never yielded therefore, but came and fued to be Prætor, because that thereby he might yet make to be Prætor. it some strength and countenance to him against their Consulship, that being no private person, he should have some better Authority to result them that were the chiefest persons. But they rearing, that the Pratorship by the estimation of Cato, would come to equal their Authority of the Consulthip : first affembled the Senate (the most part of the Senators not hearing of it) and in that affembly caused the Senate to decree : that all such as were chosen Prætors, should presently go to their charge not attending the time and liberty appointed by the Law, during which time men might accuse those which had bought the voyces of the People with Money. Then having by this colour and Decree fet ill-doers at liberty, without fear of punishment, they pretending to use corruption, did prefer some of their own Ministers to make suite for the Prætorship, themselves giving Money to corrupt the People, and being prefent at the Election. But notwithstanding all these practises, the Vertue and reputation of Cato overcame them. For the People had him in fo great reverence, that they thought it too shamefull a part to fell Cato by voyces, who deserved rather to be hired to take the Pratorship upon him. Then the first Tribe being called to give their voyces, declared him Prator. Pompey seeing that, straight brake off the affembly, making a shamefull lye, telling that he heard it thunder: the which the ROMANES do marvellously detest, and will conclude nothing when it thundreth. Howbeit af- Cato put from terwards they gave more Money then they had done before, and thereby drave away the chiefest men the Pratorship out of the Field of Mars, and by practile obtained, that Vatinius was chosen Prator for Cato. And the report went, that they that had so wickedly given their voyces, feeling themselves pricked in confcience, fled immediately out of the Field : and the honest menthat remained, were both very forry and angry, for the injury they had offered Cato. At that time one of the Tribunes keeping an affembly of the City, Cato stood up, and told (as if he had prophecied) before them all, what would happen to the Common-wealth by these practises, and stirred up the People against Pompey and Celar, saying that they were guilty of those things, and therefore procured them to be done, because they were afraid that if Cato had been Prætor, he would too narrowly have fifted out their devices. In fine, Cato going home to his house, had more company to wait upon him alone, then all the other Prators that had been chosen. When Caim Trebonius. Tribune of the People, had preferred a Law for the diyiding of the Provinces unto the new Confuls, SPAIN and AFRICK unto the one, and ÆGYPT and SYRIA unto the other, with full power to make War as they thought good both by Sea and Land : all other men having no hope to keep it back, did let it alone, and spake nothing to contrary it. Then Cate getting up into the Pulpit for Orations, before the People began to give their voyces, could Cate was a bardly have two houres fpace to fpeak: but at length, they perceiving that he delayed time by foregainit the Law telling things to come, would fuffer him to speak no longer, but sent a Sergeant to him, and plucked for the Provinthim by force out of the Pulpit. But when he was beneath, and cried out notwithstanding, and divers ces of Pompey gave good ear unto him: the Sergeant went to him again, and took him, and carried him out of the and Grassian.

Market-place. Howbeit the Officer had no sooner left him, but he went straight towards the Pulpit for Orations and there cried out more vehemently then before, and willed the People to have an eye to aid the liberty of their Common-wealth, which went to ruine. When he oftentimes together did this, iTrebonius the Tribune being mad withall, commanded his Sergeant to carry him to Prilon. The Peo--ple followed him hard notwithstanding to hear what he said unto them. Whereupon Trebonius fearing iftir, was forced to command his Sergeant to let Cato go, So Cato drave off all that day without any matter concluded. The next morning notwithstanding, the contrary Faction having partly put 2 the ROMANES in fear, and won the other part also by fair words and money, and by force of Arms likewise kept: Aquilius, one of the Tribunes, from coming out of the Senate, and after they had also wiolently driven Cato out of the Market-place, for faying that it thundred, and having hurt many men, and also slain some out of hand in the Market-place : in the end they forcibly passed the Decree by -vayces of the People. Many being offended therewith, went a company of them together to pluck down Rompeys: Images : but Caro would not fuffer them. And afterwards also, when they preferred amother Law for the prorogation of the Provinces and Armies which Cafar demanded, Cato would Cato foreshew. speak no more to the People to hinder it, but protested unto Pompey himself, that he saw not how he ed Pompey the a plucked. Cefar: upon him, and that he should feel the weight of his force before he looked for it: and happened up then, when he could neither fuffer nor remedy it, he would even case his burthen and himself upon the him by Cafar. Common-wealth; and too late would remember Cato's warnings, which were privately as profitable for Pompey, as openly just and reasonable for the Common-weakh. Caro used many of these perswafions fundry times unto him, but Pompey never made account of them : for he would not be per-and prosperity. Furthermore, Cato was chosen Prator for the next year following, in the which it appeared (though he ministred justice uprightly) that he rather defaced and impared the majesty and dignity of his Office, then that he gave it grace and countenance by his doings: for he would oftentimes go a foot bare-legged, and without any Coat, unto his Prators Chaire, and there give fentence of life and death, otherwhiles of men of great account. And some report, that he would give Audience when he Case preferred had dined, and drunk Wine, but that is untrue. Now Case perceiving that the Citizens of ROME a Law for un a Law for unan Art and faculty to gain by : to root this Vice altogether out of the Common-wealth, he perfusaded the Senate to make a Law, that fuch as hereafter should be chosen Confuls or Prætors, should (if there were no man to accuse them) come and offer themselves before the Judges, and taking their Oath, fhould truly declare what means they had used to attain to their Office. This offended the Suiters for the Offices, but much more the mercenary multitude. Whereupon, a great number of them went in a morning together where he kept his Audience, and all cried out upon him, reviled him and threw Stones at him: inlomuch as they that were there, forced to flie thence, and himfelf also was driven our of the place by the press of the People, and had much ado to get to the Pulpir for Orations, where standing on his feet, he prefently pacified the tumult of the People, by the boldness and constancy of his countenance onely. Then when all was pacified by the present perswasions he used, aprly spoken to purpose for the instant, they giving attentive ear, without stir or uproar. The Senate giving him great commendation therefore he told them roundly and plainly : but I have no cause to praise you, to leave a Prator in fuch darger of his life, offering no aid to help him. But the Suiters for the Offices, they were in a marvellous cate: for one way, they were airaid to give Money to buy the Peoples voyces; and on the other fide, they were afraid also if any other did it, that they fhould go without their fuite. So they were all agreed together, every man to put down twelve Myriades and a half a piece, and then they should make their suite justly and uprightly; and whosoever were taken faulty, and that had otherwise made his way by corruption, that he should lose the money he had laid down. This agreement being concluded between them, they choic Cato (as it is reported) for their Arbitrator, and Keeper of all the same Money. This match was made in Cato's house, where they all did put in caution or fureties to answer the Money: the which he took, but would not meddle with the Money. The day being come, Cate affilting the Tribune that governed the Election, and carefully marking how they did give their voyces : he spixed one of the Shitters for the Office break the Accord agreed upon, and condenned him to pay the forresture unto the reft. But they greatly commending his juffice and integrity, forgave the forfeiture, thinking it punithment enough unto him that had forfeited, to be condemned by Caro But thereby Caro procured himielf the displeasure of the other Senators, for that he feemed therein to take upon him the power and authority over the whole Court and Election. For there is no Vertue, whereof the honour and credit doth procure more envy, then justice doth : because the People do commonly respect and reverence that more then any other. For they do not honour them as they do valiant men, nor have them in admiration, as they do wife men : but they love and trust them better. As for the two first, the one they are arraid of, and the other they distrust: beside, they suppose that valiancy and wildom cometh rather by the benefit of nature, then of our intent and choice, efteening wildom as a readiness of conceit; and fortitude, a presence and courage of the mind. For every man may be just that will, and therefore injustice is of all other Vices most shameful : for it is a wilfull and malicious default, and therefore cannot be excused. Lo, this was the cause why all the Noble men in manner were against Cato, as though he onely had overcome them. Pompey, he thought that the effimation of Caro was altogether the discountenance of his power and greatness, and therefore did daily raifeup many Railers against him. Of them Publius (lodius that seditions Tribune, who was again fallen in friendihip with Pompey, he accused ato and cried out upon him, how he had robbed the Commonwealth of a wonderfull Treasure, by his Commission in CY PRUS : and that he was Entmy unto Pompry because he did refuse to marry his Daughter. Caro thereto made answer, that he had brought more Gold and Silver out of Cyprus, into the Treasure of ROME, without the allowance of either Horse or Souldier, then Pompey had done with all his Triumphs and Wars, with the which he had troubled all the world. And moreover, that he did never feek alliance with Pompey, not that he ibought him un-men and horfes by common pleafures of our private Citizens, given and lent at our charge : and Pompey himfelf referving onely the Name of Emperour, and Lieutenant-Generall, affigneth over his Armies and Provinces to the government of others, whilest he himself besiegeth here the Walles of the City, with feditious and tumultuous Election of Officers, craftily undermining thereby the State of the Common-wealth, to bring all to confusion, that he himself might be absolute Prince, and rule alone. Marcus Janius Thus was he revenged of Pompey. Among Cate's friends, he had one called Marcus Faonius such a one as Apolledorus PHALERIAN was faid to be in old time, unto Socrates, who did counterfeit to be another himself, in doing all things as he did. This man would be far out of reafon, and passionate in his talk, ftorming like a drunkard. He one year made suite to be Ædilis, but he was rejected. Howbeit Cate furthered his fuit, marked, that the Tables wherein the voyces were written, were all one worthy of it, but because he saw he dealt not as uprightly in the Common-wealth as he himself did. 1, said he, have refuled a Province offered me when I came out of my Prætorfhip: but Pompey hath taken fonce by force, and given away unto others. And to conclude, he fent Cafar not long fince, an Army of fix thouland men to ferve him in the Wars of GAULE : the which he never required of us, nor Pompey granted them him by our confent. But we fee, that fo many Armies, Armours and Weapons, fo many hand. So he finding out the falshood, appealed thereupon unto the Tribunes, and made the Election void for that time. After that Faoniss was created Edilis, Cato did help him forth in all the other Cato doth let charges of his Office, and specially in setting forth plays in the Theater, which are customably done forth the Plays at the coming in of every fuch new Officer, to give the People pastime : and gave unto the common for Faorius Plays and Dancers in those Plays, no golden Crowns, as other Ædilis did, but Crowns of Wild-olive Ædilis. Twigs, as they commonly used in GREECE at the Olympian Games. And where others gave unto the poor rich Gitts, he gave the GRECIANS Leeks, Lettices, Redilhes, and Pears : and unto the Ro-MANES, they had Earthen Pots full of Wine, Porke, Figs, Cucumbers, and Fagots of Wood of fmall value. Infomuch as some thought fcorn of them they were so mean, others were very glad of them, feeing that Cate which was fevere and hard of nature, had a doing in them, and by little and little they turned this aufterity of his into pleasure. In fine, Faoniss himself sitting down amongst the People, which looked upon the Players, clapped his hands for joy at Cato: and cried out to him, that he Cato's wife should give them good rewards that played well, alluring them also about to do the like, and told them Counsels for that he had made Cato the whole Ruler of those Sports. At the felf-same time, Curio, Faonius Colleague Plays. and Companion in the Office of Ædilis, had likewise goodly Plays in another Theater : but all the People for fook his, and went to fee Faoniss Plays, who fate among them like a private man, and Cato as the Master of the Plays. Cato did this in scorn and mockery of vain charge and expences, which men are wont to bestow in such trisles, shewing thereby, that whosoever will make any Plays, he Should make the charge but a sport also, furnishing it onely with a convenient grace, but with no vain expence or charge about such a trifle. Shortly after, when Scipio, Hypfem, and Milo, sued all three together to be Confuls, not onely by bribery of Money (a common fault then in fuing for any of the Offices in the Common-wealth) but by plain force of Arms, flaying and killing as in a civill War, they were fo desperate and insolent : some preferred a Law, that they should make Pompey President in these Elections, because men should move their suit after a lawfull fort. But Cato straight was against it faying, that the Law could have no fafety by Pompey, but Pompey might have fafety by the Law Notwithstanding, when he saw this trouble continue of a long time, without any Consuls in ROME, and that daily there were three Camps in the Market-place, that it was almost impossible to prevent the mifchief at hand, and to flay that it should go no further : then he thought it better, that the Senate of their own good wills, rather then by cumpulfion, should put the Government of the State into Pombeys hands alone, chuling the leffer evil, to withfland the greater, and so to yield to the absolute Government without constraint, which the sedition would bring it unto. Therefore Bibalan, Cato's friend and kiniman, made a motion to the Senate, that they would chuse Pompey Sole-Conful For. faid he, either the Common-wealth shall be well governed by him, or else Rome shall serve an ill Lord. Care then rifing up, beyond all mens expectation confirmed Bibulus opinion, and faid : that the City were better to have one Soveraign Magistrate then none, and that he hoped Pompey could give prefent order for the pacifying of this confusion, and that he would be carefull to preserve the City, when he faw that they trusted him with the Government thereof. Thus was Pompey by Cato's means chosen Pompey created Sole-Confull. Then he fent for Cato to come to his Gardens to him, which were in the Suburbs of the Sole Confull, City. Care went thinker, and was received with as greathonour and courtefie of Pompey as could be by Gate's feadevised: and in the end, after he had given him great thanks for the honours he had done him, he praved him to afford him his advice and counfell in his Government. Cato answered him thus, That he had not spoken any thing before that time in respect of any ill will be bare him, whither that he delivered this last opinion of his in respect of his friendship, but wholly for the Common-wealths sake : howbeit otherwise, that for his own private Affairs, if he thought good to tile his advice, whensoever it pleased him to ask his opinion, he would tell him the best he could. But for common Causes, that he would alwaies tell what he thought, though he never asked him : and in fine, he performed all he faid. For, first of all, when Pompey did fet grievous Penalties and new fines upon their heads, which had bought the Peoples voyces for Money : Caro counfelled him to provide for things to come, and to let that alone which was already part. For, faid the, it is a hard thing to determine any certain time, in the which a man should feek to reform the faults that are past: and furthermore, if the punishments appointed cufed, to punish them by a new Law which they had not offended. Afterwards also, certain men of good calling (Pompey: friends) being accused, Cato perceiving that Pompey grew remis, and yielded in many things, he tharply reproved and reformed him. Furthermore, where Pompey had by Law taken away the praifes which were wont to be spoken of the offenders that were accused, he himself notwithflanding having written an Oration in the praile of Manarius Planeus, fent it unto the Judges, whilelt his Caule was a hearing. Case being one of the Judges at that time, Ropped his ears with both welle newer then the offences committed, then they should do wrong unto them that were already ac-his hands, and would not have it read. Wherefore Planeus refuled him for one of his Judges, after his Caffe was pleaded unto : howbeit he was condemned not withflanding To conclude, Caro was fuch a grief and trouble unto them that were accused, that they could not tell well how to deal with him. For notethey durk not tel him be any of their Judges, neither could they well also refuse him. For there were many that were condemned, which refuling Care, feemed unto others that they were guilty :

and many also were thaniefully reproved; because they would not accept Caro for their Judge, when he was offered then! Things proceeding in this fort at ROME, Cofar remained in GADL with his Army, where he made Wars : nevertheless he wan him friends feld in ROME, by Gifts and Money, and made himlelf very ftrong. Now appeared Caro's Predictions and Forewarnings true unto Pompey, and began to quicken his Spirits which had flept to long, and stade him then to confider of the danger, the

But perceiving his slackness and fear withall, Cate fixed to be doubting how to proceed; to prevent Cafars practiles, Cate determined to fixe to be Confull, with Confull to re- intent either to make him leave his Army, or else to find out the practise he intended. Cate's Competitors, they were both of them very honest men also, of the which Sulpitim had received great honour and preferment by Cato's credit and authority: in respect whereof many thought that it was feant honeftly done of Sulpitius, to shew himself so unthankfull, as to stand against Caso in this suit, Howbeit, Cato never complained of the matter, but faid, that it was no marvell he would give place to no man in that, fith it was the greatest good hap that ever came unto him. This notwithstanding he perswaded the Senate to make a Law, that from thenceforth, such as sued for any Office, they should themselves be Suiters to the People, and not prefer their suit by others. This caused the People to be more offended with him then before, because thereby he did not onely take away their fingering of Money, which they got by their voices in Elections : but took from them the means they had also to pleafure many, bringing them now into poverty and contempt. He therefore having no face to flatter the People and to curry favour with them, but rather flicking to his grave manner and modest life, then to feek the dignity of a Confull by fuch means, made furt himself in person, and would not fuffer his friends to take the ordinary course which might win the Peoples hearts, whereupon he Cate was deni- was put by his Confulfhip. This denial was wont not onely to have made the parties refused, very ed the Consul- forrowfull, but their friends and kinsmen also greatly ashamed a long time after. Howbeit Cato made no reckoning of that, but went the next morning, and played at Tennis with his friends in the Field of Mari, and after he had dined, walked again in the Market-place, as his manner was, without Shoes

Citero blameth on his feet, and coat. Citero blamed him much for that, because the Common-wealth requiring then such a Confull as he, he had not carefully endeavoured himfelf by courtefie and gentle means to win the favour of the People, neither would ever after make fuit for it, although at another time he fued to be Prator. Thereunto Cato answered, that for the Pratorship he was not deni'd it by the good-will of the People, but rather for that they were bribed with Money. And for the Election of the Confuls, where there was no deceit used, he knew plainly he went without it, for his manners which the People milliked : the which he thought were no wife mans part to change for any mans pleasure, nor yet by making the like fuit to hazard the refufall. Furthermore, Cofar making War with very flour Nations, and having with no small danger and travell subdued them: and having also see upon the GERMAINS with whom the ROMANS were at peace, and also slain three hundred thousand Persons: his friends made suit that the People should do solemn Sacrifice to give thanks unto the gods.

But Cate in open Senate was of opinion, that they should deliver Cafar, into their hands whom be had were in no fault, but have pardoned the Common-wealth. Coffer being advertifed thereof, wrote a Letter unto the Senate, containing many Acculations against Caso. The Letter being read, 6 are role, not as A man put in a chafe with choler, nor pricked with envy, but coldly and quietly (as if he had long-before premeditated what he would fay) declared that the Accusations which Cafar heaped against him in his Leinets, were but pretty mocks and fleights which he had gathered together, to make the People merry thinhall. But on the other fide, when he began to unrip his whole intents and practifes from the beginning, not as if he had been his Enemy; but rather a Confederate with him in bis conspiracy, declaring that they were not the Germain's, nor the Gaules, which they were to be afraid of, but of himself, it they were wife : he thereupon to offended the Senate, and made such flir among them, that Colors triends repensed them they had caused his Letters to be read in the Senate, giving Cato thereby octation justly, to complain of Cafera and to alledge much good matter against him. At that time therefore there was nothing detreed in the Senate against Cafar, but this was faid onely, that it was reason to let him have a Successour. There Cefare friends made hin the Romey should put away his Army, and resignup the Provinces he keps for elfe that they should compell Co. far no more then him to do it. Then Cato opened his mouth, and faid, the thing was now come to pass noticered Ca- which he had ever told shem of, and that Carfar came to apprece the Common wealth, openly units ing the Army against it, which deceitfully be had obtained the same. All this prevailed not, neither sould he thereby win any thing of the Senatt, because the People favoured Cofor, and would always have him great; for the Senate did believe all that he faid, but for all that they leared the People with hen news was brought that Cofer had won the City of A B.d. at sol M.; and was coming on with his Army towards ROME, then every man looked upon Care, and the People and Plampey confessed, that he onely from the beginning had found out the mark Cafar floot at, and had his the white of his file device. Then faid Gasa unto them , If you would have believed me, my Lords, and followed my Counfell, you should that now have been straid of one man alone, neither should you also have put your onely hope in one man. Pompeyaniweed thereunto, that Care indeed had gueffed more muy howbeit that he also had shalt more friendly. Therein Cafar upbraideth Cafar reprov-Care much, reproving his covetousnels to marry for goods. For said he, if he had need of a wife, enclars corewhy then did he before grant her to another? Unleis fhe were before a bait unto Hortensins, to keep her whilest she was young, that he might have her again when she was rich. But against that methinkes it is sufficient to recute these verses of Eurypides:

Unlikelihoods first I disprove. For why? what man can say,

That ever fear made Hercules to turn his face away? For I take it to be all one, to reprove Hercules cowardliness and Cato's covetousness. But if his marriage be to be reproved, peradventure it is in another fort. For fo foon as he had married Martia again, he lest his house and his daughters to her government, and followed Pomper. But after that time, men report that he never polled his head, clipped his beard, nor ware any Garland, but to his dying day, lamented and bewailed in his heart, the mifery and calamity of his Country, whether they had victory, or were overcome. So having the Province of Sicile allotted to him, he went Cato is fent ininto Syracusa. There understanding that Asimin Polito was arrived at Messina, with men of to skille. war from his enemies, Cato fent unto him, to know wherefore he came thither, Pollio again asked of him, who was the causer of all this war? Again, when Cato advertised that Pimpey had forfaken ITALY, and that he lay in Camp beyond the fea by the City of DYRRACHIUM, then he faid, he faw a marvellous great change and incertainty in the providence of the gods: that when Pomner did all things beyond reason, and out of course, he was invincible, and now that he sought to preserve his Country, he saw he lacked his former good hap. Now he knew he was strong enough at that time to drive Afinius Pollio out of SICILE if he would, but because there came a greater aid unto him, he would not plague that Island, with the misery of war. Then after he had advised the SYRACUSANS to take the stronger part, and to look to their safety: he took the sea and went towards Pompey. When he was come unto him, he did always counfell him to prolong the war, Cato leaveth hoping ftill of fome Treaty of Peace; and would in no cafe they should come to fight any battell, sicile. where the weaker part should of necessity be put to the sword by the stronger. Therefore he perfwaded Pompey and the counsellers about him, to establish certain laws to this essect. That they should fack no City in this war, the which belonged unto the Empire of Rome : and also, that they should kill no Citizen of Rome, but in sury of battell, when their swords were in their Cato's laws in hands. Thereby he wan himself great honour, and brought many men to take Pompeys part, Pompeys Arby the lenity and clemency he used unto them that were taken. Thereupon Cato being fent into A-my. SIA, to aid them that had commission to press Ships and men of war, he took his sister Servilia with him, and the boy which Lucullus had by her: for all the time of her widow hood, she had followed Cato, and thereby had worn out her ill name she had before, fith they saw she had so willingly given her felf to follow him in his flying, and contented her felf with his ftraight manner of lite. This notwithstanding, Cafar did not let to shame her to Cato. Pompey's Captains had no need of Cato any where but at RHODES. For he wan the people there with his courteous usage and perswasion, leaving with them Servilia and her little son, and went from thence to Pompey's Camp, who had leavied a great Army both by fea and land. There did Pompey most of all discover his mind and intent. For first he meant to have given Cato the charge of the Army by sea, which were above five hundred ships of war, besides an infinite number of Foists and Pinnaces, and such small bottoms uncovered: but suddenly considering better of it (or possibly being informed by fome of his friends, that all Cato's regard and counsel in matters of government was, to deliver Why Position ROME from Tyranny, and that if he had so great a charge under him, Cafar being overcome, he changed his would also force Pompey to leave his Army, and so make him subject to the law) he changed his mind, mind for the notwithstanding he had already moved it to Cate, and leaving him, gave Bibulus the charge of all his government of Army by sea. But Cato therefore shewed no less good will unto Pompey, then before. For it is sea. reported, that in a certain skirmish and conflict before the City of Dyrrachium, Pompey encouraging his fouldiers, and commanding every Captain also to do the like in his quarter: the fouldiers gave but faint ear unto them, and made no manner of shew of men whose hearts had been any whit the more encouraged thereby. But when Cato after them all came and told them (as the time ferved) the reason of Philosophy, touching liberty, manhood, death, and honour, and that with a vehement affection : and last of all, ending his Oration, with calling upon the gods, turning his speech unto them, as if they had been present to have seen how valiantly the souldiers sought for the liberty of their Countrey: they gave such a lufty cry, and had such a brave conceit and vehement desire to fight like men, that all the Captains were filled with good hope, and foled them to battell, where they gave fuch a cruel charge and fierce onfet upon their enemies, that they overthrew them, and put them that day to flight. Howbeit Cefars good fortune took the finallend of this victory from Pompey, by his over great fear and miftruft: who could not tell how to take the benefit of his victory, as we have written more amply in his life. But when all the rest rejoyced that they had done so noble an exploit, and made their vaunts of the great advantage they had of their enemies : Cato to the contrary bewailed the calamity of his Countrey, and lamented that curfed ambition which cauled so many good and valiant Citizens of one felf City, so to kill and murder one another. After this overthrow, Cafar

fitteen Enfigns of footmen besides. The which he did for the fear and mistrust he had of him, being affured, that if by ill fortune he should lose the battel, he knew well enough that he could not commit them to a truftier man then he : but on the other fide if he wan the victory, he doubted fore that he could not command as he would, where Cato was. There were also many other Noblemen, as a man would fay, cast away, and lest at DYRRA CHIUM with Cato. In fine, the overthrow of the battell at PHARSALIA being blown abroad, Cato refolved with himself if Pompey were dead, that he would pals over all his men into lTALY, and then like a banished man would himself alone wander as far as he could from the tyranny : and contrarily, if he were alive , that then he would keep his Army together for him, as long as he could. With this determination, he passed over the Sea into the Isle of CORFU, where Pompeys Army by fea lay. There Cato finding Cicero, he would have furrendred up his charge unto him, as to a man of a greater dignity, for that he had been Conful, and Cato onely but Prætor. Howbeit Cicero would in no wife receive it , but returned immediately into ITALY. Cato then perceiving that Pompey the younger (fon unto Pompey the great) of a rash and haughty mind, would have punished all them that went into ITALY, and left the Army by sea, and that specially he was bent first of all to begin with Cicero: Cato reproved him privately for it, so that he certainly saved Gito faved Ci- Cicero's life, and many other more befides. Now Cato supposing that Pompey the Great had faved himcertifile, from felf in EGYPT or in AFRICK, he determined to take the feas, to meet him with all his men : but be-Pompey's fon, fore he took ship, he gave all men leave to depart that were not willing to follow him. Cato being arrived in Africk, failing up and down the coast there, he met with Sextu, the youngest son of Pompey, who first told him, that his father was slain in EGYPT : when the fouldiers heard it, they took it very heavily, and not one of them after the death of Pempey the Great, would ferve under any other Captain then Cato. He thereupon being afhamed, and thinking it pity also to leave so many noble and good men that had ferved fo faithfully under him, without a Captain, not knowing what way to take, nor whither to go: at their request he was contented to take charge of them, and went first unto the City of CYRENES, where not many days before, the Citizens had shut the Gates against Labienius. Being there, it wastold him that Scipio, Pompeys father in law, was gotten unto King Juba, who had received him, and that Allim Varus, unto whom Pompey had given the charge of the Province of Africk, was in their company with an Army, and determined to go joyn with them. So he went by land in the Winter time, and had gotten a marvellous number of Affes together, to carry Pfiller, be men water and victuals, which followed him with a great number of Carts besides, and of those men, which which heal the the Africans call Psilles, to wir, they that do heal the ftinging of ferpents, and do fuck out flinging of fer- the poison with their mouths, and do furthermore charm and enchaunt the Snakes, that they have no power to do any hurt. He was feven days together marching continually, and went a foot as a guide unto his nien, without help of horse or beast. From that day forth, on the which he understood of lostratus in Sicile, he gave him the upper hand, honouring him for his Philosophy. Thus Cato

For when Cato came he caused his own Chair to be set betwixt Scipio and Cato, to have the honour to be in the midst. But mind of Caro. Cato perceiving it , took up his own Chair , and fet it on the other fide by Scipio to put him in the middest, notwithstanding that he was his enemy, and had written a shamefull book against him. men and subjects: howbeit Cato did reconcile them together again. Furthermore, when all the company prayed him to take charge of the whole Army, and that Scipio himself and Varm both, did first give him place, and willingly refigned unto him the honour to command the whole Camp: he anfwered them, he would not offend the law, fith he made war onely to preserve the authority and priviledge thereof, neither would take upon him to command all, himself being but Vice-prætor, where there was a Vice-conful prefent. For Scipio was created Proconful, and furthermore, the people had a certain confidence that their affairs would prosper the better if they had but the name of a Scipio to lead them in AFRICK. Now when Scipio was General over them, he would ftraight, for Juba's sake, have put all the inhabitants of the City of UTICA (without respect of age) unto the sword, and have razed the houses to the ground, as those that had taken Cafars part. Howbeit Case would not fuffer him, but protesting unto them that were present, and calling the gods to witness in open counfell, with great difficulty he faved the poor people of UTICA from that cruel Tragedy and flaughter. Afterwards, partly at the request of the people, and partly also at Scipio's instance, Cato took upon Cato was made from the City fearing left by treation, or against their wills it should come into Cafars hands: governour of the City of the City fearing left by treation, or against their wills it should come into Cafars hands: governour of the City of the C should keep it. Cato did both surnish it, and also fortifie it. For he brought in great store of Corn,he repaired the rampiers of the walls, made great high Towers, and cast deep trenches round about the City, palling them in and betwirt the Trenches and the Town, he lodged all the young men of UTI-CA, and compelled them to deliver up their armour and weapons, and kept all the reft within the City it felf, carefully providing that never a man of them should be hurt by the ROMANS; and besides, did also send corn , armour , munition and money unto the Camp: so that the City of UTICA was the staple and store-house of the wars. Moreover, as he had before counselled Pompey not to come to battel, the like counsel he now gave also unto Scipio, not to hazard battell against a man of great skill and experience in wars, but to take time, whereby, by little and little, he flould confume the power and and experience in warsout to the But Scipio was fo from that he regarded not Cato's counsel, but wrote Scipiodespileth other while unto him, twitting him with his cowardliness in this manner: That it was enough for him to Cato's counsel. befafe in a good City compaffed about with walls, though otherwise he fought not to hinder men to be valiant to execute any enterprife, as occasion was offered. Caro wrote again unto him, that he was ready to go into ITALY with his footmen and horsemen which he had brought into AFRICK; to draw Cafar from them, and to turn him against him. Scipio made but a sport at it, Then Cato shewed plainly. that he repented him that he had given him the preferment to be General of the Army, because he saw he would but fondly profecute this war; and also, that if he chanced to overcome, he could not moderately use the victory against his Countrymen. Then he began to mistrust the good success of this war (and so he told his friends) for the Generals hastiness and unskillulness : and yet if beyond expectation it fell out well, and that Cafar were overthrown, he would never dwell at ROME any more, but would flie the cruelty and bitterness of Scipio, who even at that present time did proudly threaten many. But in the end, that fell out fooner then looked for. For a post came to him late that night, who but three days before departed from the Camp, and brought news that all was loft, in a great battell, by the City of THAPSES, which Cafar had won: that he had taken both Camps; that Scipio and King Juba were fled with a few men, and that all the rest of their Army was slain. These news did put the Citizens in such a fear and maze (and specially being in the war, and in the night-time) that for very fear they could fcant keep themselves within the walls of their City. But Cato meeting with them, stayed them that ran up and down crying in the streets, and did comfort them the best he cy in extremity could. Yet he took not all their fear from them, though he brought them again unto themselves from the extastie they were in , declaring unto them that the loss was nothing so great as it was made, and that it was a common matter to enlarge such news with words enough. By these perswasions, he somewhat pacified the tumult and uproar, and the next morning by break of day he made a proclamation. that the three hundred men which he had chosen for his counsellours, should come and assemble in the Temple of Tupiter, they all being Citizens of ROME, which for traffick of Marchandise lay in A-FRICK, and all the ROMAN Senators and their children alfo. Now whilft they gathered themfelves together, Cato himfelf went very gravely with a fer modest countenance, as if no fuch matter had happened, having a little book in his hand, which he read as he went. This book contained the ftore and preparation of Munition he had made for this war, as Corn, Armour, Weapons, Bowes, Slings, and Footmen. When they were all affembled, he began greatly to commend the good love and faithfulness of the three hundred ROMANS, which had profitably served their Countrey with their persons, money, and counsell, and did counsel them not to depart one from another, as men Cato's Oration their perions, money, and comment, and the fave themselves scatteringly. "For remaining together, at Wisca. "* Cefar would less despife them, if they would make war against him: and would also sooner pardon them if they craved mercy of him. Therefore he counselled them to determine what they would do, "and, for his own part, he faid he would not millike whatfoever they determined of : for if their " minds followed their fortune, he would think this change to proceed of the necessity of time; "but if they were refolved to withfrand their misfortune, and to hazard themselves to defend their "liberty, he then would not onely commend them, but having their noble courage in admiration, "would himself be their Chieftain and companion, even to prove the fortune of their Country to the "uttermoft. The which was not UTICA nor ADRUMETUM, but the City felf of ROME ! the "which oftentimes through her greatness had raised her self from greater dangers and calamities. Fur-"thermore, that they had many ways to fave themselves, and the greatest mean of all was this, that "they should make war with a man, who by reason of his wars was compelled to be in many places: "For Spain of one fide was up against him, and took part with the younger Pompey: and the "City of Rome also not being used to be bridled with the snasse of such insolency; could not abide it, but would rather rife with any other change. Furthermore, that they were not to refule any "danger, but to take example of their enemy: who to work his milchievous intent, spareth not his person in any danger. And contrarily also, that unto them the incertainty of the war, if victory "followed, would make them happy: as also in being overthrown, their death would turn to im-"mortal glory. Notwithstanding, they were to think of the matter among themselves, and to "make their prayers to the gods, that in recompence of their vertue and good fervice which they " had shewed thereunto, they would grant them grace to determine for the best. After Cato had ended his Oration, there were divers of them that were ftirred up by his lively perswassons, but the most part of them were incouraged by his conftancy and noblemind, and also by his kindness: so that they presently forgot the danger they were in , and praying him to command their persons , goods , and weapons, as he thought good, taking him for their onely invincible Captain, of whom fortune had no power, thinking it better to die obeying his counfel, then to favethemfelves, forfaking fo valiant and worthy a man. Then, when one of the affembly made a motion that they should make their bondmen free, and that divers also did confirm it, Cato faid, he would by no means suffer it, because it was neither meet nor lawful : howbeit if their mafters would manumifs them , that he was comented to receive

few men with him, who fent unto him to know what he would determine to do. For if he meant to forfake UTICA, he would tarry him there: and if otherwise he determined to keep UTICA, then that he would come and help him with an Army. Scipio on the other fideriding at Anchor, at a point of the land not far from UTICA, flaid for the like answer. Then Cato, thought it best to stay the mef-The equity of fengers which had brought him their letters, till he faw what was the determination of the three hundred. For all they that were Senators of ROME, were very glad men, and did prefently make their bondmen free, and gave them weapons. But the other three hundred which were Merchant venturers, and that lived by usury and exchange, who had the most part of their goods in slaves and bondmen, did not long follow Cato's counfell, but like men, whose bodies soon receive heat, and are foon cold again when they are once gone from the fire: even fo those Merchants, while Cato was prefent among them, had fome good pretty will and defire, but when by themselves they had cast their account, the fear they had of Cafar made them forget the reverence they bare unto Cato, and unto their duty. For, faid they, what are we, and what is he whom we disdain to obey? Is it not (efar himself, who at this day is Lord and Emperor of ROME? Never a one of us is Scipio, Pompey, or Cate, and yet now, when all men for fear (and in manner compelled) do yeeld and fubmit themselves, we will needs take upon us within the walls of UTICA to fight for the liberty of ROME against him, for whom Caro flying with Pompey for look IT ALY : and we now make our bondmen free to fight with Cefar, having no better liberty our selvesthen it pleaseth him to give us. Let us therefore now know our felves whileft we have time, and crave mercy at his hands that is the strongest, and send unto him to pray him to pardon us. The greatest and wifest men of those three hundred Merchants had this speech. But the most part of them sought means how to intrap the Senators, hoping the better of mercy atCafars hand, if they did deliver them unto him, Cato did look for this change in them, but yet uttered not that he thought, and returned the messengers back again unto King Juba and Scipio, and wrote unto them, that they should beware they came not near UTICA, because he did missrust these three hundred Merchants. Now there were a great number of horsemen which had scaped from the battell, who coming towards UTICA, fent three of their company unto Cato, the which brought him not one self determination from all the company. For some of them meant to go unto King Juba, others also to joyn with Cato, and part of them were afraid to come into UTICA. Thele things being thus reported unto Cato, he commanded Marcin Rubrim to take care of these three hundred men, and to receive the names of the bondmen which they willingly manumified, without compelling of any man. In the mean time Cato with all the Senators went out of UTICA to meet with these Cato's piny and horsemen, and there he spake to the Captains, and prayed them that they would not for lake so maregardunt the ny Noblemen and Senators of ROME as were there; and that they would not have King Jaba for their Captain before Cato, but to come into UTICA, where they might fave themselves, the City was of fuch ftrength, and befides, so well armed and victualled for many years. The like request did the Senators also make unto them, with the tears running down their cheeks. Thereupon the Captains went and spake with their fouldiers. Cato in the mean time set him down on a hill, with the Senators, tarrying for answer. But then on the suddain came Rubriss unto him in great hast, complaining of the turnult of these three hundred Merchants , which went about to make the City to rebell : whereupon the reft (their heartsfailing them) fell to bewail their miferable fortune. But Cato fought to comfort them, and then sent unto the three hundred Merchants, to pray them to have a little patience. So the Captains returned again with unreasonable demands of the horsemen. For they faid that they cared not for King Juba's pay, neither were they afraid of Cafars malice, fo that they had Cato for their General: yet to be pend up within the wals of a City with AFRICANS, that were PHOENICIANS, and a traiterous Nation as could be, that grieved them most of all. For, faid they, though now they stir not, and be quiet, yet when Cafar comes, they will be the first that will betray us, and cut our throats. And therefore, if Cato would have them to joyn with him in this war, that he should either kill or drive away all the UTICANS out of the City, and then that they would come into it, when it was clear of all those barbarous people their enemies. Cato thought this a cruel and barbarous condition, nevertheless he told them that he would talk with the three hundred: and so returning again into UTICA, he spake unto them. But they then not regarding the reverence unto Cato, diffembling no longer, faid openly, that they would not like of him whatfoever he were, that Thould compell them to make war with Cafar, because they would not, nor could not do it. Further, there were some of them that mumbled to themselves, that the Senators, should be kept there till Cefar came. Cato over-heard them, for indeed his hearing was very quick. At that very instant one came to him, and told him, that the horfemen were going their way. Cato therefore fearing left these three hundred Merchants would lay hands upon the Senators, he went unto them himself with his friends, and perceiving they were gone a great way off, he took his horse and rode after them. Caso an earnest They rejoycing to fee him come, received him among them, and prayed him to fave himself with fuirer for the them. But Cato prayed them again to fave the Senators, and that with fuch affection, as it forced tears in him: besides, he held up his hands unto them, took their horses by the bridles, and themfelves by their weapons, that at the length he obtained of them, that they would remain there one day at the leaft to help the Senators to fave themselves. So Cato returning with them into the City, he appointed some of them to ward at the Gates, and put others also in Garrison into the Castle : so that the three hundred Merchants quaked for fear, left he would have been revenged of them, because of their return with him. Thereupon they sent unto Cato, humbly to pray him to come unto them in any case. But the Senators flocking about him, would not suffer him to go, and said, that they word not cast away their faviour and protector, to put him into traitors hands. Then doubtless, all that were within UTICA plainly faw the vertue and fimplicity of Caro, and found that there was no fraud nor deceit in him: who having long time refolved to kill himself, he onely took that extream pains and care for others, that their lives being faved, he might then rid himself of his own. For men might eafily fee, though he diffembled it, that he was refolved to die. Whereupon, having com- The fincerity forted the Senators, he yeelded unto the requests of the three hundred Merchants, and went himfelf of Gato. alone unto them. Then they thanked him much for his coming, and prayed him to command them and boldly to truft them: to that he would pardon them if they could not be all Caro's, and would take pitie of their faint hearts, though they were not fo conftant and noble minded as he. For they were determined to fend unto Cafar, specially to intreat him for him: and if that they could not obtain pardon for him, then they were affured they could have none for themselves, and therefore would fight for the fafety of him, while they had any breath in their bodies. Cato thanking them for their good wils, answered, that they should fend quickly to crave pardon for themselves, but to aske none for him. For (laid he)men that be overcome, and have offended, it flandeth them upon to make humble fuit, and to crave pardon: but for himself, he was never overcome in his life, and yet Caro's mind had overcome as much as he defired; and had alwayes been better then Cafar in justice, who onely unconquerable. (not himself) was now taken and overcome: the thing being apparently proved in fight against him which he had always denied to have practifed against his Countrey. When he had made this answer unto the three hundred Merchants, he departed from them. News being brought that Ce/ar was in his way with all his Army, coming towards UTICA: O gods, faid he, then he cometh against us as against men. Then turning unto the Senators, he gave them counsell quickly to fave themselves, whileft the horsemen were yet in the City. So shutting all the Gates of the City, saving that towards the haven, he appointed thips for them all, and fet every thing at a ftay, without tumult or diforder, no man having injury offered him, and gave every one money to make way for their fafety. When Marcus Octaviss (who came with two Legions, and camped hard by UTICA) fent unto Cato, to determine which of them two should be Generall, he made no answer, but turning to Cato, to determine which of them can we wonder any more, that all gooth to wrack with us, fith there is Cato reproveth fuch ambition amongft us for the government, even now when we are at the laft cast? In the mean the ambition time word was brought him, how the horsemen going their way were spoiling of the Citizens goods, of man. as a lawfull prey in war. He straight ran thither himself, and the first he met withall, he took from them that they had gotten: the reft, before he came unto them, threw down that they were carrying away, and hanging down their heads for shame, they went their way, faid nothing. Then Cato calling all the Citizens of UTICA together, prayed them not to incense nor move Casar against the three hundred, but rather to crave of him pardon for them all. Then he went again to the peer, and there embracing his friends, and taking his leave of them all, he brought them to their ships. Now for his fon, he did not counfell him to go, neither did he think it meet to urge him to for fake his father. Furthermore, there was one Statiling a young man in his company, of a noble courage, Statiling a folthat was determined to follow the invincible conftancy of Caro: who counfelled him to take the fea, lower of Caro. and to fail away with the rest, because he knew he was Cafars mortall enemy. Statilius said, he would not go. Then Cato turning him unto Apillonides a Stoick Philosopher, and unto Demetrina a Peripatetick Philosopher, faid: You must take this stout young man, to perswade him to obey unto necessity. Cato himself in the mean time sent away the rest, and did minister justice unto them that required it, spending all that night and the next day about those matters. Then Lucius Casar, the kiniman of Julius (e/ar the conqueror, being chosen by the three hundred, to go and suite unto him for them all , came and prayed Caro to help him to make his Oration , which he should say unto Cefar for them all: and as for thee Cato, faidhe, I will kifs his hands, and fall down on my knees before him to intreat him for thee. Nay, faid Cato, thou fhalt not do fo. For if I would fave my life by Ca/ars grace, I could do it, if I would but go umo him: howbeit I will not be bound to a tyrant for Cato would not by Ca/arz grace, I could do it, it I would out go unto min; nowcer I wantot be bound to a tyrian tot have pardon injuffice. For it is an injuffice in him, to take upon him as a Lord and foveraign to fave a mans life, when begged of Cahimself hath no authority to command. But yet let us consider if thou wilt, what thou shalt say, far for him. to crave pardon for the three hundred. So they were a while together confidering the matter: and in fine, Lucius Cafar being ready to depart, Cato recommended his fon and friends unto him, and was bathing, thinking upon Statilius, he cried out aloud: Well Apollouides, haft thou at length yer perswaded Starilina to go his way, and pulled down his stour courage he had : and is he gone without bidding us farewell? How , gone , faid Appollonides? Nay , his heart is now more front and couragious then ever it was, notwithstanding all the perswasions we could use unto him: for he is determined to tarry, and to take such part as thou doest. After he had bathed himself, hewent to embracing him, took his leave of him. Then he returned unto his lodging, and calling his fon Catto forbad his and friends before him, and talking of many matters, among others he charged his fon in no fonto meddle case to meddle in the affairs of the Common-wealth. For, said he, to deal uprightly like Cato's with matters fon, the corruption of the time and flate will not abide it: and contrarily, observing the time, thou canft not do like an honest man. Towards evening he went into his Bath to wash himself, and as he

After supper they fell into grave talk, and matters of Philosophy, till at length they came of the Stocks unto the strange opinion of the Stoick Philosophers, which was this, that only the good man is free, and all the evill be flaves. The Peripatetick Philosopher that was present there, was straight against it.

But Cato was very earnest against the Peripatetick and argued the matter a long time, with a chement speech and contention: infomuch as they that heard him, found then that he was determined to end his life, and to rid himfelf out of all those troubles. But then when he had ended his argument, and faw that every man held their peace, and looked fadly on it: to comfort them again, and to put the fulpicion of his death out of their heads, he began again to fall in talk of their affairs, and feemed to be carefull of them, as though he had been affraid left fome misfortune were come unto them upon the fea, or unto them that were gone by land, because they passed through deferts, where there was no water to be had: Now when supper was done, and the strangers gone, he walked as his manner was with his friends, and having taken order with the Captains of the watch for matters of fervice, as the time required, going into his Chamber he embraced his fon and his friends more lovingly then he was wont to do, whereby he made them again suspect the execution of his determination. When he was come into his Chamber and laid in his bed, he took Plato's Dialogue in hand, treating of the foul, and read the most part of it. Then looking by his beds fide, and milling his fword (which his fon had taken from him when he was at supper) he called one of the Grooms of his Chamber to him, and asked him who had taken his fword away. His man made him no answer, and he fell again to read his Book. Then a pretty while after, not feeming to be importunate, or over hafty of the matter, but as though he would onely know what became of it, he willed them to bring him his sword again. They tarried long, and he had read over all the book, but yet his fword was not brought him again. Whereupon he called for all his men, one after another, and very angerly asked them his fword, and gave one of them fuch a blow on his face, that his nofe fell a bleeding, and his hand was all bloody withall; and cried out, that his fon and his fervants would deliver him naked into the hands of his enemie, untill his for and his friends at length ran unto him, and falling down on their knees, lamented, and belought him to be contented. Cato then rifing out of his bed , looked grimly upon them , and faid unto them : O gods , who ever faw me in this taking? why doth no manby reason perswade me, if they see me out of the way, and not to keep me from my determination by plucking my weapons from me? why doest not thou (my son) bind thy fathers hands behind him, that when Cefar cometh, he may find me in case not to defend my self? I do not defire my fword to hurt my felt, for it I had any fuch mind, I need but hold my breath a little, or give but a knock of my head against the wall onely, and dispatch my felf quickly. When he had faid thus, his son went out of his Chamber weeping, and all his friends also, no man remaining with Cato, but Demetriss and Apollonides, unto whom he spake more gently, and reasoned in this fort . What do you think to keep an old man as I am alive by force ? and have you tarried behind but to fit flaring upon me, and fay nothing unto me? if otherwise else, by reason you come to perswade me, that it shall be no shame for Caro (despairing of the safety of his life) to seek it by the grace and mercy of his enemy, why then do you not now tell me your reasons to perswade me; that for saking all other fancies and determinations which hitherunto we have holden for good, being on a sudden become wifer by Cefars means, we should be bound the more therefore to give him thanks; I do not tell you this, that I have determined any thing of my life, but that it is in my power (if I lift) to put the thing in execution I have determined . but yet I will confult with you, when I am fo determined, to hear the reasons and opinions of your books, which your selves do use in discourse and argument together. Go your way therefore hardly unto my fon, and tell him that he must not think to compell his father unto that which he cannot prove good unto him by reason. After this talk, Demitrius and Appellonides being nothing comforted, weeping, departed out of his Chamber. Then his fword was brought him by a little boy. When he had it, he drew it out, and looked whether the point and edge of his sword was sharp and would cut: when he saw it was well: O, said he, now am I where I would be, and so laying down the fword naked by him, he took his book again in his killed himfelf. hand, and read it over (asthey fay) twice together. Then he slept so soundly after it, that his men which were without his Chamber heard him snort again. About midnight he called for two of his freemen, Cleanthes his Phylitian and Butas, whom he chiefly employed in his weightieft affairs of the Common-wealth. So he fent him unto the haven, to fee if all his men that were imbarked were under fail, and gave his hand to the Physitian to be bound up, because it was swollen with the blow he gave one of his flaves when he hit him on the face. All his fervants were glad to hear of that, hoping then that he defired to live. Soon after came But as back again from the haven, and brought him word that all were gone but Craffus, who stayed about some business he had, and yet that he was going to take ship : howbeit that the sea was very rough, and wind exceeding great. Cato hearing this , fighed, being forry for them that were upon the fea : and fent But at back again to the haven, to see if any mancame back for any matter they had to say unto him. The little birds began to chirp, and Cato fell again in a little flumber. But thereupon But as returned, and brought him word that all was quiet in the haven, and there was no ftir. Then Cate bade him go his way, and shut too the door after him, and layed him down in his bed, as though he had meant to have slept out all the reft of the night. Busa back was no fooner turned, but Cato taking his naked fword in his hand, thrust it into his breast: howbeit the swelling of his hand made the blow so weak, that it killed him not prefently, but drawing on to his latter end, he fell down upon his bed, and made fuch a noise with his fall (overthrowing a little table of Geometrie hard by his bed) that his servants hearing the noise, gave a great shreek for sear. Thereupon his son and his striends ran into the Chamber, and found him all of a goar blood, and the most part of his bowels coming out of his body, himfelf being yet alive and feeing them. They were all stricken with such forrow to behold it, that at the first they were so amazed, as they could not tell what to say to it. His Physitian coming too, went about to put in his bowels again which were not perished, and to sow up his wound. But Cate coming to himself, thrust back the Physician, and tore his bowels with his own hands, and made his wound very great, and immediately gave up the Ghost. Whereupon the three hundred ROMANS (in less time then a man would have thought Cato's own houshold fervants could have known of his death) were at his doors, and immediately after all the people of UTICA also came thither, and with one voice called Cato their benefactor and faviour, and faid, he onely was a freeman, and had an invincible mind: and this was done, when they heard fay, that Cafar was not far from UTICA. Furthermore, neither fear of the present danger, nor the desire to flatter the conquerour, neither any private quarrell amongst themselves, could keep them from honouring Cato's Funerals. For sump- Cato's sunerals. tuoully fetting out his body, and honourably accompanying his Funerals as might be, they buried him by the sea fide, where at this present time is to be seen his image, holding a sword in his hand. After that, they made their best way to fave themselves and their City. Now Casar being advertised by them that came unto him, how Caro stirred not from UTICA, nor fled not, but sent all others away, faving himself and his son, and a few of his friends that remained there, being afraid of nothing, he could not devise what he meant by it. Therefore esteeming Cato much, he made hast with all the freed he could with his Army to come thither. But when he understood that Cato had flain himself, Cafars faying writers do report he faid thus : O Cato, I envythy death, fith thou haft envied mine honour to fage unto Cato the thy life. For indeed, had Caro been contented Cafar should have faved his life, he had not so much dead. impaired his own honour, as he had augmented Casars glory. And yet what Casar would have done, men make it doubtful, faving that they conjecture well of Cafars clemency. Caro died when he was but eight and fourty years old. For his son, Cafar never did him hurt : howbeit it is reported of him to what condithat he was very idely given, and lascivious besides. For when he lay in CAPPADOGIA, in a Noble-tions he had. mans house of the Kings blood, called Maphradates, who had a fair woman to his wife, he tarried longer there then he might well with honefty; whe reupon he fell to be a laughing stock to the people, and in mockery they faid: Cato will go to morrow, a thirty days hence. And further that Maphradates and Porcins are two good friends, but they have but one mind: and the reason was, because Psiche signifi-Maphradates wife was called P/Jche, which in the Greek fignifieth, mind : and Cato is a noble fellow, eth mind. and hath a Princely mind: howbeit his famous death did ftop this infamous speech. For he valiantly fighting against Angustu and Anconimat the battell of PHILIPPES, for the liberty of his Country, their Army being overthrown and fled , he would neither flie flor hide himself , but running in amongst his enemies, he made them know what he was by encouraging those of his fide, which yet did defend themselves, till he was slain in the field, to the great admiration of his valiantness. Further- Portion the more, Porcia the daughter of Cato, gave no place unto her father, neither for chaltity, nor greatness daughter of of mind. For she being married unto Brutus, who slew Casar, was of the conspiracy, and slew her Cato, and wife felf as couragiously as became the vertue and nobility of her bloud from whence the came, as we have of Brutus, more amply declared in the life of Bratus. Statilius also, who had said, he would run Cato's fortune (as we have told you before) was kept from killing of himself by the Philosophers , Demetrius and Apollonides. But after that time having shewed himself very faithful and serviceable unto Brutus in all his affairs , he was flain in the field also at the baccell of PHILIPPES.

The fable of Ixion againth ambicious po tuely the Fable of I imes ion was not ill devifed against ambitious persons , who imbracing a cloud for the goddess Juno, begot (as it is faid) the CEN-TAURI. For even so ambitious men, imbracing glory for the true image of vertue, do never any act that is good nor perfect: but being carried away with divers fancies, and following others humors with defire to please the people, they may as the heardmen in the Tragedy of Sophoclis speaking of their cattell) say:

We wait upon their beasts, though we their masters be,

And where seever they become, there also follow we. Such indeed are they compared to , that govern Common-weals after peoples lust and fancy: who doubtless are as their fervants obedient at call, because they onely may enjoy the glorious title and name of an officer. For like as in a ship the Mariners that stand in the Prow, do better fee before them then Pilots that feer the Helm in the Poop, and yet look always back unto them to fee what they command : even fo , they that govern in the Common-wealth for honours fake, are no better then honourable flaves of the people, having no more but the bare name of a Governor. But indeed, the perfect good and honest man should never cover outward glory, but as a mean to bring him to noble attempts, whereby he might procure the better credit of his doings. And for a young man that coveteth honour by vertue, give him leave a little to glory in his well do-Theophrassus of ings: for as Theophrassus saith, vertue buddeth and flourisheth in youth, and taketh fast roots by praises given, as wir and courage groweth in them. But overmuch praise is dangerous in every person, but chiefly in ambitious Governors. For if they be men of great power, it makes them commit many desperate parts : for they will not allow that honour proceeds of vertue, but that honour is vertue it feli. But indeed they should fay as Phocion faid unto Antipater, that requested an unlawfull matter of him : Thou canft not , faid be, have Phocion a friend and a flatterer both. This , or the very like, may be faid unto the people: you cannot have one, both a mafter and a fervant, that can command and obey together. Or else the mischief spoken of in the tale of the Dragon must needs happen, which was; The tail on a time fell out with the head, and complained, faying, it would another while go before, and would not always come behind. The head granted the tail, which fell out very ill for it, not knowing how to guide the head; and befides that, the head thereby was tormented every way, being compelled against nature to follow that part and member, which could neither hear nor fee how to guide it. The like manner have we feen happen unto many, which in the administration of the Common-wealth , did feek to please the humors of the multitude. For when they have once put their heads under their girdles to please the common people, which without cause and reason do soon rebell, they can by no politible means afterwards bridle their fury and infolency. Now the reason that made us enter into discoule against the ambition and vain glory amongst the people, was the Platinchexcul- confideration I had of their great power, remembring the misfortunes of Tiberius and Caiss Gracchi: ethibe Grachi both of the which coming of a noble house, and having been marvellous well brought up, and managing also the affairs of the Common-wealth with a good defire, were notwithstanding in the end cast away: not so much through coverousness of glory, as for fear of dishonour, which came also of no bale mind. For they having received great pleafures and friendship of the people, were ashamed to be indebted to them, and therefore earneftly fought to exceed the people in goodwill, by new decrees and devices, which they preferred for common benefit: and the people also for their parts contended to honor them the more, by how much they ftrived to shew themselves thankful. So with like strife on either fide, they to gratifie the common people, and the people to honour them, were fo unwares enrangled with publike causes, that they could no more follow the common Proverb, which saith:

Although our deeds diffent from equity, Tet can we not defift with honefty.

This thou shalt easily find by the declaration of the History. With these we do compare two other popular men, both Kings of LACEDEMON, Agis and Cleomenes. For they as the Gracchi, feeking to increase the power of the common people, and to restore the just and honest government again of the Commonwealth of LACEDAMON, which of long time had been out of use, did in like manner purchase the hate of the Nobility, which were loth to lose any part of their womted covetousness. Indeed these two LACONIANS were no brethren born, but yet did both follow one self course and Form of Government, which had beginning in this fort. After that covetousness of Gold and Silver crept again into the City of SPARTA, and with riches, covetousness also and misery, and by use voloptuousness and licentious life: SPARTA then was void of all honour and goodnefs, and was long time drowned in shame and dishonour, untill King Agis and Leonidas came to reign there. Agu was of the house of the Eury iontides, the son of Eudamedas, the fixth of lineal The linage of descent after Agefilam who had been the great Prince of all GREECE in his time. This Agefilam Agis, had a fon flain in ITALY by the MESSAPHIANS, called Archidamus before the City of MAN-DONIUM. Archidamus had iffue two fons , Agus and Eudamidas that was King , who succeeded his brother Agis, whom Antipater flew before the City of MEGALIPOLIS, and left no children behind him. Eudamidas begat Archidamus, which Archidamus begat another Eudanidas : which Eudamidas also begat Agis , whose life we now write of. Leonidas also , the son of Cleonymu , was The linage of of the other family of the Agiades, the eight of fuccession after Pansanias, who slew Mardonius. the Kings Lieutenant Generall of PERSIA, in a battell fought before the City of PLATÆES. This Paulanias had a fon called Pliftonax, and Pliftonax also another, called Paulanias : who flying from Sparta unto the City of Tegen, his eldest fon Agespelis was made King in his fathers room, who dying without iffue, his younger brother Cleombrotus succeeded him in the Kingdome. Cleombrotus had two fons, Agespolis and Cleomenes : of the which, Agespolis reigned not long King. and died without iffue. Then Cleomenes his brother , who was King after him, had two fons , Acrotatus the elder, that died in his fathers life time : and Cleonymus the younger which survived him. and was not King , but one Arem his Nephew, the fon of Acrotatin. This Arem died before the City of CORINTH, who having another Acrotatus to his fon, he succeeded him in the Kingdom. He also died at a battell before the City of MEGALIPOLIS, and was there flain by the Tyrant Aristodemus Arillodemus, leaving his wife great with child. She being brought to bed after his death of a fon, tyrant of Megawhom Leonidas the son of Cleonymus taught and brought up, the child dying very young, the lipolas, crown by his death was cast upon Leonidas himself. Howbeit his manners and conditions never liked the people. For though all men generally were corrupted through the Common-wealth, and clean out of order, yet Leonidas of all other exceeded, deforming most the ancient LACONIAN life: Leonidat because he had been long time brought up in Princes bouses, and followed also Seleneus Court, from brought superwhence he had brought all the pride and pomp of those Courts into GRECE, where Law and fluity and ex-Reason ruleth. Agus on the contrary part did not onely far excell Leonidas, in honour and mag cels into Sparnanimity of mind: but all other almost also which had reigned in SPARTA from the time of Agest- The continen-Lase the great. So that when Agis was not yet twenty years old, and being daintily brought up with cy of Agis. the fineness of two women, his mother Agistrata, and Archidamia his Grandmother, which had more Gold and Silver then all the LACEDEMONIANS elle, he began to spurn against these womanish delights and pleasures, in making himself fair to be the better liked, and to be fine and trim in his apparell; and to cast upon him a plain Spanish Cape, taking pleasure in the Diet, Bathes, and manner of the ancient LA CONIANS life: and openly boasted besides, that he would not desire to be King, but onely for the hope he had to restore the ancient LACONIAN life by his authority. The beginning Then began the state of LACEDEMON first to be corrupted, and to leave her ancient discipline, of the Lacede Then began the state of LACEDAMON lith to be continued, and to the last and the monitorial when the LACEDAMON LANS having subdued the Empire of the ATHENIAMS, flored them. monitorial felves and Country both with plenty of Gold and Silver. Thus this man made a law to fatisfie his anger, and others did confirm it for lands by will. covetoufness fake, and so overthrew a noble ordinance. For the rich men then began to buy lands of numbers, and to transferred it from the right and lawful heirs: whereby a few men in short time being made very rich, immediately after there fell out great poverty in the City of SPARTA, which made all honest sciences to cease, and brought in thereupon unlawful occupations, who envied them that were wealthy. Therefore, there remained not above seven hundred natural Citizens of SPARTA in all, and of them, not above an hundred that had lands and inheritance: for all the rest were poor people in the City, and were of no countenance nor calling, and befides that, went unwillingly to thewars against their enemies, looking every day for stir and change in the City. Agis therefore thinking it a notable good act (as indeed it was) to replenish the City of SPARTA again, and to bring in the old equality, he moved the matter unto the Citizens. He found the youth (against all Agis seeths- hope) to give ear unto him, and very well given unto vertue, eafily changing their garments bout coreduce and life, to recover their liberty again. But the oldest men, which were now even rotten with coverousness and corruption, they were askaid to return again to the straight ordinances of Lycurwealth to ber gus, as a flave and runnagate from his mafter, that trembleth when he is brought back again market him. Therefore they reproved Agu, when he did lament before them their prefent miferable effacts, and wish also for the former ancient honour and true dignity of SPARTA. Howbeit Lysander the and wish also for the former ancient honour and true dignity of SPARTA. Howbeit Lysander the fon of Lybis, and Mandroelisas the fon of Exphants, and Agestans also, greatly commended his noble defire, and persuaded him to go forward withall. This Lysander was of great authority and noble defire, and persuaded him to go forward withall. eftimation amongst them in the City, Mandroclidas was also very wise, and carefull about any matter of counfel, and with his wisdom and policy, very valiant : Agefilam in like manner, the Kings Unkle, and an eloquent man, was very efferninate and covetous, and yet prickt forward to give his furtherance to this attempt as it appeared, by his fon Hippomedon, who was a noble good fouldier, and could do very much, by means of the love and good will the young men did bear him. But indeed, the secret cause that brought Agestlans to consent unto this practise, was the greatness of his debt which he ought, of the which he hoped to be discharged by changing of the state and Commonwealth. Now when Agit had won him , he fought by his means to draw his mother also unto the matter, which was Ageflam fifter. She could do very much by the number of her friends, followers, and debtors in the City, by whose means she ruled the most part of the affairs of the City after her own pleasure. But the young man Hippomedon making her privy unto it, at the first she was amazed withall, and bade him hold his peace if he were wife, and not to meddle in matters unpossible and unprofitable. But when Agefilam had told her what a notable act it would be, and how easily it might be brought to pais, with marvellous great profit; and that King Agis began also to fira n her with great intreaty, and that the should willingly depart with her goods to win her fon honour and glory: who though he could not in money and riches come to be like unto other Kings (because the flaves and factors onely of the Kings Selencus and Prolomy , had more money then all the Kings of SPARTA had together that ever raigned) yet if in temperance, thriftiness, and noble mind (exceeding all their vanities, he could come to reftore the LACEDEMONIANS again unto equality, that then indeed he should be counted a Noble King. These women stirred up with ambition by those refugitions of the young man , seeing him so nobly bent, as if by the good their minds had secretly been inflamed with the love of vertue, did prefently after their minds in fuch fort , that they themselves did prick forward Agio, and fent for their friends to pray and intreat them to favour his enterprife; and furthermore they brought on other women also, knowing that the LACEDEMONIANS did ever hear and believe their wives, fuffering them to understand more of the affairs of the state then they themselves did of their private estate at home. Herein is to be considered, that the most part of MLDAS WETE UN. the riches of LACEDAMON was in the hands of the women, and therefore they were against it, not to their wives. the riches of LACEDAMON was in the hands of the women, onely because thereby they were cut off from their finenels and excels , in the which being ignorant of the true good indeed, they put all their felicity: but also because they saw their honour and authority which they had by their riches, clean troden underfoot. Therefore coming to Leonidas, they did perswade him to reprove Agis, because he was an elder man then he, and to lett that this enterprise went not forward. Leonidas did what he could in favour of the rich , but fearing the common people, who defired nothing but alteration, he durft not onely speak against him, but secretly he did the best he could to hinder Ago practile; talking with the Magistrates of the City, and accusing Agis unto them, he told them how he did offer the rich mens goods unto the poor, the division of their lands, and the abolifhing of all debts, for reward to put the tyranny into his hands, and that thereby he got a ftrong guard unto himself, but not many Citizens unto SPARTA. This notwithflanding, King Agis having procured Lyfander to be chosen one of the Ephores, he presently preferred his law unto the counsel. The Articles whereof were these: That fuch as were in debt, thould be cleared of all their debts, and that the lands also should be divided into equal parts; so that from the valley of Pallena unto mount Tangerus, and unto the Cities of MALEA and SELASIA, there should be four thousand five hundred parts, and without those bonds, there should be in all the rest, fifteen thousand parts, the which should be distributed unto their neighbours meet to carry weapon: and the reft unto the naturall SPARTANS. The number of them should be replenished with their neighbours and strangers in like manner, which should be very well brought up, and be able men befides to serve the Common-wealth : all the which afterwards should be divided into fifteen companies, of the which, fome should receive two hundred, and others four hundred men, and should live according to the old ancient inflitution observed by their Ancestors. This law being preferred unto the Senate, the Senators grew to divers opinions upon it. Whereupon Lylander affembled the great councill of all the people , and there spake unto them himself , and Mandroclidu , and Agessiau alfo , praying them not to fuffer the honour of SPARTA to be troden under foot , for the vanity of a few: but that they would remember the ancient Oracles of the gods, warning them to beware of avarice, as of the plague and deftruction of the Common-wealth: and of the late Oracle also brought unto them, from the Temple of Pafiphat. The Temple and Oracle of Pafiphat, was famous at the City of THALAMES : and fome fay , that Pafiphae was one of the daughters of Atlas , which was gotten with child by Inpiter , and was delivered of a fon called Hammon. think that I was Lapanara, one of the same of things to come. But Phylarchia writes that Daphnethe daughter of Amyela flying from Apollo that would have ravished her, was turned into a Lawrel Tree, and honoured by Apollo with the gift of prophecy. So, they faid that this Oracle of the god commanded them, that the SPARTANS should again return unto their former ancient equality, stablished first by Lycurgus law. When every man else had spoken, King Agis rising up, briefly speaking unto the people, said: that he would bestow great contributions for the reformation of the Common-wealth, which he was defirons to reftore again. For first of all, he would make common all his arable and pasture he had, and besides that he would add too fix hundred talents in ready money, and so much should his mother, grandmother, kinsmen, and friends, all the which ready honey, and to hack in Sparta. When the people heard what he faid, they marvelled his good; commuch at the noble mind of this young King and were very glad of it, faying: that for three hundred mon years space together, the City of Sparta had not so worthy a king as he. But Leandas contrarily affaied with all the power he could to refift him, thinking with himself that if King Agis purpose took place, he should also be compelled to do as he did, and yet he should have no thanks, but King Leonidas resistances Agis: because that all the SPARTANS indifferently should be compelled to make their goods com- eth King Agis. mon, but the honour should be his onely that first began it. So he asked Agis, whether he thought Lycurgus had been a good and just man, or not? Agus answered that he had been. Then replyed Leenidas. Did you ever fee that he had taken away and abolithed any debts, or had received strangers into the number of the Citizens of Sparta? Who contrarily thought this Common-wealth unperfect. if all strangers were not banished the City. Agis again answered him: that he marvelled not that Leonidas being brought up in a strange Countrey, and also married there in a Noblemans house, he should be ignorant of Lycurgus Laws, who banishing gold and filver out of his City, did therewithat exile debt and lending. And for strangers he hated them that would not conform themselves unto the manners and fashions of life which he instituted, and those they were which he banished : not for any ill will he bare unto their persons, but because he seared their manners of life, lest that mingling them with the Citizens, they should make them run after vanity and covetousness to be rich. For otherwise, Terpander, Thales, and Phericydes, which were all strangers, were marvellously reverenced and honoured in SPARTA in old time, because they did fign in their writings, the self fame things which Lycurgus had established in his laws. And thou thy self also doest commend Ecprepes, being one of the Ephores, because he did cut with a Hatchet the two ftrings which Phrynis the Musician added unto the Cithern, more then the seven common strings, and those also which did the like unto Timesheus: and yet thou reprovest me, because I go about to root out all excess and pride out of Sparta, as though those men did not far off prevent that these superfluous strings of the Musick, delighting the Citizens minds too much with their songs, should not cause them fall unto such trade and manner of life, as should make the City at discord with it self. After this contention the common people did flick unto King Agis, and the rich men followed Leonidus: praying and perswading him not to forsake them; and further, they did so intreat the Senators, in whom confifteth the chief authority, to determine and difgest all matters before they be propounded unto the people, that they overthrew the law, by the onely voice of one man more. Wherefore Lylander who was yet in office, attempted to accuse Leonidas by an ancient law, forbidding that none of the race of Hercules should marry with any strange woman, nor beget children of her : and faid further that no man upon pain of death should dwell any where, but in SPARTA. When he had instructed others to object these things against Leonidas, he with others of his colleagues observed a sign in the Element, the Ceremony whereof was in this fort: Every ninth year, the Ephari choosing a bright night without Moon-light, did fit down in some open place, and beheld the Stars in the Element. to fee if they faw anv Star shoot from one place to another: if they did, then they accused their Kings, that they had offended the gods, and did deprive them of their Kingdom, untill fome Oracle came from DELPHES or OLYMPUS, to restore them again. Lyfander then declaring that he had King Leonidas feen a Star flie in the Element, did therefore accuse King Leonidas, and brought forth witnesses a accused by Life gainst him, how he had married a woman of Asia, the which one of King S lencus Lieutenants ander. had given him in marriage, and that he had two children by her; and afterwards being forfaken of his wife that refused him, he returned again into his Country against his will, and had so possessed the Kingdom for lack of a lawfull heir. So following his accufation in this manner against him, he allured Cleombrotus his fon in law, being also of the Kings blood, to make title to the Crown. Leonidas being afraid of the success hereof, took fanctuary in the Temple of Juno, sirnamed Chalcocos; and his daughter with him, who forfook her husband Cleombrotus. Leonidas then being cited to appear in person, and making default they deposed him, and made Cleombrotsus King. In the mean time Lylanders Office expired, and the new Ephor; which succeeded him, did deliver Leonidas again, Leonidas deptiand accused Lysander and Mandroelidas, because against the Law they had abolished all debts, and had ved of his again made new division of lands. When they saw they were openly accused, they incensed both Kingdom, the Kings, that joyning together, they should make the Ephores ordinances of no effect : declaring that their authority was onely erected for the discord of the two Kings, because they should give their voices unto that King that had the best judgement and reason, when the other would willfully withstand both right and reason: and therefore they two agreeing together, might lawfully do what they would, without controlement of any person; and that to result the Kings, was a breaking of the Law, fith that by right the Ephors had no other priviledge and authority, but to be Judges and

For Agefilam being bent to kill Leonidas, who fled to the City of TEGEA, and having also laid men in wait for him by the way, King Agis hearing of it, fent thither other friends of his in whom he put great confidence, and they did accompany Leonidas, and brought him fafely unto the City of Tegen. Thus their purpose taking effect, and no man contrarying them, one man onely Agefilam overthrew all, and dashed a noble LACONIAN law by a shamefull vice, which was coverousness. For he being a great landed King Agir de man, and having the best lands of any man in the Countrey, and owing a great sum of money beceived by Age fides, would neither pay his debts, nor let go his land. Wherefore he periwaded King Agis, that if

Lyfander was also of this opinion: whereby King Agus and he both were deceived by Agestlans subtility. So they New laws fla. commanded all the creditors to bring their bonds, obligations, and bills of debt (which the LACE-New laws flat communicio an the creditors to uting them of the law flat them on a heap together biffied by the DEMONIAN do call Claria) into the Market-place, and there laying them on a heap together

Aratus Gene- would invade PELOPONNESUS. Aratus General of the ACHAIANS had leavied a great Army to withfland their invation, and had also written unto the Ephores, that they should fend them aid. Whereupon they prefently fent King Agis, perceiving also the readiness and good will of the souldiers which were appointed to go with him: for the most part of them were young men and needy, who feeing themselves discharged of the fear of their debts, and hoping also at their return, that the lands likewife should be divided among them, they went with glad hearts, and were obedient to King Agis. So that the Cities where they passed through, wondred how they came through Pelo-PONNESUS, from the one fide to the other, very quietly, without noile or offence to any man. Likewife many Grecians calling to mind the ancient times, told one another, that it was a noble fight then to fee the Army of LACEDEMON when they were led by Agefilam, Lylander, and Leonidas, famous Captains: fith now they faw fo great obedience unto Agis by his fouldiers, who was in manner the youngest man of all his Camp: who also glorying to be content with little, to away with pains, and not to be more costly apparelled, and armed then any private fouldier he had, he wan himself thereby a marvellous love of the people. Howbeit the rich men liked not this change, and were afraid least Agis should give other people example to rife also, and to do the like with theirs, as he had done. As meeting with Aratus by the City of CORINTH, even as he was confulting whether he should fight with his enemie, or not, shewed himself in his counsel then, no rash, but a resolute and valiant man. For he told him, that for his opinion he thought it better to fight, and not to fuffer the war to come any further, leaving the entry into Pelopon-King Agirgare NESUS free to their enemy: nevertheless, that he would do what Aratus thought good, beplace unto A- cause he was the elder, and General also of the ACHAIANS, whom he came not to command, but to aid them. But Baton SINO PIAN writeth that King Agis would not fight, though Aratus was willing: howbeit he hath not read that which Aratus had written for his excuse and justification, alledging there that the farmers and husbandmen having brought all the Corn into their Barns, he thought it better to fuffer the enemies to come farther into their Countrey, rather then to hazard battel, to the loss of the whole Countrey of PELOPONNESUS; and that therefore he licenced all the confederates to depart , and brake up his Army. So King Agis returned home again, greatly honoured of them that ferred with him in his journey, finding the City of SPARTA then in great broile and trouble. For Agestians at that time being one of the Ephores, finding himself rid of the fear which before kept him under, cared not what injury or mischief he did unto any Citizen, so he might get money. For amongst other things, that very year he made them pay beyond all reafon the Tallages and Taxes due unto the Common-wealth for thirteen moneths, adding too the thirteenth moneth above the ordinary time of the yeare. Wherefore perceiving every man hated him, and being afraid of them he had offended, he kept fouldiers about him, armed with their fwords, and so came down into the Marker-place among them. And for the two Kings, he made no account of the one; but of the other that was Agu, he feemed outwardly to make good account, rather for kindreds sake, then for his dignity of a King; and furthermore gave it out abroad, that he would also be one of the Ephore; the next year following. Whereupon, his enemies speedily to prevent King Leonidas the danger, gathered force together, and openly brought King Leonidas from TEGEA, to reftore

Then he sharply taunted him, that being his Son-inlaw, he had conspired against him, to deprive him of his Kingdom, and had driven him out of his Countrey. But then Cleombrotus not having a word to fay, fate still, and made him no answer. Wherepoon his Wife Chelonis, the Daughter of Leonidas, who before was offended for the injury they did The natural her Father, and had left her Husband Cleombrotus, that had usurped the Kingdom from him, to serve love of Cheloher Father in his adversity, and while he was in Sanctuary took part with him also of his misery, and mis, Leonidas afterwards when he went to the City of TEGEA, wore blacks for forrow, being offended with her Daughter, un-Husband: the contrarily then changing her anger with her Husbands fortune and milery, became allo and Husband an humble fuiter with him, fitting down by him, and embracing him, having her two little Sons on either side of them. This notwithstanding, she would not yield to his request; but rifing up with her Husband, gave him one of his Sons, and her felf took the other in her arms ; and then making her prayer before the Altar of the goddess, she went as a banished woman away with her Husband. And truely the example of her vertue was so famous, that if Cleombrotus mind Thegreat verhad not been too much blinded with vain glory, he had cause to think his exile far more happy, tue and love of had not been too much nimed with vall gifty in that of the Kingdom which he possess of the without Chelonit, to her onjoy the love of so noble a Wise as he had, then for the Kingdom which he possess of the Husband Cle-her. Then Leonidus having banished King Cleombreus out of the City, and removing the first & -mbreus. phores, had substituted other in their places, he presently bethought him how he might crastily come by King Agis: First, he perswaded him to come out of the Sanctuary, and to govern the Kingdom fately with him, declaring unto him that his Citizens had forgiven him all that was past, because they knew he was deceived, and subtilly circumvented by Agesslane craft, being a young man, ambitious of honour. Agis would not leave the Sanctuary for Leonidas cunning perswasion, but mistrufted all that he said unto him. Wherefore Leonidas would no more beguile him with fair words. But Amphares, Demochares and Arcesilaus, did oftentimes go to visit King Agis; and otherwhile also they got him out of the Sanctuary with them unto the Bath, and brought him back again into the Temple, when he had bathed. But Amphares having borrowed not long before, certain rich Apparell and Plate of Agessistrata, because he would not re-deliver them again, he determined to be- Amphares betray King Agu, his Mother and Grandmother. And it is reported that he chiefly did ferve Leonidas trayeth King turn, and provoked the Ephores (of which number he was one) against Agis. Now therefore, Asis Agis. keeping all the reft of his time within the Temple, faving when he went upon occasion to the Bath, they determined to intercept him by the way, and to take him when he was out of the Sanctuary. So they watched him one day when he came and bathed, and came and faluted him as their manner was, and feemed to accompany him, sporting and being merry with him, as with a young man their familiar. But when they came to the turning of a street that went towards the Prison, Amphares laying hold on him, being one of the Ephores, faid unto him : I arreft thee Agis, and will bring thee before the Ephores, to give account of thy doings in the Commonwealth. Then Demochares which was a great mighty man, cast his Gown over his ears, and pulled him forward: others also thrust him forward behind him, as they had agreed together. So no man being near them to help Agu, they got King Agin him into Prison. Then came Leonidas incontinently with a great number of Souldiers that were carried to priftrangers, and befet the Prison round about. The Ephores went into the Prison, and fent unto some son.

and that he should pay for his folly. Then another of the Ephores seeming to deal more favourably with him, and to shew him a way how he might escape the condemnation for his sault, asked him if he had not been enticed unto it by Agefilam and Lyfander. Agis answered, that no man compelled him, but that he onely did it to follow the steps of the ancient Lycurgus, to bring the Commonwealth unto the former eftate of his grave Ordinance and Institution. Then the fame Senator asked him again, if he did not repent him of that he had done. The young man boldly anfwered him, that he would never repent him of fo wife and vertuous an enterprile, though he ventured his life for it. Then they condemned him to death, and commanded the Serjeants to carry him into the Decade, which was a place in the Prison where they were strangled that were condemned to die. Demochares perceiving the Serjeants durst not lay hold on him, and likewise that the Souldiers which were strangers, did abbor to commit such a fact contrary to the Law of God and man, to lay violent hands upon the Person of a King, he threatned and reviled them, and dragged ton of a King, Agis perforce into that place called the Decade. Now the rumour ran straight through the City, that King Agie was taken, and a multitude of People were at the Prison doors with Lights and Torches. Thither came also King Agis Mother and Grandfather, shricking out, and praying that the King of Sparta might yet be heard and judged by the People. For this cause they hastened his death the fooner, and were afraid befides, left the People in the night would take him out of their hands by force, if there came any more People thither. Thus King Agu being led to his death, fpied a vergeant lamenting and weeping for him, unto whom he faid: Good fellow, I pray thee weep not for me, for I am an honefter man then they that fo shamefully put me to death; and King Agis, his with those words he willingly put his head into the halter. Amphares then going out of the Prilon into the ftreet, found Agefifrata there, King Agu Mother, who ftraight fell down at his feet: but he taking her up again, in old familiar manner, as being her very friend, told her that they should do King Agu no hurt, and that she might if she would, go and see him. Then she prayed that they would also let her Mother in with her. Amphares said : With a good will : and so put them both into the Prifon-house, and made the doors be shut after them. But when they were within, he first gave Archidamia unto the Serjeants to be put to death, who was a marvellous old woman, and had lived more honourably unto that age then any Lady or Matron befide her in the City. She being executed, he commanded Agefiftrate alfo to come in. Who when the faw the body of her dead Son layed on the ground, and her Mother also hanging on the Gallows, she did her self help the Hangman to pluck her down, and layed her body by her Sons. Then having covered her in decent manner, the layed her down on the ground by the Corps of her Son Agu, and kiffing his cheek, faid: Out alas my Son, thy great modesty, goodness, and clemency, brought thee and us unto this death. Then Amphares peeping in at the door, to see what was done, hearing what she said, came in withall in a great rage, and said: I perceive that thou hast also been of counfell with thy Son, and fithence it is 10, thou shalt also follow him. Then she rising also to be strangled, said : The gods grant yet that this may profit SPARTA. This horrible murder being blown abroad in the City, and the three dead bodies also brought out of Prison, the sear though it were great amongst the People, could not keep them back from apparent shew of grief, and manifest have against Leonidas and Amphares, thinking that there was never a more wicked and crueller fact committed in SPARTA, fince the DORIANS came to dwell in PELOPONNESUS, For the very Enemies themselves in Battle, would not willingly lay hands upon the Kings of Lathe Enemies CEDEMON, but did forbear as much as they could possible, both for fear and reverence they bare unto their Majefty. For in many great Battles and Conflicts which the LACEDEMONI-King of Luce ANS had against the GRECIANS, there was never any King of LACEDAMON slain before Philips time, but (Itembrotus onely, who was flain with a Dart at the Battle of LEUCTRES. Some write also that the MESSINIANS hold opinion, that there Ariflomenes flew Theopompusi howbeit the LACEDEMONIANS faid, that he was but hurt, not flain. But hereof there are divers opinions: but it is certain that Agis was the first King whom the Ephores ever put to death; for that he had layed a plot of a noble device, and worthy of SPARTA, being of that age when men do easily pardon them that offend : and was rather to be accused of his friends then of his enemies, because he had faved Leonidas life, and had trusted other men, as the best natured young Now Agu having suffered in this fort, Leonidas was not quick enough to take Archidamus his Broneth Chomens ther also, for he fled presently: yet he brought Agu Wife out of her house by force, with a little Life, Cleamener boy she had by him, and married her unto his Son Cleamenes, who was yet under age to marry; fearing left this young Lady (hould be bestowed elsewhere, being indeed a great Heir, and of a rich House, and the Daughter of Gylippus, called by her name Agiatie; besides that, she was the fairest woman Displace of at that time in all GREECS, and the vertuousest, and best conditioned. Wherefore for divers reDisplace and spects she prayed she might not be forced to it. But now being at leagth married with Cleomenes, she ever hated Leonidas to the death, and yet was a good and loving Wife unto her young Husband, who immediately after he was married unto her, fell greatly in fancy with her, and for compassion fake (as it feemed) he thanked her for the love the bare unto her first Husband, and for the loving remembrance the had of him, informach as he himself many times would fall in talk of it, and would be inquifitive how things had passed, taking great pleasure to hear of Agis wise counfell and purpose. For Cleaments was as defirous of honour, and had as noble a mind as Agu, and was born also to temperance, and moderation of life, as so few in like manner was a howbeir, he had not that shamefast modelty and lenity which the other had, but was somewhat more stirring of nature, and readier to put any good matter in execution. So he thought it good honesty to bring the Citizens (if he could) to be contented to live after an honest fort : but contrarily, he thought it no dishonesty to bring them unto good life, by compussion also. Furthermore, the manners of the Citizens of SPARTA giving themselves over to itleness and pleasure, did nothing like him at all: neither that the King and fulfer the Commonwealth to be ruled as they lifted, to no man impeached his pleasure, and that they did fer him shone; informed as no man regarding the profit of the Commonwealth, every man was for himfelt and his Family. And contrarily it was not lawfull for any man to speak for the exercises of the youth, for their education in temperance, and for the reftoring again of equality of thie, the preforment whereof was the onely cause of the late death of Agis. They say also, that Chamenes being a young stripling, had heard some disputation of Philotophy, when the Philosopher Spharas, of the Countrey of BORYSTHENES, came to LACE-DEMON, and lovingly stayed thereito teach young men and children. He was one of the chiefest spharus a Phi-Scholars of Zenon CITIAN, and delighted (as it feemed) in Cleomenes noble mind, and had a losopher of great defire to prick him forward unto honour. For as it is reported, that the ancient Leonidas being demanded what Poet he thought Tyrtaus to be, answered, he was good to flatter young mens minds: for he fet their hearts on fire by his Verles, when they began to fight any Battle, fearing no danger, they were so encouraged by them. So the Stoick Discipline is somewhat dangerous, for the stout and valiant minds, which otherwise doth make desperate; and when they are joyned unto a grave and gentle nature, first it lifteth up his heart, and then maketh him talte the profit thereof. Now Leonidas (the Father of Chomenes) being deceased, and he himself also come unto the Crown, finding that the Citizens of Sparta at that time were very diffolite, that the rich men followed their pleasure and profit, taking no care for the Commonwealth, that the poor men also for very want and need, went with no good life and courage to the Wars, neither cared for the bringing up of their children; and that he himself had but the name of a King, and the Ephori the absolute authority to do what they listed; at his first coming to his Kingdom, he determined to alter the whole State and Government of the Commonwealth. Who having a friend called Xenare, that had been his Lover in his youth (which the LACEDEMONIANS called Empristee, as much as, inspired) he began to found his opinion, asking what manner of man King Agis had been, and by what reason, and whose advice he had followed in his attempt, for the reformation of the Commonwealth. Xenares at the first did not willingly rehearse the things unto him, declaring every thing what had paffed. But when he found that Cleomenes was affected unto King Agis intent, and still defired to hear of it, then Xenares sharply and angerly reproved him, and told him he was not wife, nor well advised: and at length would no more come and talk with him as he was wont; yet making no man privy why he abstained from coming to him, but told them that asked him, he knew a cause well enough why. Xenares now having thus refused him, and thinking all the rest would do the like : to bring this matter to pass, he took this resolution with himself. Because he thought he might the rather do it in War, than in Peace, he fet the City of SPARTA and the ACHAIANS at variance together, who did themselves give the first occasion to be complained upon. For Aratus being the Cleomenes did President and chief of all the ACHAIANS, had practifed a long time to bring all PELOPONNE- fet the Lacedasus into one body; and had therefore onely sustained great troubles in Wars, and at home in Montains toge-Peace: thinking that there was no other way to deliver them from forraign Wars. Now when ther by the he had won all the other people to be of his opinion, there remained no more but the ELIANS, ears. the LACEDEMONIANS, and a few of the ARCADIANS, which were subject to the LACE-DEMONIANS. When King Leonidas was dead, Aratus began to invade the ARCADIANS, those specially that bordered upon the ARGIVES, to prove how the LACEDEMONIANS would take it, making no account of Cleomenes, being but a young King, and had no experience of Wars, Thereupon the Ephori fent Gleomenes unto ATHENIUM (a Temple of Minerva hard by the City of Belbina) with an Army to take it, because it was a passage and entrey into the Countrey of LACONIA; howbeit the place at that time was in question betwixt the MEGALIPOLITANS and the LACEDEMONIANS. Chomenes got it, and fortified it. Aratus making no complaint otherwife of the matter, ftole out one night with his Army to fet upon the TEGEANS and ORCHOME-NIANS, hoping to have taken those Cities by Treason. But the Traytors that were of the Confederacy, their hearts failed them when they should have gone about it; so that Aratus returned, having loft his Journey, thinking that this fecret attempt of his was not discovered. But Cleomenes finely wrote unto him as his friend, and asked him, whither he had led his Army by night. Aratus returned answer again, that understanding Cleomenes meant to fortifie Belbina, he went forth with his Army, thinking to have let him. Cleomenes wrote again unto him, and faid, he did believe that which he spake was true : howbeit he earnestly requested him (if it were no trouble to him) to advertise him why he brought scaling-laders and lights after him. Aratus smiling at this mock, asked what this young man was. Democrites LACEDAMONIAN being a banished man out of his Countrey, answered : if thou hast any thing to do against the LACEDAMONIANS, thou hadft need make hafte, before this young Cockrell have on his fours. Then Cleomenes being in the Field in the Countrey of ARCADIA, with a few Horsemen and three hundred Footmen onely, the Ephori being afraid of Wars, sent for him to return again. His back was no sooner turned, obeying their commandment, but Aratus suddenly took the City of CAPHYES.

Thereupon the Ephors incontinently fent Cleomenes back again with his Army: who took the Fort of METHYDRIUM, and burnt the Borders of the ARGIVES. The ACHAIANS came against him journey into the Country of with an Army of twenty thousand Footmen, and a thousand Horsemen led by Aristomachus. Cleomenes met with them by the City of PALANTIUM, and offered Battle. But Aratus quaking at the the Argivet. means ince with them by man, would not fuffer Aristamachus to hazard Battle, but went his way the victory of hardiness of this young man, would not fuffer Aristamachus to hazard Battle, but went his way derided by the ACHAIANS, and despised by the LACEDEMONIANS, who in all were not above five thouland fighting men. Cleomenes courage being now lift up, and bravely speaking to his Citizens, he remembred them of a faying of one of their ancient Kings, that the LACEDEMONIANS never enquired what number their Enemies were, but where they were. Shortly after the ACHAI-ANS making War with the ELIANS, Cleomenes was sent to aid them, and met with the Army of the ACHAIANS by the Mountain Lyceum, as they were in their return; he fetting upon them, gave them the overthrow, flew a great number of them, and took many also Prisoners, that the rumour ran through GREECE, bow Aratu felf was slain. Cleomenes wifely taking the occasion which this Victory gave him, he went straight to the City of MANTINEA, and taking it upon a fudden, when no manknew of his coming, he put a strong Garrison into it. Now the LACEDEMO-NIANS hearts failing them, and refifting Cleomenes enterprifes, over-wearying them with Wars, he went about to fend Archidamus, King Agis brother, being then at MESSINA, unto whom the Kingdom of right belonged by the other House; supposing that he should easily weaken the power of the Ephores, by the Authority of the two Kings, if both of them joined together. Which when the murtherers of King Agis understood, being afraid that Archidamus returning from exile, he would be revenged of them, they fecretly received him into the City, and found the means to bring him into SPARTA. But when they had him, they put him straight to death, whether it was unwitting to Cleomenes (as Phylarchus plainly teftifieth) or elfe with his privity, suffering them to make him away, by perswasion of his friends. But it is a clear case, the City was burdened withall, because probable matter fell out, that they had compelled Cleomenes to do it. Nevertheless, he holding still his first determination, to alter the state of the Commonwealth of SPARTA, as soon as he could possible, he fo fed the Ephores with Money, that he brought them to be contented he should make War. He had also won many other Citizens by the means of his Mother Cratesiclea, who furnisht him with Money, that he lacked not to honour him withall : and further, married as it is reported (though otherwise she meant not to marry) for her Sons sake, unto one of the valiantest men of all the City. So Cleomenes leading his Army into the Field, wan a place within the territory of MEGALIPO-LIS, called LEUCTRA. The ACHAIANS also being quickly come to their aid, led by Aratus, they straight fought a Battle by the City felf, where Cleomenes had the worst on the one side of his Army. Howbeit Aratus would not fuffer the ACHAIANS to follow them, because of bogs and quavernires, but founded the retreat. But Lyfiadas a MEGALIPOLITAN being angry withall, caused the Horsemen he had about him to follow the Chase, who pursued so fiercely, that they came amongst Vines, Walls and Ditches, where he was drivento disperse his men, and yet could not get out. Cleamenes perceiving it, fent the light Horsemen of the TARENTINES and CRETANS Liftal finin. against hint: of whom Lystadas valiantly fighting was slain. Then the LACEDEMONIANS beCleomene: Vi- ing couragious for this Victory, came with great cries; and giving a fierce charge upon the ACHAI-ANS, overthrew their whole Army, and flew a marvellous number of them; but yet Cleomenes at their request suffered them to take up the dead bodies of their men to bury them. For Lysiadas Corps, he caused it to be brought unto him, and putting a Purple Robeupon it, and a Crown on his head, fent it in this array unto the very Gates of the City of MEGALIPOLIS. It was that rant of Mega- felf Lysiadas, who giving over the Tyranny and Government of Megalipolis, made it a Popular State, and free City, and joyned it to the ACHAIANS. After this Victory, Cleomenes that determined greater matters and attempts, perswaded himself that if he might once come to stablish the Affairs of the Commonwealth at SPARTA to his mind, he might then eafily overcome the ACHAIANS, brake with his Father-in-law Megiftonus, and told him that it was necessary to take away the Authority of the Ephores, and to make division of the Lands among the SPARTANS: and then being brought to equality, to encourage them to recover the Empire of GREECE again unto the LACEDEMONIANS, which their Predecessors before them held and enjoyed. Megistonus granting his good will and furtherance, joyned two or three of his friends more unto him. It chanced at that time, that one of the Ephores lying in the Temple of Passiphae, had a marvellous dream in the night. For he thought he saw but one Chair standing where the Ephori did use to sit to give audience, and that the other four which were wont to be there, were taken away; and that marvelling at it, he heard a voice out of the Temple that faid, That was the best for SPARTA. He declaring this Dream the next morning unto Cleomenes, it somewhat troubled him at the first, thinking that he came to feel him, for that he had heard fome inckling of his intent. But when he perswaded himself that the other meant good faith, and lied not unto him, being bolder then before, he went forward with his purpose; and taking with him unto the Camp all those SPARTANS which he suspected to be against his enterprise, he went and took the Cities of HEREA and ALSEA, Confederates of the ACHAIANS, and victualled ORCHOMENA, and went and camped before the City of MANTINEA. In fine, he so wearied and over-harried the LACED & MONIANS by long journeys, that at length they belought him he would let them remain in ARCADIA, to repose themselves there. In the mean time, Cleamenes with his strangers which he had hired, returned again unto SPAR-TA, and imparted his intent by the way unto them he trufted beft, and marched at his own cafe, AGIS and CLEOMENES.

that he might take the Ephores at Supper. When he came near unto the City, he sent Euryclidas before, into the Hall of the Ephores, as though he brought them news out of the Camp from him. After him, he fent also Thericon and Phabis, and two other that had been brought up with him. whom the LACEDEMONIANS called the SAMOTHRACIANS, taking with them a few Souldiers. Now whilft Enryclidas was talking with the Ephores, they also came in upon them with their Swords drawn. and did fer upon the Ephores. Agefilam was hurt first of all, and falling down, made as though he had been flain; but by little and little he crept out of the Hall, and got fecretly into a Chappel consecrated unto Fear, the which was wont ever to be kept shut, but then by chance was left open : when he was come in, he shut the door fast to him. The other four of the Ephores were slain presently, Cleomenes sleet and above ten moe besides, which came to desend them. Furthermore, for them that sate still and stirred not, they killed not a man of them, neither did keep any man that was defirous to go out of the City ; but moreover, they pardoned Agesilans, who came the next morning out of the Chappel of Fear: Amongst the LACEDEMONIANS in the City of SPARTA, there are not onely Temples of Fear and Divers Tom-Death, but also of Laughter, and of many other such passions of the mind. They do worship Fear, ples at Sparta, not as other spirits and devils that are hurtfull, but because they are perswaded that nothing preserveth of Fear, Death, a Commonwealth better then fear. Wherefore the Ephori (as Arifotle witneffeth) when they are fancies. created, do by publick Proclamation command all the SPARTANS to shave their chins, and to obey the Law, left they should make them feel the rigour of the Law. They brought in the shaving of their chins, in my opinion, to enure young men to obey the Magistrates even in trifles. Moreover, it seems that men in old time did efteem fortitude to be no taking away of fear, but rather a fear and lothness to incur shame. For commonly those that are most afraid to offend the Law, are in the Field most va- The valiancest liant against their Enemies, and shun no perill to win fame and honest reputation. And therefore it men are most was wifely faid of one:

That fear cannot be without shamefastness. And fo Homer in a certain place made Helen fay unto King Priamus: Of truth I do confes dear father-in-law, Tou are the man of whom I stand in av. And reverence most of all that ever I saw. And in another place, speaking of the GRECIAN Souldiers, he saith thus: For fear of their Captains they spake not a word.

For men do use to reverence them whom they fear. And this was the cause why the Chappel of Fear The Chappel was by the Hall of the Ephores, having in manner a Princely and absolute Authority. The next mor- of Fear joined ning Cleomenes banished by Trumpet fourfcore Citizens of Sparta, and overthrew all the Chairs of to the Hall of ning (teomenes bandined by Prumper four Contents of Sparia, and over the want to change the Ephores but one onely, the which he referved for himself to fit in to give audience. Then calling the Ephores the Ephores but one onely, the which he referved for himself to fit in to give audience. the People to Councill, he gave them account of his doings, and told them that Lycurgus had joyned of King Cleothe Senators with the Kings, and how the City had been governed a long time by them, without help menes couching of any other Officers. Notwithstanding, afterwards the City having great Wars with the MESSI- the first Original NIANS, the Kings being always employed in that War, whereby they could not attend the affairs of nal of the Ethe Commonwealth at home, did choose certain of their friends to sit in judgement in their steads. Phores. to determine controversies of Law, which were called Ephores, and did govern long time as the Kings Ministers; howbeit that afterwards by little and little, they took upon them absolute government by themselves. And for manifest proof hereof, you see that at this present time when the Ephori do fend for the King, the first and second time he refuseth to come, but the third time he rifeth and goeth unto them. The first man that gave the Ephores this Authority, was Afteropus, one of the Epho- Afteropus the res, many years after the first institution of the Kings: and yet if they had governed discreetly, per- first man that adventure they might have continued longer. But they licentioully abuling their own Authority, by gave authority supporefing the lawfull Governours instituted of old time, taking upon them to benish some of their to be Ephores. suppressing the lawfull Governours instituted of old time, taking upon them to banish some of their Kings, and putting other of them also to death, without Law and Justice, and threatning others, that desire to restore that noble and former blessed Government unto Sparta again : all these things, I fay, are in no wife to be suffered any longer. And therefore if it had been possible to have banished all these plagues of the Commonwealth out of SPARTA, brought from foraigne Nations (I mean, Pleasures, Pastimes, Money, Debts, and Usuries, and others yet more ancient, Poverty and Riches) he might then have efteemed himself the happiest King that ever was, if like a good Physician he had cured his Countrey in that infection, without grief or forrow. But in that he was conftrained to begin with blood, he followed Lycurgin example, who being neither King nor other Magiftrate, but a private Citizen onely, taking upon him the Authority of the King, boldly came into the Market-place with force and armed men, and made King Charilaus that then reigned so afraid, that he was driven to take Sanctuary in one of the Temples. But the King being a Prince of a noble nature, and loving the honour of his Countrey, took part with Lyeurgus, adding to, his advice and counfell, for the alteration of the state of the Government of the Commonwealth, which he did confirm. Hereby then it appeareth, that Lyourgus faw it was a hard thing to alter the Commonwealth without force and fear: the which he notwithstanding had used with as great modesty and discretion as might be possible, banishing them that were against the profit and wealth of LA-CEDEMON, given all the Lands of the Countrey also to be equally divided amongst them, and fetting all men clear that were in debt. And furthermore, that he would make a choice and proof of the strangers, to make them free Citizens of Sparta whom he knew to be honest men,

thereby to defend their City the better by force of Arms: to the end that from thenceforth we may no more see our Countrey of LACONIA spoiled by the ETOLIANS and ILLYRIANS, for lack of men to defend themselves against them. Then he began first himself to make all the goods common, and after him Megistronus his Father-in-law, and consequently all his other friends. Then he caused the Land alfo to be divided, and ordained every banished man a part, whom he himself had exiled, promifing that he would receive them again into the City, when he had established all things. So when he had replenished the number of the Citizens of SPARTA, with the choicest honest men their neighbours, he made four thousand Footmen well armed, and taught them to use their Pikes with both hands, in stead of their Darts with one hand, and to carry their Targets with a good strong handle, and not buckled with a leather thong. Afterwards he took order for the education of children, and to reftore the ancient LACONIAN Discipline again: and did all these things in manner by the help of Spharus the Philosopher. Insomuch as he had quickly set up again School-houses for children, and also brought them to the old order of diet: and all but a very few, without compulsion were willing to fall to their old inflitution of life. Then because the name of one King should not of fend any man, he made his Brother Euclidas King with him. But this was the first time that ever the two Kings were of one House but then. Furthermore, understanding that the ACHAIANS and Aratm were of opinion, that he durft not come out of LACEDEMON, for fear to leave it in perill of revolting, because of the late change and alteration in the Commonwealth, he thought it an honourable attempt of him to make his Enemies fee the readiness and good will of his Army. Thereupon he invaded the Territories of the MEGALIPOLITANS, and brought away a great prey and booty, after he had done great hurt unto his Enemies. Then having taken certain Players and Minstrels that came from Messina, he set up a stage within the Enemies Countrey, made a game of forty Mina's for the Victor, and fate a whole day to look upon them, for no pleafure he took in the fight o, it, but more to despight the Enemies withall, in making them see how much he was stronger then they to make fuch a maygame in their own Countrey, in despight of them. For otherwise of all the Armies of the GRECIANS, or Kings in all GREECE, there was no Army but his onely, that was without Players, Minstrels, Fools and Juglers: for his Camp onely was clean of fuch rabble and foolery, and all the young men fell to fome exercise of their bodies, and the old men also to teach them. And if they chanced to have any vacant time, then they would pleasantly be one merry with another, in giving some pretty fine mock after the LACONIAN manner. And what profit they got by King Cleame. that kind or exercise, we have written it at large in Lycurgus Life. But of all these things, the King nes the teacher himfelf was their Schoolmafter and example, shewing himfelf very temperate of life, and plain withand example of out curiofity, no more then any private Souldier of all his Camp: the which were great helps unto him in his enterprizes he made in GREECE. For the GRECIANS having cause of suit and negotiation with other Kings and Princes, did not wonder fo much at their pomp and riches, as they did abhor and deteft their pride and infolency: so disdainfully they would answer them that had to do with them. But contrarily when they went unto Cleomenes, who was a King in name and deed as they were, finding no purple Robes nor stately Mantles, nor rich embroidered Beds, nor a Prince to be spoken to but by Mellengers, Gentlemen-uthers, and supplications, and yet with a great ado: and feeing him also come plainly apparelled unto them, with a good countenance, and courteoully answering the matters they came for : he thereby did marvelloully win their hearts and good wills, that when they returned Cleamenes mo home, they faid he onely was the worthy King that came of the race of Hercules. Now for his diet at his board, that was very straight and LACONIAN-like, keeping onely three boards: and if he chanced to feaft any Ambaffadors or other his friends that came to fee him, he then added to, two other boards; and besides made his men see that his fare should be amended, not with pastry and conserves, but with more store of meat, and some better wine then ordinary. For he one day reproved one of his friends, that bidding strangers to supper, he gave them nothing but black broth, and brown bread onely, according to the LACONIAN manner. Now, faid he, we must not use strangers so hardly aster our manner. The Board being taken up, another little Table was brought with three feet, whereupon they fet a bowl of Copper full of wine, and two filver cups of a bottle a piece, and certain other few filver pots befides: fo every man drank what they lifted, and no man was forced to drink more then he would. Furthermore, there was no sport, nor any pleasant song sung to make the company merry, for it needed not. For Cleomene, self would entertain them with some pretty question or pleasant tale: whereby as his talk was not severe and without pleasure, so was it also pleasant withtertainment at out infolency. For he was of opinion, that to win men by gifts or money, as other Kings and Princes did, was but base and clown-like: but to seek their good wills by courteous means and pleasantness, and therewith to mean good faith, that he thought most fit and honourable for a Prince. For this was his mind, that there was no other difference betwixt a friend and hireling, but that the one is won with Money, and the other with civility and good entertainment. The first therefore that received King helping him to drive out the Garrison of the ACHAIANS, they yielded themselves unto him. But he referring them to the use and government of their own Laws and liberty, departed from thence the Cleomenerless. fame day, and went unto the City of TEGEA. Shortly after he compassed about ARCADIA, and eth his Army came unto PHERES in ARCADIA, determining one of the two, either to give the ACHAIANS against Aratus Battle, or to bring Aratus out of favour with the People, for that he had suffered him to spoil and deftroy their Countrey. Hyperbatas was at that time General of the ACHAIANS, but Aratus dld bear all the sway and authority. Then the ACHAIANS coming into the Field with all their

People armed, and encamping by the City of DYMES, near unto the Temple of Hecatombaum. Cleomenes going thither, lay betwirt the City of DYMES that was against him, and the Camp of his Enemies : which men thought a very unwife part of him. Howbeit, valiantly provoking the ACHA-IANS, he procured them to the Battle, overthrew them, made them fly, and flew a great number in the Field, and took many of them also prisoners. Departing from thence, he went and fet upon The Victory the City of LANGON, and drave the Garrison of the ACHAIANS out of it, and restored the City of Cloment again unto the Elians. The Achaians being then in very hard flate, Aratus that of cu- Adminst. from was wont to be their General (or at the leaft once in two years) refused now to take the charge, notwithstanding the ACHAIANS did specially pray and entreat him; the which was an ill act of him, to letanother steer the rudder, in so dangerous a storm and tempest. Therefore the A-CHAIANS fent Ambassadors unto Cleomenes to treat of peace, unto whom it seemed he gave a very tharp answer. After that, he fent unto them, and willed them onely to refigne the Seigniory of GREECE unto him: and that for all other matters he would deal reasonably with them, and prefently deliver them up their Towns and Prisoners again, which he had taken of theirs. The ACHA-IANS being glad of peace with these conditions, wrote unto Cleomenes that he should come unto the City of LERNA, where the diet and generall affembly should be kept to consult thereon. It chanced then that Cleamenes marching thither, being very hot, drank cold water, and fell on fuch a bleeding withall, that his voice was taken from him, and he almost stifled. Wherefore he sent the ACHAI-ANS their chiefest prisoners home again, proroguing the Parliament till another time, and returned back to LACEDAMON. It is supposed certainly, that this let of his coming to the diet, was the onely cause of the utter destruction of GREECE: the which otherwise was in good way to have rifen again, to have been delivered from the present miseries, and extream pride and covetousness of the MACEDONIANS. For Aratus, either for that he trufted not Cleomenes, or for that he was afraid of his power, or that he otherwise envyed his honour and prosperity, to see him risen to fuch incredible greatness in so short a time; and thinking it also too great shame and dishonour to him, to fuffer this young man in a moment to deprive him of his great honour and power, which he had possessed so long time, by the space of thirty years together, ruling all GREECE: first he fought by force to terrifie the ACHAIANS, and to make them break off from this peace. But in fine, finding that they little regarded his threats, and that he could not prevail with them, for that to his Counthey were afraid of Cleomenes valiantness and courage, whose request they thought unreasonable, trev. for that he fought but to reftore PELOPONNESUS unto her former ancient state again : he fell then into a practife far unhonest for a GRECIAN, very infamous for himself, but most dishonourable for the former noble acts he had done. For he brought Antigonus into GREECE, and in his age filled the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS with MACEDONIANS, whom he himself in his youth had driven thence, had taken from them the Castle of CORINTH, and had alwaies been an enemy of the Kings: but specially of Antigonus, of whom before he had spoken all the ill he could, as appeareth in his writings, faying that he took marvellous pains, and did put himfelf into many dangers, to deliver the City of ATHENS from the Garrison of the MACEDONIANS. And yet notwithstanding he brought them armed with his own hands, not into his Countrey onely, but into his own house, yea even into the Ladies chambers and closets: disdaining that the King of LACE-DAMON, descending of the blood-royal of Hercules (who setting up again the ancient manner of life of his Countrey, did temper it as an instrument of musick out of tune, and brought it to the good, ancient, and lober discipline, and DORICAN life instituted by Lycingus) should be called and written King of the SICYONIANS, and of the TRICCEIANS. And furthermore, flying them that were contented with brown bread, and with the plain course caps of the LACEDEMONIANS, and that went about to take away riches (which was the chiefest matter they did accuse Cleomenes for) and to provide for the poor, he went and put himself and all ACHAIA unto the Crown and Diadem, the purple robe, and proud imperious commandment of the MACEDONIANS, fearing left men thould think that Cleomenes could command him. Furthermore his folly was such, that having Garlands of Flowers on his head, he did facrifice unto Antigonus, and fing Songs in praise of his honour, as if he had been a god, where he was but a rotten man confumed away. This that we have written of Aratus (who was endued with many noble vertues, and a worthy GRECIAN) is not fo much to accuse him, as to make us see the frailty and weakness of mans nature: the which, though it have never fo excellent vertues, cannot yet bring forth fuch pertect fruit, but that it hath ever fome maim and blemish. Now when the ACHAIANS were met again in the City of Argos, to hold the Selfion of their Parliament before prorogued, and Cleomenes also being come from TEGEA, to be at that Parliament, every man was in hope of good peace. But Aratus then, who was agreed before on the chiefest Articles of the Capitulations with Antigonus, fearing that Cleomenes by fair words or force would cause the People to bring that he desired, sent to let him understand, that he should but come himself alone into the City, and for fafety of his person, they would give him three hundred Hostages: or otherwise, if he would not leave his Army, that then they would give audience without the City, in the places of exercises, called Cyllarabium. When Cleomenes had heard their Answer, he told them they had done him great wrong; for they should have advertifed him of it before he had taken his journey, and not now when he was almost hard at their Gates, to fend him back again, with a flea in his ear. Thereupon he wrote a Letter unto the Council of the ACHAIANS, altogether full of complaints against Aratus. On the other side also, Aratus in his Oration to the Council, inveighed with bitter words against Cleomenes.

AGIS and CLEOMENES. Thereupon Cleomenes departing with speed, fent an Herauld to proclaim Wars against the ACHAI-ANS, not in the City of Argos, but in the City of EGION (as Aratu writeth) meaning to fet upon them being unprovided. Hereupon all ACHAIA was in an uprore : for divers Cities did prefently revolt against the ACHAIANS, because the common Peoplehoped after the division of Lands, and discharging of their debts. The Noblemen also in many places were offended with Aratus, because he practifed to bring the MACEDONIANS into the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS. Cleaments therefore hoping well for all these respects, brought his Army into ACHAIA, and at his first coming took the City of PALLENA, and drave out the Garrison of the ACHAIANS: and after that, wan also the Cities of Pheneum and Pantelium. Now the Achaians fearing some treason in Corinth and Sicyone, sent certain Horsemen out of the City of Argos, to keep those Cities. The ARGIVES in the mean time, attending the celebration of the Feaft at the Games

City full of People that were come to fee the Feafts and Games, and that affailing them upon the fudden, he should put them in a marvellous fear: brought his Army in the night hard to the Walls of the City of Argos, and at his first coming wan a place they called Aspis, a very strong place about the Theatre, and ill to come unto. The ARGIVES were fo amazed at it, that no man would take upon him to defend the City, but received Cleomenes Garrison, and gave him twenty Hostages, promiling thenceforth to be true Confederates unto the LACEDEMONIANS, under his charge and conduct. The which doubtless wan him great fame, and encreased his power: for that the ancient Kingsof Lacedamon, could never before with any policy or device, win the City of Argos. for King Pyrrhus one of the most valiantest and warlikest Princes that ever was, entring the City of ARGOS by force, could not keep it, but was flain there, and the most part of his Army: whereby City of Argan. every man wondered greatly at the diligence and counfel of Cleomenes. And where every manded mock him before, when Cleomenes faid that he would follow Solon and Lycurgus, in making the Citizens Goods common, and discharging all debts: they were then clearly perswaded, that he onely was the cause and mean of that great change which they saw in the courage of the SPARTANS, who were before so weak and out of heart, that they having no courage to defend themselves, the ÆTOLIANS entring LACONIA with an Army, took away at one time fifty thousand Slaves. Whereupon an old man of Sparta pleafantly faid at that time, that their Enemies had done them a great pleasure, to rid their Countrey of LACONIA of such a rabble of rascals. Shortly after, they Lycurgui Laws being entred again into the former ancient Discipline of Lycurgui, as if Lycurgui felf had been alive to have trained them unto it, they thewed themselves very valiant, and obedient also unto their Magistrates, whereby they recovered again the commandment of all Greece, and the Countrey also of Peloponnesus. After Cleomenes had taken the City of Argos, the Cities also of CLEONES and PHLIUNTH, did yield themselves unto him. Aratus in the mean time remained at CORINTH, and there did bufily accuse them which were suspected to savour the LACED. MONIANS. But when news was brought him that ARGOS was taken, and that he perceived also the City of Corinth did lean unto Cleomenes part, and drave away the Achaians, he then calling the People to Council in CORINTH, secretly stole to one of the Gates of the City, and caufing his horfe to be brought unto him, took his back, and gallopped for life unto the (ity of SICYONE. When the CORINTHIANS heard of it, they took their Horsebacks also, striving who should bethere soonest, and posted in such haste unto Cleomenes at the City of Argos, that many of them (as Aratm writeth) killed their Horfes by the way : howbeit Cleomenes was very much offended with them, for that they had let him scape their hands. But Aratus faith further, that Magiftonus came to him from Cleomenes, and offered him a great fum of Money to deliver him the Caftle of CORINTH, wherein there was a great Garrison of the ACHAIANS. But he anfwered again, that things were not in his power, but rather that he was subject to their power. Now Cleamenes departing from the City of Argos, overcame the TROEZENIANS, the EPIDAU-RIANS, and the HERMIONIANS. After that he came unto CORINTH, and prefently introched the Castle there round about, and sending for Aratus friends and sactors, commanded them to keep his houle and goods carefully for him; and fent Trytimallus MESSINIAN again unto him, to pray him to be contented that the Castle might be kept indifferently betwirt the ACHAIANS and LACEDEMONIANS, promifing him privately to double the Pension that King Prolomy gave him. But Aratus refufing it, fent his Son unto Antigonus with other Hostages, and periwaded the ACHAIANS to deliver up the Cattle of CORINTH into Anigonus hands. Cleomenes understanding it, entred with his Army into the Countrey of the SICYONIANS, and destroyed it as he went, and took Aratus Goods and Money of the gift of the CORINTHIANS by Decree. Now Antigonus in the mean time being passed the Mountain of Gerania with a great Power, Cleomenes determined not to fortifie the ISTHMUS or the Straight of PELOPONNESUS, but the wales of the Mountains of Onienes; determining to keep every one of them against the MACE-DONIANS, with intent to confume them rather by time, then to fight a Battle with an Army fo good Souldiers, and well trained as they were. Cleomenes following this determination, did put Antigonus to great trouble, because he had not in time provided for Corn, and could not win the palfage by force, for that Cleomenes kept it with such Guard and Souldiers. Then Anisgonus stealing secretly into the Haven of Lecheum, he was stoutly repulsed, and lost a number of his men: whereupon Cleomenes and his men being couragious for this Victory, went quietly to supper. Anrigonss on the other fide fell into despair, to fee him brought by necessity into such hard teams. AGIS and CLEOMENES.

Wherefore he determined to go to the Temple of June, and from thence to pass his Army by Sea into the City of Sicyone, the which required a long time, and great preparation. But the same night there came fome of Aratus friends of the Argives, who coming from Argos by Sea. brought news that the ARGIVES, were rebelled against Cleomenes. The practifer of this rebellion The Argives was one Aristoteles, who easily brought the People unto it, that were already offended with Cleo- do rebell 2menes, that had promised to passa Law for the clearing of debts, but performed it not according to gainft Cleametheir expectation. Wherefore, Aratus with a thousand and five hundred men which Antigonus ner. gave him, went by Sea unto Epidaurum. Howbeit Aristoteles tarried not his coming, but taking them of the City with him, went and befieged the Garrison of the LACEDEMONIANS within the Caffle, being aided by Timoxenss, with the ACHAIANS that came from SICYONE. Cleomenes receiving advertisement hereof, about the second Watch of the night, sent for Megistons in haste. and commanded him in anger speedily to go and aid their men that were in the City of Argos. For it was Megistonus himself that promised Cleomenes the fidelity of the ARGIVES, and that kept him from driving them out of the City, which he suspected. So sending him away forthwith with two thousand men, he attended Antigonus, and comforted the Corinthians the best he could: advertising them that it was but a little mutiny of a few, that chanced in the City of ARGOS. Megistonus being come to ARGOS, and slain in Battle, fighting for the LACEDE-MONIANS in Garrison there (who being in great distress, and scant able to keep the Castle against the Enemies) fent fundry Messengers unto Cleomenes, to pray him to fend them immediate aid. Cleomenes then being afraid that the Enemies having taking ARGOS, would stop his way to return back into his Countrey, who having opportunity fafely to spoil LACONIA, and also to besiege the City felf of SPARTA that had but a few men to defend it, he departed with his Army from CORINTH. Immediately after came Antigonus and took it from him, and put a ftrong Garri- Cleomenes loft fon into it. When Cleomenes came before the City of Argos, he scaled the Walls, and breaking the City of the Vaults and Arches of the place called Aspis, entred into the City, and joyned with his Garrison Corinib. there, which yet relifted the ACHAIANS: and taking other parts of the fame also, affaulted the Walls, and cleared the streets in such fort, that not an Enemy durst be seen, for fear of the Archers of the CRETANS. In the mean time, when he faw Antigonus afar off, coming down the hills into the Valley with his Footmen, and that his Horsemen also came upon the Cleoments lost spur into the City, despairing then that he could any longer keep it, he gathered all his men the City of together, and fately going down by the Walls, retired without loss of any man. So, when in Argos. short time he had conquered much, and had almost won all within PELOPONNESUS, in shorter space also he lost all again. For, of the Consederates that were in his Camp, some did prefently forfake him, others also immediately after surrendred up the Towns unto Antigonus. Cleomenes being thus oppressed with the forume of War, when he came back to TEGEA with the rest of his Army, news came to him in the night from LACEDÆMON, which grieved him as much as the loss of all his Conquests: for he was advertised of the death of his Wife Agiates, whom he loved so dearly, that in the middest of his chiefest prosperity and Victories, he made often journeys to SPARTA to fee her. It could not be but a marvellous grief unto Cleomenes. The death of who being a young man, had loft to vertuous and fair a young Lady, to dearly beloved of him; Asiates, King and yet he gave not place to his forrow, neither did grief overcome his noble courage, but he Gleomenes wife used the self-same voice, apparell, and countenance that he did before. Then taking order with his private Captains about his Affairs, and having provided also for the safety of the TEGEANS, he went the next morning by break of day unto SPARTA. After he had privately lamented and forrowed for his Wives death, with his Mother and Children, he prefently bent his mind again to publick Causes. Now Cleomenes had fent unto Ptolomy King of ÆG WPT, who had promifed him aid, but upon demand, to have his Mother and Children in pledge. So he was long time before he would for shame make his mother privy unto it, and went oftentimes of purpose to let her understand it: but when he came, he had not the heart to break it to her. She first suspecting the thing, asked Cleomenes friends, if her Son had not somewhat to say unto her, that he durst not utter. Whereupon, in fine he gave the venture, and brake the matter to her. When the The noble heard it, she fell a laughing, and told him: Why, how cometh it to pass, that thou hast kept it mind of Crathus long, and wouldest not tell me? Come, come, faid she, put me straight into a Ship, and fend tiffelest, Cleome whither thou wilt, that this body of mine may do fome good unto my Countrey, before crooked menes Mothers age confume my life without profit. Then all things being prepared for their journey, they went by Land, accompanied with the Army, unto the head of Tænarus: where Cratificlea being ready to imbark, the took Cleomenes afide into the Temple of Neptune, and embracing and kiffing him, perceiving that his heart yearned for forrow of her departure, fhe faid unto him: O King of LACEDEMON, let no man fee for shame when we come out of the Temple, that we have wept and dishonoured Sparta: for that onely is in our power; as for the rest, as it pleaseth the gods so let it be. When she had spoken these words, and fashioned her countenance again, she went then to Cleomenes take her Ship with a little Son of Cleoments, and commanded the Mafter of the Ship to hoife fendeth his dail. Now when she was arrived in ÆGYPT, and understood that King Ptolomy received Am-Children Hold bassadors from Antigonus, and were in talk to make Peace with him: and hearing also that Cle- stages unto omenes being requested by the ACHAIANS to make Peace with them, durst not hearken to it, and Prolomy King end that War, without King Ptolomies consent, and because of his Mother: she wrote unto of Feypt. him, that he should not spare to do any thing that should be expedient for the honour of Sparta, without fear of displeasing Prolomy, or for regard of an old woman, and a young boy. Such was the noble mind of this worthy Lady in her Son Cleomene: advertity. Furthermore, Antigonis having taken the City of TEGEN, and facked the other Cities of ORCHOMENE and MANTI-NEA, Choments feeing himself brought to defend the borders onely of LACONIA, he did manumiffe all the LLOTES (which were the flaves of LACEDEMON) paying five Artica Mina's a man. With that Money he made the fum of five hundred Talents, and armed two thousand of these freed Slaves after the MACEDONIAN fashion, to fight against the LEUCASPIDES (to wit, the white Shields of Antigonat:) and then there fell into his mind a marvellous great enterprife, unlooked for of every man. The City of MEGALI POLIS at that time being as great as SPARTA, and having the aid of the ACHAIANS, and Antigonus at hand (whom the ACHAIANS as it feemed had brought in, chiefly at the request of the MEGALIPOLITANS) Cleomenes determining to fack this City, and knowing that to bring it to pafs, nothing was more requifite then celerity, he commanded his Souldiers to victual themselves for five days; and marching with the choice of all his Army towards Selacia, as though he had meant to have spoiled the ARGIVES, suddenly turning from thence, he invaded the Countrey of the MEGALIPOLITANS; and supping by ROETIUM, went straight by ELICUNT Aunto the City. When he was come near unto it, he fent Panneau before with speed, with two Bandsof the LACEDEMONIANS, and commanded him to take a certain piece of the Wall between two Towers, which he knew wasnot kept nor guarded; and he followed him allo with the reft of his Army, coming on fair and foftly. When Pantess came thither, finding not onely that place of the Wall without Guard or Watch which Cleamenes had told him of, but allo the most part of that side without desence, he took some part of the Wall at his first coming, and manned it: and overthrew another place of it also, putting them all to the Sword that did defend it: and then came Cleomenes, and was within the City with his Army, before the MEGALI-POLITANS knew of his coming. At length, the Citizens understanding that the City was taken, fome fled in haste, conveying such light things as came to hand, in fo great a fear: and the others also arming themselves, ran together to resist the Enemies: but though they valiantly fought to repulle them out of the City, and yet prevailed not, they gave the rest leisure thereby to #y and save themselves, so that there remained not behind above five thousand men: for all the rest were fied with their Wives and Children, into the City of MESSINA. The most part of them also that fought with the Enemies, faved themselves, and very few were taken, the chiefest whereof were Lyfandridas and Thearidas, the noblest persons that were amongst the MEGALIPOLITANS; wherefore when the Souldiers had taken them, they brought them unto Cleomenes. Lyfandridas when he faw Cleomenes a good way off, cried out aloud unto him: O King of LACEDEMON, this day thou haft an occasion offered thee to do a more famous Princely act, then that which thou hast already done, and that will make thy Name also more glorious. Cleomener musing what he would request: Well (quoth he) what is that thou requireft? One thing I will tell thee before-hand, thou shalt not make the reftore your City to you again. Yet, quoth Lyfandridas, let me request thus much then, that ye do not destroy it, but rather replenish it with friends and Considerates, which hereaster will be true and faithfull to you: and that shall you do, giving the MEGALIPOLITANS their City again, and preferving such a number of People as have forfaken it. Cleomenes pausing a while, answered, It was a hard thing to believe that: but yet, quoth he, let Honour take place with us before profit. After that he fent an Herauld straight unto Messina, unto them that were fled thither, and told them that he was contented to offer them their City again, so that they would become good friends and Confederates of the LACEDEMONIANS, for laking the alliance of the ACHAIANS. Philopamen would by no means fuffer the MEGALIPOLITANS to accept this gracious offer of Cleomenes, nor also to leave their alliance with the ACHAIANS: telling them, that he meant not to give them their City again, but to take them also with their City: and therefore drave Thearidas and Lyfandridas out of Messina, that moved this practife. It was that Philopamen that afterwards was the chiefest man of the ACHAIANS, and that wan such Fame and honour among the GRECIANS, as we have particularly declared in his Life. This word being Clements 182- brought to Cleoments, who had kept the City from spoiling untill that time, he was then so throughly offended, that he gave the Goods in prey to the Souldiers, sent away their goodly Tables, Images, and Pictures unto Sparta, and defaced the chiefest parts of the City, and then returned home again, being afraid of Aningons and the ACHAIANS. Howbeit they stirred not, because of the Parliament that was kept at that time in the City of EGIUM; where Aratm being in the Pulpit for Orations, and holding his Gown a long time before his face, the People marvelling at it, willed him to tell what he ailed : he answered them : MEGALIPOLIS is taken, and razed by Cleomenes. The ACHAIANS being amazed at the suddenness of this great loss, straight brake off their Parliament and Affembly. But Antigonus thinking to aid them, fent prefently for all his Garrifons, who being long a coming, he willed them to flay where they were, and he himself taking a few Souldiers with him, went unto the City of ARGOS. Therefore the second enterprise of Chemenes seemeth at the first fight avery rash and desperate attempt: howbeit Polybius writeth, that it was an attempt of great wildom and policy. For Cleomenes understanding that the MACEDONIANS were dispersed in Garrisons in divers places, and that Antigonus lay all the winter in the City of ARGOS, with a certain number of Footmen that were strangers, he invaded the Countrey of the ARGIVES with his Army, perswading himself, that either Ansigonus would for shame come and fight with him, or if he did not, that then he should put him in disgrace with the ARGIVES : which indeed came so to pass.

Cleomenes

The ARGIVES feeing their Countrey spoiled by Cleomenes, were in a marvellous rage, and gathering together at Antigonus Lodging, they cried out unto him, either to go into the Field and fight with the Enemy; or else if he were afraid, to relign his Office of Generall of Greece unto others that were valianter then himself. But Antigoniu like a wife and excellent Captain, thinking it Awife Captain a dishonour to him, rashly to put himself in danger, and his friends also, though he were provoked should not of with many injuries and opprobrious words, would not go into the Field, but flood conflant in his first by put himself determination. Then Cleomenes having brought his Army hard to the Walls of the City of Argos, in hazard. and spoiled and destroyed the Countrey round about, without let or danger he safely returned home again. Within a while after, Cleomenes being advertised that Antigonus was come unto TEGEA, with intent to invade the Countrey of LACONIA, he going another way with his Army (unwitting to his Enemies) they wondered when they faw him in the morning by the City of ARGOS, spoiling their Countrey, and cutting down their Corn, not with Sickles or Swords, as others do use, but with long Poles in form of Sithes, wherewith the Souldiers as they went sporting-wife, overthrew and spoiled it. But when they came to the place of Exercises in their Suburbs, called Cyllabaris, cer- The moderatitain of the Souldiers going about to have let it on fire, Cleomenes would not fuffer them; and told on of Cleomenes them, that what he had done at MEGALIPOLIS, it was rather angrily then honeftly done. Now to his Enemies. Antigonius presently returned back again, being minded first to have gone directly to the City of Argos, but fuddenly altering his mind, did Camp upon the top of Hills and Mountains. Cleomenes seeming not to be afraid of him, sent Heraulds to him to desire the keys of the Temple of Juno, and then after he had done Sacrifice, he would depart his way. Thus mocking Antigonus, after he had facrificed unto the goddess, under the Temple that was shut up, he sent his Army unto PHLIUNTA; and having driven away the Garrison out of OLOGUNTA, he came unto the City of ORCHOMENE, having not onely encouraged his Citizens, but gotten even amongst the Enemies themselves, a same also to be a noble Captain, and worthy to manage great affairs. For every man judged him to be a skilfull Souldier, and a valiant Captain, that with the power of one onely City, did maintain War against the Kingdom of MACEDON, against all the People of PELOPONNEsus, and against the Treasure of so great a King: and withall, not onely to keep his own Countrey of LACONIA unfoiled, but far otherwise to hurt his Enemies Countries, and to take so many great Cities of theirs. But he that first said, that Money was the sinew of all things, spake it chiefly Money the fiin my opinion in respect of the Wars. Demades the Orator said on a time, when the ATHE- new of Wars, NIANS commanded certain Galleys should be put out of the Arsenal into the Sea, and presently rigged and armed with all possible speed, though they lacked Money : He that rules the Prow, must first see before him : meaning, Munition and Victuals must be provided, before the Ships be set out. And it is reported also, that the ancient Archidamus, when the Confederates of the LACEDEMO-NIANS at the beginning of the War of PELOPONNESUS required, that they might be feffed at a certain rate, answered: The charges of War have no certain stint. For like as Wrest- the sying of lers that exercise their bodies continually in Games, are better able to Wrestle, and overthrow them Archidanu with time, that having no strength but onely art and sle ght: even so King Antigonut, who by the greatness of his Kingdom defrayed the charge of this War, did weary and overcome Cleamenes at the length, because he lacked Money, both to pay the strangers that served him, and also to maintain his own Citizens. For otherwise doubtless the time served his turn well, because the troubles that fell upon Antigonus in his Realm, did make him to be fent for home. For the barbarous People his Neighbours, in his absence did spoil and destroy the Realm of Macedon, and speci- Cleomenes o ally the ILLYRIANS of the high Countrey, that came down then with a great Army: where- Antizonus for upon the MACEDONIANS being spoiled and harried on all sides by them, they sent post unto An- lack of Money tigonus, to pray him to come home. If these Letters had been brought him but a little before the to pay his Battle, as they came afterwards, Antigonus had gone his way, and left the ACHAIANS. But Fortune that alwaies striketh the stroke in all weightiest Causes, gave such speed and savour unto him, Fortune that immediately after the Battle was fought at SELASIA (where Cleamenes loft his Army and City) Battle betwire the very Messengers arrived that came for Antigonus to come home; the which made the overthrow Cleomenes and of King Cleomenes fo much more lamentable. For if he had delayed Battle but two days longer, Antigonus, at when the MACEDONIANS had been gone, he might have made what Peace he would with the Sciafia. ACHAIANS: but for lack of Money, he was driven (as Polybins writeth) to give Battle with twenty thousand men, against thirty thousand: where he shewed himself an excellent and skilfull Captain, and where his Citizens also fought like valiant men, and the strangers in like case did shew themselves good Souldiers. But his onely overthrow was by the manner of his Enemies Weapons, and the force of their Battle of Footmen. But Phylarchus writeth, that Treason was the cause of his overthrew. For Antigonus had appointed the ACARNANIANS, and the ILLYRIANS, which he had in his Army, to steal upon the Wing of his Enemies Army, where Euclidas, King Cleomenes Brother was, to compass him in behind, whilest he did set the rest of his men in Battle. When Cleomenes was got up upon fome hill to look about him, to fee the countenance of the Enemy, and feeing none of the ACARNANIANS, nor of the ILLYRIANS, he was then afraid of Antigonus, that he went about some .ftratagem of War. Wherefore he called for Demoteles, whose charge was to take heed of Stratagems and secret Ambushes, and commanded him to look to the Rere-ward of his Army, and to be very circumspect all about. Demoteles, that was bribed The Treason of before (as it is reported) with Money, told him that all was clear in the Rere-ward, and bad Demoteles.

fierce Charge upon the Squadron of the MACEDONIAN Footmen, that they drave them back five Furlongs off. But in the mean time, Euclidas his Brother, in the other Wing of his Army, being compassed in behind, Cleomenes turning him back, and seeing the overthrow, cryed out aloud: Alas good Brother, thou are but Ilain, yer thou diest valiantly, and honestly, and thy death shall be a worthy example unto all posterity, and shall be sung by the praises of the women of Spar-TA. So Enclidas and his men being flain, the Enemies came straight to set upon Cleomenes Wing. Cleamenes then seeing his men discouraged, and that they durst no longer resist the Enemies, fled, and faved himself. Many of the strangers also that served him, were slain at this Battle; and of six thouland Spartans, therewere left alive but onely two hundred. Now Cleomenes being returned unto Sparta, the Citizens coming to fee him, he gave them counfell to yield themselves unto Antigonm the Conquerour: and for himself, if either alive or dead he could do any thing for the honour and benefit of SPARTA, that he would willingly do it. The Women of the City also coming unto them that flying had escaped with him, when he saw them unarm the men, and bring them drink to refresh them with, he also went home to his own house. Then a Maid of the House, which he had taken in the City of MEGALIPOLIS (and whom he had entertained ever fince the death of his Wife) came unto him as her manner was, to refresh him coming hot from the Battle: howbeit he would not drink though he was extream dry, nor fit being very weary, but armed as he was, laid his arm across upon a pillar, and leaning his head upon it, reposed himself a little: and casting in his mind all the ways that were to be thought of, he took his friends with him and went to the Haven of Gythium, and there having his Ships which he had appointed for the purpofe, he hoifed fail, and departed his way. Immediately after his departure, came Antigonus into the City of Anticomer was Sparta, and courteoully entreated the Citizens and Inhabitants he found, and did offend no man, nor proudly despise the ancient Honour and Dignity of SPARTA, but referring them to their own Laws and Government : when he had facrificed to the gods for his Victory, he departed from thence the third day, news being brought him that the War was very great in MACEDON, and that the barbarous People did Ipoil his Countrey. Now a difeafe took him, whereof he died afterwards, which appeared a Tifick, mixt with a fore Catarrh : but yet he yielded not to his Difease, and bare it out, that fighting for his Countrey, and obtaining a famous Victory, with great flaughter of Antigonar the the barbarous People, he might yet die honourably; as indeed he did, by Philarchus tellimony, who faith, that with the force of his voice fiercely crying out in the middeft of this fight, he tare his lungs and lights, worfe then they were before. Yet in the Schools it is faid, that after he had trius, King of won the Battle, he was so joyfull of it, that crying out : O bleffed day, he brake out into a great bleeding at the mouth, and a great Feaver took him withall, that he died of it. Thus much tou-Cleomenes fly- ching Antigonus. Now Cleomenes departing out of the Ise of CYTHERA, went and caft Anchor in another Island called ÆGLALIA. Then determining to fail over to the City of CYRENA, Therysion, one of Cleomenes friends (a man that in Wars shewed himself very valiant, but a boaster besides of his own doings) took Cleomenes aside, and said thus unto him: "Truly, O King, we " have lost an honourable occasion to die in Battle, though every man hath heard us vaunt and say, unto Glomenes "that Amigonus should never overcome the King of Sparta alive, but dead. A second occasion against death. "yet is afforded us to die, with much less honour and fame notwithstanding then the first. Whither do we fail to no purpose? Why do we fly the death at hand, and seek it so far off? If it be "no shame nor dishonour for the Posterity and Race of Hercules to serve the Successors of Philip "and Alexander, let us then fave our labour, and long dangerous failing, and go yield our felves "unto Antigonus; who in all likelihood will better use us then Ptolomy, because the MACEDONIANS "are far more noble persons then the ÆGYPTIANS. And if we disdain to be commanded by "them which have overcome us in Battle, why then will we make him Lord of us that hath not over-"comeus: in stead of one, to make us inferiour unto both, flying Antigonus, and serving King Pro-"lomy? Thereunso Therycion gave no answer, but assoon as he found opportunity to flip from Cleomenes, he went to the Sea fide, and flew himself. Cleomenes hoifing fail from the life of ÆGIALIA, went into Africk, and was brought by the Kings Servants unto the Cleamence fly-City of ALEXANDRIA. King Peolomy at his first coming, gave Cleamenes no special good but ethinto A indifferent intertainment: but after that he had shewed himstell to be of great wildom and judge gypt unto King ment, and that Ptolomy faw in the simplicity of his LACONIAN life, he had also a noble disposition and courage, nothing degenerating from the Princely Race and Blond of Hercules, and that he yeelded not to his adverfity, he took more delight in his company then in all the company of his flatterers and hangers on him: and then repented him greatly that he had made no more account of him before, but had suffered him to be overthrown by Antigonus, who through this Victory of him, had marvelloufly enlarged his honour and power. Then he began to comfort Cleomenes, and doing him as great honour as could be, promifed that he would fend him with ships and Money into GREECE, and put him again into his Kingdom: and further, gave him an annuall Penfion in the mean time, of four and twenty Talents, with the whichhe fimply and foberly entertained himfelf and his men about him : and bestowed all the rest upon his Countreymen that came out of GREECE into EGYPT. But now old King Ptolomy deceaffing before he could perform the promise he made unto Cleomenes , to send him into GREECE, the Realm falling then into great lascivioulnels, drunkennels, and into the Government of Women, his case and misery was clean forgotten. For the young King his fon was so given over to Women and Wine, that when he was most fober and in his best wits, he most disposed himself to make Feasts and Sacrifices, and to have the Taber playing in his Court , to gather People together , like a Stage-player or Jugler ; whilest one Agathoclea his Lemman , and her Mother , and Oenanthes a Baud , did rule all the Affairs of the State. But when he came to be King, it appeared he had need of Cleomenes: because he was afraid of his Brother Magus, who by his Mothers means, was very well efteemed of among Souldiers. Wherefore he called Cleomines to him, and made him of his Privy Councell, where he devised by practife, which way to kill his Brother. All other his friends that were of counsell with him, did counsell him to do it : but Cleomenes onely vehemently diffwaded him from it , and told him, that if it were possible, rather more Brethren should be begotten unto the King for the safety of his Person. and for dividing of the Affairs of the Kingdom between them. Amongst the Kings Familiars that were chiefest about him, there was one Sofibius that faid unto Cleomenes: So long as his Brother Magas lived, the Souldiers that be strangers whom the King entertained, would never be true to him. Cleamenes answered him for that matter there was no danger: for, faith he, of those hired Strangers, there are three thousand PELOPONNESIANS, which he knew at the twinkling of an eve would be at his commandment, to come with their Armour and Weapons where he would appoint them. These words of Cleomenes at that time shewed his faith and good-will he bare unto the King, and the force he was of besides. But afterwards, Ptolomy's fearfullness increasing his mistrust, (as it commonly happeneth, that they that lack wit, think it the best fasety to be fearfull of every wagging of a straw, and to mistrust every man) the remembrance of Cleomenes words made him much suspected of the Courtiers, understanding that he could do much with the Souldiers that were strangers : insomuch as some of them faid : See (meaning Cleomenes) there is a Lyon amongst Sheep. Indeed considering his fashions and behaviour, they might well say fo of him : for he would look through his fingers as though he faw nothing, and yet faw all what they did. In fine, he required an Army and Ships of the King; and understanding also that Antigonus was dead, and that the ACHAIANS and ETOLIANS were at great Wars together, and that the Affairs of his Countrey did call him home, all PELOPONNESUS being in arms and uproar, he prayed that they would licence him to depart with his friends. But never a man would give ear unto him, and the King also heard nothing of it, because he was continually entertained among Ladies, with Banquets, Dancing, and Masks. But Sofibins that ruled all the Realm, thought, that to keep Clemenes against his will, were a hard thing, and also dangerous: and to let him go also, knowing that he was a valiant man, and of a ftirring mind, and one that knew the Vices and Imperfections of their Government. he thought that also no lafe way, fith no Gifts nor Presents that could be offered him, could soften him. For as the holy Bull (which they call in ÆGY PT, Apis) that is full fed in goodly Pasture, doth yet desire to follow his natural course and liberty, to run and leap at his pleasure, and plainly CleomenerVersheweth, that it is a grief to him to be kept still by the Priests: even so the courtly pleasures did no- tue. thing delight Cleomenes, but as Homer writeth of Achilles:

> It irkt his noble heart to fit at home in flothfull reft, When Martiall matters were in hand, the which he liked best.

Now Cleomenes standing in these terms, there arrived in ALEXANDRIA one Nicagoras MESSI- Nicagoras Mes NIAN, who maliced (leomens in his heart, but yet shewed as though he loved him. This Nicagon finian, an E-ras on a time had fold Cleomens certain Land, but was not payed for it, either because he had no nemy to cleon present Money, or else by occasion of the Wars which gave him no leasure to make payment, menes. Cleomenes one day by chance walking upon the Sands, he faw Wicagoras landing out of his Ship, being newly arrived; and knowing him, he courteoully welcomed him, and asked what wind had brought him into EGYPT. Nicagoras gently faluting him again, told him, that he had brought the King excellent Horses of service. Cleament smiling, told him, Thou hadst better have brought him some Curtizans and Dancers, for they would have pleased the King better. Xicagoras faintly laughed at his answer, but within sew days after he did put him in remembrance of the Land he fold him, and prayed him then that he would help him to Money, telling him that he would not have prest him for it, but that he had fustained loss by Merchandise. Cleomenes anfwered him, that all his Pension was spent he had of the King. Nicagoras being offended with this answer, he went and told Sosibius of the mock Cleoments gave the King. Sosibius was glad of this occasion, but yet desiring further matter to make the King offended with Cleoments, he periwaded Nicasor as towrite a Letter to the King against Cleomenes, as though he had conspired to take the City of Cyrena, if the King had given him Ships, Money, and men of War. When Nicagoras had written this Letter, he took Ship, and hoifed faile. Four daies after his departure, Sofibius brought his Letter to the King, as though he had but newly received it. The King upon fight of it, was so offended with Cleomens, that he gave present order he should be shut up in a great house, where he should have his ordinary diet allowed him, howbeit that he should keep his house. This grieved Cleomenes much, but yet he was worse asraid of that which was to come, by this occasion: Prolomy the Son of Chryfermus, one of the Kings familiars, who had oftentimes before been very conversant and familiar with Cleomenes, and did frankly talk together in all matters. Cleomenes, one day fent for him, to pray him to come unto him. Ptolomy came at his requelt, and familiarly discoursing together, went about to diffwade him from all the fufpitions he had, and exculed the King also for that he had done unto him: fo taking his leave he left him, not thinking that Cleomenes followed him (as he did) to the Gate; where he sharply took up the Souldiers, faying that they were very negligent and careless in looking to such a fearfull beast as he was, and so ill to be taken if he once scaped their hands. Cleomenes heard what he faid, and went to his lodging again, Ptolomy knowing nothing that he was behind him: and reported the very words again unto his friends. Then all the SPARTANS converting their good hope into anger, determined to be revenged of the injury Prolomy had done them, and to die like noble SPARTANS, not tarrying till they should be brought to the shambles like far Weathers, to be sold and killed. For it would be a great shame and dishonour unto Chomenes, having refused to make peace with Antigonus, a noble Prince and Warriour, to tarry the Kings pleasure till he had left his drunkenness and dancing, and then to come and put him to death. They being full refolved hereof, as you have heard, King Ptolomy by chance went unto the City of CANOBUS, and first they gave out in ALEXANDRIA, that the King minded to set Cleomenes at liberty. Then Cleomenes friends observing the custome of the Kings of ÆGYPT, when they meant to fet a Prifoner at liberty (which was, to fend the Prifoners meat, and Prefents before to their Supper) did fend unto him fuch manner of Prefents and fo deceived the Souldiers that had the keeping of him, faying, that they brought those Presents from the King. For Cleamenes himself did facrifice unto the gods, and fent unto the Souldiers that kept him, part of those Presents that were sent unto him, and supping with his friends that night, made merry with them, every man being crowned with Garlands. Some fay, that he made the more hast to execute his Enterprife fooner then he would have done, by means of one of his men that was privy unto his conspiracy: who went every night to lie with a Woman he kept, and therefore was alraid left he would bewray them. Cleamenes about noon, perceiving the Souldiers had taken in their Cups, and that thy were afleep, he put on his Coat, and unripping it on the right shoulder, went out of the house with his word drawn in his hand, accompanied with his friends, following him in that fort, which were thirty in all, Amongst them there was one called Hipporas, who being lame, went very lively out with them at the first : but when he saw they went fair and softly because of him, he prayed them to kill him, because they should not hinder their Enterprise for a lame man, that could do them no service. Notwithstanding , by chance they met with a Towns-man a horse-back, that came hard by their door, whom they pluckt from his Horle, and cast Hippotas upon him and then ran through the City, and cried to the People, Liberty, liberty. Now the People had no other courage in them, but onely commended Cleomenes, and wondered at his valiantness: but otherwise to follow him, or to further his Enterprise, not a man of them had any heart in them. Thus running up and down the Town, they met with Ptelomy (the fame whom we faid before was the Son of Chrysonus) as he came out of the Court: whereupon three of them fetting on him, flew him prefently. There was also another Ptolomy that was Governour and Lieutenant of the City of ALEXANDRIA: who hearing a rumour of this ftir, came unto them in his Coach. They went and met him and first having driven away his Guard and Souldiers that went before him, they pluckt him out of his Coach, and flew him also. After that they went towards the Castle, with intent to set all the Prisoners there at liberty to take their part. Howbeit the Jaylors that kept them had so strongly locked up the Prilon-doors, that Cleomenes was repulsed and put by his purpose. Thus wandring up and down the City, no man neither came to joyn with him, nor to refift him, for every man fled for fear of him. Wherefore at length being weary with going up and down, he turned him to his friends, and faid unto them: It is no marvell though Women command such a cowardly People, that fly in this fort from their liberty. Thereupon he prayed them all to die like men, and like those that were brought up with him, and that were worthy of the fame of his fo noble deeds. Then the first man that made himself be slain, was Hippotas, who died of a wound one of the young men of his company gave him with a Sword at his request. After him every man flew themselves, one after another, without any fear at all , faving Pantess , who was the first man that entred the City of MEGALL POLIS. He was a fair young man, and had been very well brought up in the LACONIAN Difcipline, and better then any of his years. Cleomenes did love him dearly, and commanded him that when he should see he were dead, and all the rest also, that then he should kill himself last of a ll. Now they all being laid on the ground, he fearched them one after another with the point of his Sword, to fee if there were any of them yet left alive : and when he had pricked Cleomenes on the heel amongst others, and saw that he did yet knit his brows, he kiffed him, and sate down by him. Then perceiving that he had yeelded up the ghost, embracing him when he was dead he also flew himself, and fell upon him. Thus Cleamenes having reigned King of SPARTA fixteen years, being the same manner of man we have described him to be; he ended his days in this fort as yehear. Now his death being presently bruited through the City, Cratesicles his Mother, though otherwise she had a noble mind, did notwithstanding a little forget her greatness, through the extreme forrow the telt for the death of her Son : and fo embracing Cleamenes Sons, the fell to bitter lamentation. But the eldelt of his Sons (no man miltrufting any fuch matter) found means to get out of tation. Dut the crucial profile top of the house, cast himself headlong down to the ground, that hishead was all broken and splitted; yet died not, but was taken up crying, and angry with them, that they would not fuffer him to die. This news being brought to King Prolomy, he commanded that they would not sure time to the state of the state o then would not let ber depart, and imbark with her Wushand, but had locked her up, and kept her at home by force. Howbeit, shortly after the found the means to get her a Horfe, and Tongs Money, and ftole away in the night, and galloped towards the Haven of Tamarus, where finding a Ship ready bound for ÆGYPT, the imbarked and went to feek her Husband, with whom the gladly and lovingly led her life, forfaking her own Countrey, to live in a strange Realm. Now when the Sergeants came to take Cratesicles to put her to death, Panteas Wife led her by the arm, carrying up her train , and did comfort her; although Crateficles otherwise was not afraid to die, but onely asked this favour that the might die before her little Children. This notwithstanding, when they came to the place of execution, the Hangman first slew her Children before her eyes, and then her felf afterwards, who in such great grief and forrow, faid no more but thus: Alas my poor Children, what is become of you? And Panteas Wife also, being a mighty tall Woman, girding her cloaths to her, took up the flain bodies one after another, and wrapped them up in such things as the could get, speaking never a word, nor. thewing any fign or token of grief. And in fine, having prepared her fell to die, and plucked off her Attire her felf, without fuffering any other to come near her, or to fee her , but the Hangman that was appointed to strike off her head, in this fort she died as constantly, as the stougest man living could have done; and had so covered her Body, that no man needed after her death to touch hier, so carefull was the to her end, to keep her honefty , which the had always kept in her life : and in her death was mindfull of her honour, wherewith the decked her Body in her lifetime. Thus thefe LA CED & MONI-AN Ladies playing their parts in this pitifull Tragedy, contending at the time of death, even with the AN Ladies playing little parts in the parts in the following of them flould die nioft confanity; cleaners the first a manifelt proof and reflimony, that fortune had no power over fortitude and courage. Shortly afhanging upon ter, those that were appointed to keep the Body of the King Commer that hung upon the Cross, they a Cross, had a spied a great Serpent wreathed about his head, that covered all his face, insomuch as no ravening Fowl Serpent durst come near him to eat of it : whereupon the King fell into a superstitious fear , being afraid that wreathed ahe had offended the gods. Hereupon, the Ladies in his Court began to make many Sacrifices of puri-bout his head. fication, for the clearing of this fin : perswading themselves , that they had put a man to death be- Living things livingthings loved of the gods, and that he had fomething more in him then a man. The ALEXANDRIANS breeding of the thereupon went to the place of execution, and made their prayers unto Cleomeries, as unto a demy-god, corruption of calling him the Son of the gods: untill that the Learned-men brought them from that errour, de-dead Beafts. claring unto them, that like as of Oxen being dead and rotten there breed Bees, and of Horse also Why the Dracome Waspes, and of Asses likewise Bettels : even so mens Bodies when the marrow melteth and ga-gon is consethereth together, do bring forth Serpents. The which coming to the knowledge of the Ancients in old crated unto time, of all other Beafts they did confecrate the Dragon to Kings and Princes, as proper unto Man. Princes.

Dw that we have declared unto you the History of the Lives of these two GRECIANS, Agis and Clemenes aforefaid , we muft also write the History of two ROMANS , the which is no less lamentable for the troubles and calamities that chanced unto Tiberius and Caises, both of them the Sons of Tiberius Gracebus. He having been twice Confull and once Cenfor, and having had the Honour of two Triumphes, had notwithstanding more Honour and Fame onely for his Valiantness, for the which he was thought worthy to marry with Cornelia, the Daughter of Scipio, who overcame Hannibal after the death of his Father: though while he lived he was never his Friend, but rather his Enemy. It them both escape, but one onely taffuring him that if he killed the Male he should not live long after a and if he killed the Female, that then his Wife Cornelio should die. man, should die before her, he slew the Male, and let the Female escape; howbeit he died soon after, leaving twelve Children alive, all of them begotten of Cornelia. Cornelia after the death of her Husband, taking upon her the rule of her House and Children, led fuch a chast life, was so good to her Children , and of fo noble mind , that every man thought Tiberius a wife man for that he died, and left her behind him. She remaining Widow, King Ptolomy made fuit unto her, and would have made her his Wife and Queen: but fhe refused, and in her Widow-hood lost all her Children, but one Daughter (whom the bestowed upon the younger Scipio African) and Tiberims, and Cains, whose Lives we presently write. Those she carefully brought up, that they being become more civill, and better conditioned then any other ROMANS in their time, every man judged, that Education prevailed more in them then Nature. For, as in the Favours and Pictures of Castor and Pollux, there is a certain difference discerned, whereby a man may know that the one was made for Wreftling, and the other for running : even fo between these two young Brethren, amongst other the great likeness between them, being both happily born to be Valiani, to be Temperate, to be Liberall, to be Learned, and to be Nobly-minded, there grew notwith-Atrae deferip- flanding great difference in their actions and doings in the Common-wealth, the which I think tion of Tibe-tius and Gains convenient to declare, before I proceed any further. First of all, for the favour of the Face, the look and moving of the Body, Tiberius was much more mild and tractable, and Cains more hot and earnest. For the first in his Orations was very modest, and kept his place: and the other of all the ROMANS was the first that in his Oration jetted up and down the Pulpit, and that plucked his Gown over his shoulders : as they write of, Cleo ATHENIAN, that he was the first of all Oratours that opened his Gown, and clapped his hand on his thigh in his Oration. Furthermore,

Cains words, and the rehemency of his persuasion, were terrible and full of passion; but Tiberine words in contrary manner, were mild, moved men to compassion, being very proper, and excellently applied; where Cains words were full of fineness and curiofity. The like diffe-Wifards having confidered the fignification thereof, did forbid him to kill them both, and also to let rence also was between them in their Fare and Diet. For Tiberim always kept a convenient Ordinary: and Caim also in respect of other ROMANS, lived very temperatly, but in respect of his Brothers Fare, curiously and superfluously. Insomuch as Drusu on a time reproved him, because he had bought certain Dolphins of Silver, to the value of a thousand two hundred and fifty Druchma's for every Pound weight. And now, as touching the manners and naturall disposition of them both agreeing with the diversity of their Tongues, the one being mild and plausible, and the other hot and cholerick : infomuch that otherwile forgetting himself in his Oration , against his will he would be very earnest and strain his voice beyond his compass, and so with great nncomeliness confound his words. Yet finding his own fault, he devised this remedy. He had a Servant called Licinius, a good wife man, who with an Instrument of Musick he had, by the which they teach men to rife and fall in their Tunes, when he was in his Oration, he ever flood behind him : and when he perceived that his Mafters Voice was a little too loud, and that through choler he exceeded his ordinary speech, he played a soft stop behind him, at the found whereof Caius immediatly sell from his extreamity, and eafily came to himself again. And here was the diversity between them. Otherwife., for their hardiness against their Enemies, justice unto their Tenants, the care and pains in their Offices of Charge, and also their continency against voluptuousness, in all these they were both alike. For age . Tiberius was elder by nine years , by reason whereof their severall authority and doings in the Common-wealth fell out at fundry times. And this was one of the chiefest causes why their doings prospered not, because they had not both authority in one self time, neither could they joyn their power together: the which if it had met at one felf-time, had been of great force. and peradventure invincible. Wherefore we must write particularly of them both, but first of all wemust begin with the Elder. He, when he came to mans state, had such a name and estimation. that immediatly they made him fellow in the Colledge of the Priests which at ROME are called Au-Tiberlus made gures (being those that have the charge to consider of signs and Predictions of things to come) Augure, more for his valiantness then for Nobility. The same doth Appins Clodius witness unto us, one that hath bren both Confull and Cenfor, and also Prastident of the Senate, and of greater authority then any man in his time. This Appius at a Supper when all the Augures were together, after he had faluted Tiberius, and made very much of him, he offered him his Daughter in marriage, Tiberius was very Tiberius marriglad of the offer, and therewithall the marriage was prefently concluded between them. Thereupon ed Applies Clo-Apping coming home to his house, at the threshold of his Door he called aloud for his Wife, and told diss Daughter. her: Antifria I have bestowed our Daughter Clodia. She wondering at it, O gods faid she, and what needed all this hafte? what couldft thou have done more, if thou haddest gotten her Tiberius Gracchus for her Husband? I know that fome refer this History unto Tiberius, Father of these men we write of, and unto Scipio the AFRICAN: but the most part of Writers agree with that we write at othis present. And Polybius himself also writeth, that after the death of Scipio African, his friends being met together, they chose Tiberius before all the other young men of the City to marry him unto Carnelia, being free, and unpromised, or bestowed upon any man by her Father. Now Tiberius: the younger being in the Wars in AFRICK under Scipio the second, who had married his Sifter ; ly-Tiberius Souling in the Tent with him, he found his Captain indued with many noble Gifts of Nature, to allure dier fare. mens hearts to defire to follow his valiantness. So in a short time he did excell all the young men of his time, as well in obedience, as in the valiantnels of his person: insomuch that he was the first man that scaled the Wals of the Enemies, as Fannins reporteth, who said that he scaled the Wals with him, and did help him in that valiant Enterprise. So that being present, all the Camp were in love with him: and when he was absent, every man wished for him again. After this War was ended, he was chosen Treasurer, and it was his chance to go against the Numantines, with Cains Mancinus one of the Confuls, who was an honeft man, but yet had the worft luck of any Captain the ROMANS had. Notwithstanding , Tiberius wildom and valiantness, in this extream ill Tiberius Gracluck of his Captain, did not onely appear with great glory to him, but also most wonderfull, by chus chosen the great obedience and reverence he bare unto his Captain: though his misfortunes did fo trouble Quartor. and grieve him, that he could not tell himself whether he was Captain or not. For when he was overthrown in great foughten Fields, he departed in the night, and left his Camp. The Numan-TINES hearing of it, first took his Camp, and then ran after them that fled, and setting upon the rereward, flew them, and environed all his Army. So that they were driven into straight and narrow places, whereout they could by no means escape. Thereupon Mancinus despairing that he could get out by force, he fent a Herauld to the Enemies to treat of peace. The Numantines made answer that they would trust no man but Tiberins onely, that therefore they willed he should be sent unto them. They defired that, partly for the love they bare unto the Vertues of the young man, because there was no talk of any other in all this War but of him and partly also, as remembring his Father Tiberius, who making Wars in SPAIN, and having there fubdued many Nations, he granted the NUMANTINES peace, the which he caused the ROMANS afterwards to confirm and ratific: Hereupon Tiberius was fent to speak with them, and partly obtaining that he defired, and partly also granted them that they required, he concluded peace with them, whereby affuredly he faved the Tiberius Graclives of twenty, thouland ROMAN Citizens, belides Slaves and other Stragglers that willingly chus conclu-followed the Camp, This notwithstanding, the NUMANTENES took the spoil of all the goods deth peace they found in the ROMAN'S Camp, among the which they found Tiberius Book of accompt with the Nutouching the Money disbursed of the Treasure in his Charge. Tiberius being marvellous desirous mantines.

fpake unto the Governours of the City, and prayed them to re-deliver him his Books of ac-

Town. He standing still in doubt with himself what to do, whether he should go into the Town, or not: the Governours of the City came to him, and taking him by the hand prayed he would think they were not his Enemies, but good Friends, and that he would truft them. Whereupon Tiberius thought best to yeeld to their perswasion, being desirous also to have his Books again, and the rather, for fear of offending the NUMANTINES, if he should have denied and miltrufted them. When he was brought into the City, they provided his Dinner, and were very earnest with him, intreating him to dine with them. Then they gave him his Books again, and offered him moreover to take what he would of all the Spoils they had gotten in the Camp of the Ro-MANS. Howbeit of all that, he would take nothing but Frankinsence, which he used, when he did any Sacrifice for his Countrey: and then taking his leave of them, with thanks he returnes, When he was returned to ROME, all this peace concluded was utterly misliked; as dishonourable to the majefty of the Empire of ROME. Yet the Parents and Friends of them that had ferved in this War, making the greatest part of the People, they gathered about Tiberius, faying, that what faults were committed in this Service, they were to impute it unto the Confull Mancinus, and not unto Tiberina, who had faved fuch a number of ROMANS lives. Norwithstanding, they that were offended with this difhonourable peace, would that therein they should follow the example of their Fore-fathers in the like case. For they fent back their Captains naked unto their Enemies , bebroken with cause they were contented the SAMNITES should spoil them of that they had, to escape with life. the Numan-Moreover, they did not onely fend them the Captains and Confuls, but all those also that bare any Office in the Field, and had confented unto that condition: to the end they might lay all the perjury and breach of peace upon them. Herein therefore did manifestly appear, the love and good-will the People did bear unto Tiberius : for they gave order, that the Confull Mancinus should be sent naked and bound unto the NUMANTINES, and for Tiberius fake they pardoned all the reft. I think Scipio, who bare great fway at that time in ROME, and was a man of greatest account, did help him at a pinch, who notwithstanding was ill thought of because he did not also fave the Consul Mancinus. and confirm the peace concluded with the NUMANTINES, confidering it was made by Tiberius his Friend and Kinfman. But these millikings grew chiefly through the ambition of Tiberius Friends, and certain men, which stirred him up against Scipio. But yet it fell not out to open malice between Why Tiberius them, neither followed there any hurt upon it. And furely I am perswaded, that Tiberius had not fallen into those troubles he did afterwards, if Scipio AFRICAN had been present, when he passed those things he preferred. But Scipio was then in Wars at the Siege of Numantia, when Tiberim upon this occasion passed these Laws. When the ROMANS in old time had overcome any of their neighbours, for ransome they took oftentimes a great deal of their Land from them, part whereof they fold by the Crier, for the benefit of the Common-wealth, and part also they referred to their State as a demean, which afterwards was let out to Farm for a small Rent yearly, to the poor Citizens that had no Lands. Howbeit the rich men inhanced the Rent, and so began to thrust ont the poor men. Thereupon was an Ordinance made, that no Citizen of ROME should have above five hundred Acres of Land. This Law for a time did bridle the coverousness of the rich men, and did ease the poor also that dwelt in the Countrey, upon the Farms they had taken up of the Common-wealth, and so lived with their own, or with what their Ancestours had from the beginning. But in process of time, their rich neighbours, by Names of other men, got their Farms over their heads, and in the end, the most of them were openly seen in it in their own Names. Whereupon, the poor People being thus turned out of all, went with faint courage afterwards to the War, nor cared any more for bringing up their Children. So that in short time, the Freemen left ITALY, and Slaves and barbarous People did replenish it, whom the rich men made to Plough those Lands which they had called the wife. taken from the ROMANS. Caim Lalim, one of Scipio's friends, gave an attempt to reform this Tiberius Grac- abuse : but because the chiefest of the City were against him, fearing it would break out to some uproar, he desisted from his purpose, and therefore he was called Lelius the wife. But Tiberius being chosen Tribune, he did forthwith prefer the reformation aforesaid being allured unto it (as divers Writers report) by Diophanes the Oratour , and Bloffin the Philosopher : of the which, Diophanes was banished from the City of MITILENE, and Bloffin the ITALIAN from the City of Cumes ; who was Schollar and familiar unto Antipater of TARSUS at ROME, by whom he was honoured for certain Works of Philosophy he dedicated unto him. And some also do accuse their Mother Cornelia, who did twit her Sons in the teeth , that the ROMANS did yet call her Scipio's Mother-in-law, and nouthe Mother of the Gracchi. Other fay it was Spurius Posthumius , a Companion of Tiberius, and onethat contended with him in eloquence. For Tiberius returning from the Wars, and finding him far beyond him in same reputation, and well beloved of every one, he sought to excell him by attempting this noble Enterprife, and of to great expectation. His own Brother Caim in a certain Book, wrote, that as he went to the Wars of NUMANTIA, passing through Thuscan, he found the Countrey in manner unhabited : and they that did follow the plough, or keep Feafts were the most of them slaves, and barbarous People, come out of a strange Countrey. Whereupon ever after it ran-nation : first bringing him to it by Bils set upon every wall, in every Porch, and upon the Tombs. praying him by them to cause the poor Citizens of ROME to have their Lands restored . which were belonging to the Common-wealth. This notwithstanding he himself made not the Law alone of his own head, but did it by the counsell and advice of the chiefest men of Rome, for vertue and estimation: among the which, Crassu the high Bulhop was one, and Mutius Scavola the Lawyer, that then to Tiberius for was (onfull, and Appin Clodin his Father-in-law. And truly it feemeth, that never Law was made preferring the with greater favour, then that which he preferred against so great injustice and avarice. For those Law that should have been punished for transgressing the Law, and should have had the Lands taken from Lex Agraria. them by force, which they unjustly kept against the Law of ROME, and that should also have been amerced for it, he ordained that they should be paid by the Common-wealth to the value of the Lands, which they held unjustly, and so should leave them to the poor Citizens again that had no Land, and lacked help and relief. Now, though the reformation established by this Law, was done with fuch great favour, the People notwithstanding were contented, and would forget all that was past, so that they might have no more wrong offered them in time to come. But the rich men and men of great Poffellions, hated the Law for their avarice, and for spite and self-will (which would not let them yeeld) they were at deadly feud with the Lawyer that had preferred the Law, and fought by all device they could to diffwade the People from it : telling them that Tiberius brought in this Law Agraria again, to diffurb the Common-wealth, and to make some alteration in the State. But they prevailed not : for Tiberius defending the matter, which of it felf was good and just, with fuch Eloquence as might have justified an evill cause, was invincible; and no man able to argue against him to consute him , when speaking in the behalf of the poor Citizens of ROME (the People Tiberius Otabeing gathered round about the Pulpit for Orations) he told them, that the wild Beafts through tions. ITALY had their Dens and Caves of abode, and that the men that fought, and were flain for their Countrey, had nothing else but ayr and light; and so were compelled to wander up and down with their Wives and Children, having no resting place nor house to put their heads in : and that the Captains do but mock their Souldiers, when they encourage them in Battell to fight valiantly for the Graves, the Temples, their own Houses, and their Predecessours. For, said he, of such a number of poor Citizens as there be, there cannot a man of them shew any ancient House or Tomb of their Ancestors : because the poor men do go to the Wars , and be slain for the rich mens pleasures and wealth: besides, they faisly call them Lords of the Earth, where they have not a handfull of Ground that is theirs. These and such other like words being uttered before all the People with fuch vehemency and troth, did so move the common People withall, and put them in such a rage, that there was no Adverfary of his able to withftand him. Therefore, leaving to contrary and deny the Law by argument, the rich men did put all their trust in Marcus Octavius. Colleague and fellow Tribune with Tiberius in Office, who was a grave and wife young man, and Tiberius very familiar friend. So that the first time they came to him, to oppose him against the confirmation of this Law, he prayed them to hold him excused, because Tiberius was his very friend. But in the end, being compelled unto it through the great number of the rich men that were importunate with him, he did withftand Tiberius Law, the which was enough to overthrow it. For if any one of the Tribunes Marcus Offafpeak against it, though all the other pass with it, he overthroweth it : because they all can do vius Tribune, nothing, if one of them be against it. Tiberius being very much offended with it, proceeded no fur- did withstand ther in this first favourable Law, but in a rage preferred another more gratefull to the common People, Tiberius Law. as also more extream against the rich. In that Law he ordained, that who oever had any Lands contrary to the ancient Laws of ROME, that he should presently depart from them. But thereupon there fell out continuall brawls in the Pulpit for Orations, against Octavius : in the which though The modest they were very earnest and vehement one against another, yet there passed no foul words from them contention be-(how hot foever they were one with another) that should shame his Companion. Whereby it appeareth, that to be well brought up, breedeth fuch a flay and knowledge in a man, not onely in things of and Odlavinis. pleasure to make him regardhis credit, both in word and deed, but in passion and anger also, and in their greatest ambition of glory. Thereupon Tiberius finding that this Law among others touched Oltavius, because he joyned a great deal of Land that was the Common-wealths, he prayed him secretly to contend no more against him, promising him to give him of his own, the value of those Lands which he should be driven to forfake, although he was not very able to perform it. But when he faw Ollavius would not be perswaded, he then preferred a Law that all Magistrates and Officers should cease their Authority, till the Law was either, past or rejected, by voices of the People : and thereupon he set his own Seal upon the Doors of the Temple of Saturne, where the Coffers of the Treasure lay, because the Treasurers themselves during that time, should neither take out nor put in any thing, upon great Penalties to be forfeited by the Prætors or any other Magistrate of authority that should break this Order. Hereupon, all the Magistrates fearing this Penalty, did leave to exer-cife their Office for the time. But then the rich men that were of great Livings, changed their Apparell, and walked very fadly up and down the Market-place, and layed fecret wait to take Tiberim having hired men to kill him: which caused Tiberim himself, openly before them all, to wear a short Dagger under his long Gown, properly called in Latin, Dolon. When the day came that this Law should be stablished, Tiberius called the People to give their voyces : and the rich men on the other fide , they took away the Pots by force, wherein the Papers of mens voyces were thrown, fo that there was like to fall out a stir upon it. For the Faction of Tiberius was the stronger side, by the number of People that were gathered about him for that purpose: had it not been for Manlim

and Fulviu, both the which had been Confuls; who went unto him, and befought him with the tears in their eyes, and holding up their hands, that he would let the Law alone. Tiberim thereupon, foreseeing the instant danger of some great mischief, as also for the reverence he bare unto two fuch noble Persons, he stayed a little, and asked them what they would have him to do. They made answer, that they were not able to counsell him in a matter of fo great weight, but they prayed him notwithstanding, he would be contented to refer it to the judgement of the Senate. Thereupon he granted them prefently. But afterwards perceiving that the Senate fate upon it, and had determined nothing, because the rich men were of too great authority, he entred into another device that was neither honest nor meet; which was to deprive Otavim of his Tribuneship, knowing that otherwise he could not possibly come to pass the Law. But before he took that course, he openly intreated him in the face of the People with courteous words, and took him by the hand, and prayed him to stand no more against him; and to do the People this pleasure, which required a matter just and reasonable, and onely requested this small recompence for the great pains they took in fervice abroad for their Countrey. Ottavim denied him plainly. Then faid Tiberim openly, that both of them being Brethren in one felt place and authority, and contrary one to another in a matter of fo great weight, this contention could not be possibly ended, without civill war: and that he could see no way to remedy it, unless one of them two were deposed from their Office. Thereupon he bad Offavisu begin first with him, and he would rife from the bench with a good will, and become a private man; if the People were to contented. Offavim would do nothing in it. Tiberini then replied, that he would be doing with him, if he altered not his mind, upon a better breath and confideration : and fo dismiffed the Affembly for that day. The next morning the People being again affembled, Tiberius going up to his Seat, attempted again to perswade Olfavius to leave off, In fine, finding him still a man unremoveable, he referred the matter to the voices of the People. whether they were contented Octavias should be deposed from his Office. Now there were five and thirty Tribes of the People, of the which seventeen of them had already passed their voices against Offavius, fo that there remained but one Tribe more to put him out of his Office. Then Tiberius made them flay for proceeding any further, and prayed Octavius again, embracing him before all the People, with all the intreaty possible, that for self-will sake he would not suffer such an open fhame to be done unto him, as to be put out of his Office, neither also to make him the occasion and instrument of so pitifull a deed. They say that Ottavins at this last intreaty was somewhat moved and won by his perswasions, and that weeping, he stayed a long time, and made no answer. But when he looked upon the rich men that stood in a great company together he was ashamed (I think) to have their ill wills, and rather betook himself to the loss of his Office, and so bad Tiberius do what he would. Thereupon he being deprived by voices of the People, Tiberius commanded one of his infranchifed bondmen to pull him out of the Pulpit for Orations : for he used his infranchifed bondmen instead of Sergeants. This made the fight fo much more lamentable, to see Octavius thus Thamefully pluckt away by force. Yea furthermore, the common People would have run upon him , but the rich men came to rescue him , and would not suffer them to do him further hurt. So Offavius faved himself running away alone, after he had been refcued thus from the fury of the People. Moreover, there was a faithfull Servant of Octavism, who stepping before his Master to Tave him from hurt, had his eyes pulled out against Tiberius mind, who ran to the refcue with all speed when he heard the noise. After that , the Law Agraria passed for division of Lands , and Law Agraria, three Commissioners were appointed to make inquiry and distribution thereof. The Commission ners appointed were these : Tiberius himself , Appius Clodius his Father-in-law , and Caius Gracchus his Brother , who were not at that time in ROME , but in the Camp with Scipio AFRI-CAN, at the Siege of the City of NUMANTIA. Thus Tiberius very quietly passed over these matters, and no man durft withfrand him : and furthermore, he substituted in Ottavius place no man of quality, but onely one of his followers, called Mutins. For which cause the Noble-men were fore offended with him, and fearing the increase of his greatness, they being in the Senate-house did what they could possible to do him despite and shame. For when Tibering demanded a Tent at the charge of the Common-wealth, when he should go abroad to make division of these Lands, as they usually granted unto others, that many times went in far meaner Commissions, they statly denied him : and through the procurement of P. Nasica (who being a great landed man in his Countrey, shewed himself in this Action his mortall Enemy, taking it grievously to be compelled to depart from his Land) onely granted him nine of their Oboli a day, for his ordinary allowance. But the People on the other fide were all in an uproar against the rich. Infomuch as one of Tiberius friends being dead upon the suddain, upon whose body being dead there appeared very ill Signs, the common People ran suddainly to his Buriall, and cried out, that he was poyloned. And so taking up the Biere whereon his Body lay upon their shoulders, they were present at the fire of his Funerals, where immediately appeared certain Signs to make them suspect, that indeed shere was vehement cause of presumption he was poyloned. For his Belly burst, whereout there iffued such abundance of corrupt humours, that they put out the first fire, and made them fetch another, the which also they could not make to burn, untill that they were compelled to carry the Body into some other place, where notwithstanding they had much ado to make it burn. Tiberini feeing that, to make the common People mutiny the more, he put on mourning Apparell, and brought his Sons before them, and befought the People to be good unto them and their Mother, as one that despaired of his health and safety. About that time

TIBERIUS and CAIUS died Attalus firnamed Philopater , and Endemus PERGAMENIAN brought his Will to ROME in the which he made the People of Rome his Heir. Wherefore Tiberius, fill to increase the good King Attalut that ftanding up, faid , that he was next neighbour unto Tiberins , and that by reason of his neighbour-hood he knew that Endemon PERGAMENIAN had given bim one of King Attales Royall Bands, with a purple Gown besides, for a token that he should one day be King of Rome. And

Quintus Metellus also reproved him; for that his Father being Cenfor, the ROMANS having supped in the Town, and repairing every man home to his house, they did put out their Torthes and

Lights, because men seeing them return, they should not think they tarried too long in company ded them to bring this Annins before him, that he might be endited in the Market-place. But he finding himself far inferiour unto Tiberius both in Dignity and Eloquence, ran to his fine fubtill questions, to take a man at his word : and prayed Tiberine before he did proceed to his Accusation , that he would first answer him to a question he would ask him. Tibering bad him say what he would. So filence being made, Annius asked him : If thou wouldest defame me, and offer me injury, and that I called one of thy Companions to help me, and he should rife to take my part.

and anger thee : wouldest thou therefore put him out of his Office? It is reported Tiberius was fo gravelled with this question, that though he was one of the readiest speakers, and the boldest in his Orations of any man, yet at that time he held his peace, and had no power to speak, and therefore he prefently dismiffed the Affembly. Afterward, understanding that of all the things he did, the depoling of Ottavins from his Office was thought (not onely of the Nobility, but of the common People also) as foul and wilfull a part as ever he played, for that thereby he had imbased and utterly overthrown the Dignity of the Tribunes, the which was always had in great venera-

"or to fet fire on the Arfenall; and yet notwithfranding this wicked part, if it were committed he "should be Tribune of the People still, though a leud Tribune. But when he goeth about to take a"way the authority and power of the People, then he is no more a Tribune. Were not this against "all reason, think you, that a Tribune when he lift, may take a Confull, and commit him to Prison?

"and that the People should not withstand the Authority of the Tribune, who gave him the same,

"when he would use his authority to the prejudice of the People? for the People are they that do

"chuse both Confull and Tribune. Furthermore, the Kingly Dignity (because in the same is con"tained the absolute authority and power of all other kinds of Magistrates and Offices together) is

"confecrated with very great and holy Ceremonies, drawing very near unto the god-head; and yet

"the People expulled King Tarquin, because he used his authority with cruelty; and for the injury

"he offered one man onely, the most ancient rule and government (by the which the foundation of

"ROME was first laid) was utterly abolished. And who is there in all the City of ROME to be " reckoned so holy as the Vestall Nuns, which have the custody and keeping of the everlasting Fire?

"and yet if any of these be taken in fornication, she is buried alive for her offence : for when they "are not holy to the gods, they lofe the liberty they have, in respect of serving the gods. Even to es also it is unmeet, that the Tribune if he offend the People, stiould for the Peoples sake be reveren-

"ced any more, feeing that through his own folly he had deprived himself of that authority they gave thim. And if it be so that he be chosen Tribune by the most part of the tribes of the People, then by e reason is he justly deprived that by all the whole Tribes together is sorfaken and deposed. There "is nothing more holy nor inviolate then things offered up unto the gods; and yet it was never feen

"that any man did forbid the People to take them, to remove and transport them from place to place,

"as they thought good. Even fo, they may as lawfully transfer the Office of the Tribune unto any "other, as any other Offering confecrated to the gods. Furthermore, it is manifest that any Officer or

will of the common People towards him, preferred a Law immediatly, that the ready Money that made the Peowill of the common People towarus man, personal to the common People towarus man, personal to the state of this King, should be distributed among the poor Citizens; on whose Lot ple of Rone it should fall to have any part of the division of the Lands of the Commonwealth to shrinking his Heir. it should tall to nave any part or the up their Tillage. Furthermore, he said, that concerning the for dividing of Towns and Cities of the Kingdom of Atralus, the Senare had nothing to do to take any order with Attalus Mo. them, but that the People were to dispose of them, and that he himself would put it out. He provoked Tiberius to answer him, whether oner and Answer he had not committed a shamefull Fact against his Companion and Brother Tribune, to defame him were of that by the Laws of Rome should have been holy and untouched. The People took this pro-things. vocation very angrily, and Tiberius also coming out, and having affembled the People, comman-

" prived themselves, or otherwise fued to be discharged. This was the effect of Tiberim Purgation. Now his friends perceiving the threats the rich and Noblemen gave out against him, they wished him for the fafety of his Person, to make suite to be Tribune again the next year. Whereupon he be-Other Laws made by Tibe took away the time and number of years preferred, when every Citizen of Rome was bound to the Wars being called, and his Name Billed. He made it lawfull also for men to appeal go to the Wars being called, and his Name Billed. from fentence of the Judges unto the People, and thrust in also amongst the Senatours (which then had absolute authority to judge among themselves) a like number of the ROMAN Knights, and by this means fought to weaken and imbale the authority of the Senate, increasing also the power of the People, more of malice then any reason, or for any justice or benefit to the Common-wealth. Furthermore, when it came to the gathering of the voices of the People for the confirmation of his new Laws, finding that his Enemies were the stronger in the Assembly, because all the People were not yet come together, he fell a quarrelling with his Brethren the Tribunes, always to win them; and yet in the end brake up the Affembly, commanding them to return the next morning. There he would be the first man in the Market-place, apparelled all in black, his face beblubbered with tears, and looking heavily upon the matter, praying the People affembled to have compaffion upon him, faying, that he was atraid left his Enemies would come in the night, and overthrow his house to Unlucky figns kill him. Thereupon the People were fo moved withall, that many of them came and brought their unto Tiberist. Tents, and lay about his houfe to watch it. At the break of the day, the Keeper of the Chickens (by figns of the which they do divine of things to come) brought them unto him, and caft them down Meat before them. None of them would come out of the Cage but one onely, and yet with much ado, shaking the Cage: and when it came out, it would eat no Meat, but onely lift up her left Wing, and put forth her Leg, and so ran into the Cage again. This fign made Tiberius remember another he had had before. He had a marvellons fair Helmet, and very rich, which he wore in the Wars: under it were crept two Snakes unawares to any, and layed Egges, and hatched them. This made Tiberins wonder the more , because of the ill figns of the Chickens : notwithflanding, he went out of his house when he heard that the People were affembled in the Capitoll; but as he went out, he hit his foot fuch a blow against a stone at the threshold of the Door, that he brake the nail of his great Toe, which fell in such a bleeding that it bled through his Shooe. Again, he had not gone far, but he faw upon the top of a house on his left hand, a couple of Ravens fighting together: and notwithfranding that there past a great number of People by, yet a stone which one of these Ravens cast from them, came and sell hard at Tiberius foot. The fall thereof flayed the flourest man he had about him. But Blossius the Philosopher of Cumes that did accompany him, told him it were a great shame for him, and enough to kill the hearts of all his followers, that Tiberise being the Son of Gracebus, and Nephew of Scipio the AFRICAN, and the chief man besides of all the Peoples side, for fear of a Raven, should not obey his Citizens that called him: and how that his Enemies and ill-willers would not make a laughing sport of it, but would plainly tell the People, that this was a trick of a Tyrane that reigned indeed, and that for pride and difdain did abuse the Peoples good wils. Furthermore, divers Messengers came unto him. and faid, that his friends that were in the Capitoll, fent to pray him to make hafte, for all went well with him. When he came thither, he was honourably received : for the People feeing him coming cried out for joy to welcom him; and when he was gotten up to his Seat, they shewed themselves both carefull and loving towards him, looking warily that none came near him, but such as they knew well. When Mutius began again to call the Tribes of the People to give their voices, he could not proceed according to the accustomed order in the like case, for the great noise the hindmost Flavius Flac. People made, thrusting forward, and being driven back, and one mingling with another. In the reopie made, inruiting forward, and being driven toath, and one integring with absolute, in the supervised mean time Flavius Flacess, one of the Senatours, got up into a place where all the People might the configure, fee him, and when he saw that his voice could not be heard of Tiberius, he made a fign with his against Tibe. hand that he had some matter of great importance to tell him. Tiberim straight bad them make a lane through the prefs. So, with much ado, Flavine came at length unto him, and told him, that the rich men in open Senate, when they could not frame the Confull to their wils, determined themselves to come and kill him., having a great number of their friends and bond-men armed for the purpole. Tiberim immediately declared this conspiracy unto his friends and followers, who straight girt their long Gowns unto them, and brake the Sergeants Javelins which they carried in their hands to make room among the People, and took the trunchions of the fame to refift those that would set upon them. The People also that stood furthest off, marvelled at it, and asked what the matter was. Tiberius by a fign to tell them the danger he was in , laid both his hands on his head, because they could not hear his voice for the great noise they made. His Enemies feeing the fign he gave, ran prefently to the Senate, crying out, that Tiberius required a Royall Band or Diademe of the People, and that it was an evident fign, because they saw bim clap his hands upon his head. This Tale troubled all the company. Whereupon Xasica befought the Confull, chief of the Senate, to help the Common-wealth, and to take away this Tyrant. The Confull gently answered again, that he would use no force, neither put any Citizen to death, but lawfully condemned : as also he would not receive Tiberius, nor protect him, if the People by his perswasion or commandment should commit any Act contrary to the Law. Nasica then rifing in anger, Sith the matter is so (faith he) that the Consull regardeth not the Commonwealth, all you then that will defend the Authority of the Law, follow me. Thereupon be cast the

Skirt of his Gown over his head, and went Araight to the Capitoll. They that followed him also Skirt of this Gowns and wrapped them about their arms, and laied at as many as they might, to Nafica doth make them give way: and yes very few of the People durft meet with fuch States as they were to fer upon Tibemake them give way were the chiefest men of the City; but every man flying from them, they rias Gracebus. fell one on anothers neck for hafted. They that followed them , had brought from home great Leavers and Clubs, and as they went they took up feet of Treftlers and Chairs which the People had vers and closes, and as the overthrown and broken, ruffning away, and hied them apace to meet with Tiberius, ftriking at overthrown and blocks, the way a forthat in fhort space they had dispersed all the common People, and Tiberius Grace many were flain flying. Tiberha feeing that, betook him to his legs to fave himself; but as he dratte Triwas flying, one took him by the Gown and stayed him : but he leaving his Gown behind him bune stain. ran in his Coat, and running fell upon them that were down before. So, as he was rifing upagain, the first man that strake him, and that was plainly seen strike him, was one of the Tribunes his Brethren, called Publius Sainreins, who gave him a great rap on the head with the foot of a Chair : and the fecond blow he had, was given him by Lucius Rufus that boafted of it, as if he had done a notable act. In this tumult, there were flain above three hundred men, and were all killed with Staves and Stones; and not one man hurt with any Iron. This was the first sedition among the Citizens of ROME, that fell out with murder and bloudshed, fince the expulsion of the Kings. But for all other former diffentions (which were no trifles) they were eafily pacified, either Party giving place to other: the Senate for fear of the Commoners, and the People for reverence they bare to the Senate. And it feemeth that Tiberius himfelf would eafily have yeelded also, if they had proceeded by fair means and perswafion, so they had meant good faith, and would have killed no man: for at that time he had not in 'all above three thouland men of the people about him. But furely it feemes this conspiracy was executed against him, more for very spite and malice the rich men did bear him, then for any other apparent cause they presupposed against him. For proof hereof may be alledged, the barbarous cruelty they used to his Body being dead. For they would not suffer his own Brother to have his Body to bury it by night, who made earnest fuite unto them for it; but they threw him amongst the other Bodies into the River, and yet this was not the worst. For, fome of his friends they banished without form of Law, and others they put to death which they flain. could meet withall. Among the which they flew Diophanes the Orator, and one Caim Biblins, whom The cruell they inclosed in a Pipe among Snakes and Serpents, and put him to death in this fort. Bloffins also the death of Cains Philosopher of Cumes, was brought before the Consuls, and examined about this matter: who boldly Bibling. confessed unto them, that he did as much as Tiberius commanded him. When Nasica did ask him. And what if he had commanded thee to fet fire on the Capitoll? He made him answer, that Tiberius would never have given him any fuch commandment. And when divers others also were still in hand with him about that question: But if he had commanded thee? I would fure have done it: faid he: for he would never have commanded me to have done it, if it had not been for the commodity of the People. Thus he scaped at that time, and afterwards fled into Asia unto Aristonicia, whom missortune having overthrown, he flew himself. Now, the Senate to pacifie the People at that present time did no more withftand the Law Agraria, for division of the Lands of the Common-wealth, but fuffered the People to appoint another Commissioner for that purpose in Tiberius place. Thereupon Publius Crassus was chosen, being allied unto Tiberius, for Caiss Gracebus (Tiberius Brother) had married his Daughter Licinia. Yet Cornelius Nepos saith, that it was not Crassus Daughter Caiss married, but the Daughter of Brutm, that triumphed for the LUSITANIANS. Howbeit the best Writers and authority agree with that we write. But whatfoever was done, the People were marvellously offended with his death; and men might easily perceive that they looked but for time and opportunity to be revenged, and titd prefently threaten Nafica to accuse him. Whereupon the Senate fearing some trouble towards him; devised a way (upon no occasión) to send him into A s 1A. For the common People did not diffemble the malice they bare him when they met him , but were very round with him, and called him Tyrant, and murderer, excontinunicate, and wicked man, that had imbrued his hands in the bloud of the holy Tribune, and within the most facred Temple of all the City. So in the end he was inforced to forfake ROME, though by his Office he was bound to folemnize all the greatest Sacrifices, because he was then chief Bishop of ROME. Thus travelling out of his Countrey like a mean man, and troubled in his mind, he died shortly after, not far from the City of Nafica chief PERGAMUS, Truly, it is not greatly to be wondred at, though the People fo much hated Nafica, Rome. confidering that Scipio the AFRICAN himself (whom the People of ROME for juster causes had loved better then any man elfe whatfoever) was like to have loft all the Peoples good will they bare him, because that being at the Siege of Numantia, when news was brought him of Tiberius death, he rang out this Verse of Homer

Such end upon him ever light. Which in fuch doings doth delight.

Furthermore, being asked in the affembly of the People, by Caisa and Fulvius, what he thought death of Tibeof Tiberius death : he answered them , that he did not like his doings. After that the People hand rins Gracebus. led him very churlifhly, and did ever break off his Oration, which they never did before: and he himself also would revile the People even in the Assembly. Now Casus Gracehus at the first because he feared the Enemies of his dead Brother, or otherwise, for that he sought means to make them more hated of the People, he ablented himself for a time out of the common Affembly, and kept at home, and medled not, as a man contented to live meanly, without bufying himself in the Common-wealth: insomuch as he made men think and report both, that he did utterly missike those matters which his Brother had preferred. Howbeit he was then but a young man, and nine years younger then his Brother Tiberine, who was not thirty years old when he was slain. But in process of time, he made his manners and conditions (by little and little) appear, who hated floth and curiofity, and was leaft of all given unto any coverous mind of getting : for he gave himself to be Eloquent , as preparing him Wings afterwards to pra-Stife in the Common-wealth. So that it appeared plainly, that when time came, he would not Rand Rill and look on. When one Vellius a friend of his was fued, he took upon him to defend his Cause in Court. The people that were present, and heard him speak, they leaped for joy to see him : for he had such an Eloquent Tongue, that all the Oratours besides were but Children to him. Hereupon the rich men began to be afraid again, and whilpered among themselves, that it behoved Cains Gracebus them to beware he came not to be Tribune. It chanced so that he was chosen Treasurer, and it was his fortune to go into the Isle of SARDINIA, with the Confull Orefles. His Enemies were glad of that, and he himfelf-was not forry for it. For he was a Martiall man, and asskilfull in Arms as he was else an excellent Oratour: but yet he was afraid to come into the Pulpit for Orations, and milliked to deal in matters of State, albeit he could not altogether deny the People, and his friends that prayed his furtherance. For this cause therefore he was very glad of this Voyage, that he might absent himself for a time out of ROME: though divers were of Opinion, that he was more Popular, and defirous of the common Peoples good will and favour, then his Brother had been before him. But indeed he was clean contrary: for it appeared that at the first he was drawn rather against his will, then of any speciall desire he had to deal in the Common-wealth. Cicero the Oratour also Catus Gracous faith, that Cains was bent altogether to flie from Office in the Common-wealth, and to live quietly as a private man. But Tiberim ((aim Brother) appeared to him in his sleep, and calling him by his Name, faid unto him : Brother, why doest thou prolong time, for thou canst not possibly escape? For we were both predestinated to one manner of life and death, for procuring the benefit of the People. Now when Caiss arrived in SARDINIA, he shewed all the proofs that might be in a valiant man, and excelled all the young men of his age in hardiness against his Enemies, in justice to his Inseriours, and in love and obedience towards the Consull his Captain: but in Temperance, Sobriety, and in Painfulnels, he excelled all them that were elder then he. The Winter by chance fell out very sharp, and full of sickness in SARDINIA: whereupon the Consult sent unto the Cities to help his Souldiers with some cloaths: but the Towns sent in post to ROME, to pray the Senate they might be discharged of that burden. The Senate found their allegation reasonable, whereupon they wrote to the Confull to find some other means to cloath his People. The Confull could make no other shift for them, and so the poor souldiers in the mean time smarted for it, But Cains Gracehon went himself unto the Cities, and so perswaded them, that they of themselves fent to the ROMAN'S Camp such things as they lacked. This being carried to ROME, it was thought straight it was a prety beginning to creep into the Peoples favour, and indeed it made the Senate also afraid. In the neck of that , there arrived Ambassadours of Africk at Rome, fent from King Micipsa, who told the Senate that the King their Master, for Caim Gracchu fake, had fent their Army Corn into SARDINIA. The Senatours were fo offended withall, that they thrust the Ambassadours out of the Senate, and so gave order that other Souldiers should be sent in their places that were in SARDINIA : and that Oreflee should still remain Confull there, meaning alfo to continue Caises their Treasurer. But when he heard of it, he straight took Sea, and returned Caiss Gracebus to ROME in choller. When men faw Caisse returned to ROME unlooked for , he was reproved for it, not onely by his Enemies, but by the common People also, who thought his return very strange before his Captain, under whom he was Treasurer. He being accused hereof before the Cenfors, prayed he might be heard. So, answering his Accusation, he so turned the Peoples minds that heard him, that they all faid, he had open wrong. For he told them, that he had ferved twelve years in the Wars, where others were enforced to remain but ten years; and that he had continued Treafurer under his Captain the space of three years, where the Law gave him Liberty to return at the end of one year. And that he alone of all men else that had been in the Wars, had carried his Purfe full, and brought is home empty; where others having drunk the Wine which they car-ried thither in Veffels, had afterwards brought them home full of Gold and Silver. Afterwards they went about to accuse him as accessary to a conspiracy that was revealed in the City of FREGELLES. But having cleared all that suspicion, and being discharged, he presently made suit to be Tribune: wherein he had all the men of quality his sworn Enemies. On the other side also he had so great favour of the common People, that there came men out of all parts of ITALY to be at his Election, and that such a number of them, as there was not lodging to be had for them all. Furthermore, the Field of Mars not being large enough to hold fuch a multitude of People, there were that gave their CaiwGracobus voices upon the tops of houses. Now the Noblemen could no otherwise lett the People of their will, nor prevent Caim of his hope, but where he thought to be the first Tribune, hewas onely pronounced the fourth. But when he was once possest Officer, he became immediately the chief man, because he was as Eloquent as any man of his time. And furthermore, he had a large occasion of calamity offered him : which made him bold to speak, bewailing the death of his Brother. For what matters foever he spake of, he always fell in talk of that, remembring them what matters had passed, and laying before them the examples of their Ancestours, who in old time had made

War with the PHALISCES, by means of one Genetine Tribune of the People, unto whom

they had offered injury : who also did condemn Cains Peterins to death; because that he onely would not give a Tribune place, coming through the Market place: Where these, said he, in your presence, and before your facts, have flain my brother Therisse with flaves, and have dragged his body from the mount of the Capitol, and all the City over; to throw it into the reference and with him also have most cruelly flain all his friends they could come by, without any law or justice at all. And ver by an ancient cuftom of long time observed in this City of Rom E, when any man is accused of Treason, and that of duty he must appear at the time appointed him, they do not withflanding in the morning fend a Trumpet to his house, to summon him to appear; and moreover the Judges were not wont to condemn him, before his ceremony was performed : fo carefull and respective were our predecessors, where is touched the life of any ROMAN. Now Cains having first stirred up the people with these perswasions (for he had a marvellous loud voice) he preferred two laws :

The first, that he that had once been put out of Office by the people, should never after be capable afany other Office.

The fecond, that if any Confut had banished any Citizen without lawfull acculation, the sentence laws. and hearing of the matter should pertain to the people.

The first of these two laws did plainly defame Ottavins, whom Tiberits his brother had by the people deposed from the Tribuneship. The second also touched Popilius, who being Prator, had banished his brother. Tibering friends; whereupon he staid not the trial, but willingly exiled himself out of ITALY. And touching the first law, Caise himself did afterwards revoke it, declaring unto the people that he had faved Octavine at the request of his mother Cornelin. The people were very glad of it, and confirmed it, honouring her no lels for respect of her sons, then also for Scipio's sake her father. For afterwards they cast her image in brafs, and fet it up with this inscription : Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi. Many common matters are found written touching Cornelia his mother, and ther of the eloquently pleaded in her behalf, by Caim against her adversaries. As when he said unto one of them: Gracchi honou-How dareft thou prefume to speak evil of Cornelia that had Tiberius to her son? And the other party red by the peoalso that flandered her, being forely suspected for a Sodomite : And art thou so impudent, said he, to ple of Rome. shew thy face before Cornelia? Hast thou brought forth children as she hath done? and yet it is well known to all men in ROME, that the being but a woman, hath lived longer without a man, then thou that art a man. Thus were Cains words tharp and ftinging, and many fuch like as are to be gathered out of his writings. Furthermore, he made many other laws afterwards to encrease the peoples authoray, and to imbale the Senates greatnels,

The first was, for the restoring of the Colonies to Rome, in dividing the lands of the Commontrealth unto the poor Citizens that should inhabit there.

The other, that they should apparell the Souldiers at the charge of the Commonwealth, and that it should not be deducted out of their pay: and also that no Citizen should be billed to serve in the wars. under seventeen years of age at the least.

Another law was, for their Confederates of ITALY, that through all ITALY they should have as free voices in the election of any Magistrate, as the natural Citizens of ROME it self.

Another, fetting a reasonable price of the Corn that should be distributed unto the poor people, Another touching judgment, whereby he did greatly minish the authority of the Senate.

For before, the Senators were onely Judges of all matters, the which made them to be the more honoured and feared of the people, and the ROMAN Knights: and now he joyned three hundred Ro-MAN Knights unto the other three hundred Senators, and brought so to pass, that all matters judicial should be equally judged among those fix hundred men. After he had passed this law, it is reported he was very curious in observing all other things, but this one thing specially, that where all other Orators speaking to the people turned them towards the palace where the Senators fate, and to that fide of the Market-place which is called Comitium: he in contrary manner when he made his Oration, turned him outwards towards the other fide of the Market-place; and after that kept it confrantly, and never failed. Thus by a little turning and altering of his look onely, he removed a great matter. For he so transferred all the Government of the Commonwealth from the Senate unto the judgement of the people, to teach the Orators by his example, that in their Orations they should behold the people, not the Senate. Now, the people having not onely confirmed the law he made touching the Judges, but given him also full power and authority to chuse among the ROMAN Knights fuch Judges as he liked of, he found thereby he had absolute power in his own hands, infomuch as Caint Gracebus the Senators themselves did ask counsel of him. So did he ever give good counsel, and did prefer matters meet for their honour. As amongst others, the law he made touching certain Other laws of Wheat that Fabins Vice Prator had fent out of Spain, which was a good and honourable Caine Gracebus act; he perswaded the Senate that the Corn might be fold, and so to send back again the money thereof unto the Towns and Cities from whence the Corn came: and therewithall to punish Fabius for that he made the Empire of Rome hatefull and intollerable unto the Provinces and subjects of the fame. This matter wan him great love and commendation of all the Provinces subject to ROME. Furthermore, he made laws for the restoring of the decayed Towns, for mending Highways, for building of Garners for provision of Corn. And to bring all these things to pass, he himself took upon him the onely care and enterprise, being never wearied with any pains taken in ordering of so great affairs. For, he followed all those things so earnestly and effectually, as if he had had but one matter in hand; infomuch that they who most hated and feared him, wondred much to fee his diligence and quick dispatch in matters. The people also wondred much to behold

hint onedy, feeing alwaiss such a number of laboraces, artificets, mabashadors, efficers, fouldiers, and learned men, wheathe early fatished and differents, feetings, fill-his efface, and yet using great courtefic and civility, entertaining every one of them privately; for that he made his accoders to be found liars, that faid he was a flately man and very cruel. Thus he was the good will of the common people, being more popular and familiar in his converfation and deeds then he was otherwife in his Orations. But the greatest pains and care be took upon thim $25, in feeing the High-ways mended, the which he would have as well done, as profitably done. For he would caff the causes by ucu, the wineture wound have an inch would pave them with hard floor, and cafe a great deal of gravel-upon is, which he canded to be brought thinker. When he found any low or watery places which the Rivers had caren into, he ratio them up, or effe made. Bridges over them, with an even height equal to either fide of the cause; so that all his work, carried a goodly level withall, even by the line or planmet, which was a pleasure to behold. Eurthermore, he divided these Highways by miles, every mile containing eight furlongs, and at every miles end he fer sp a floor for a mark. At either end also of these High-ways thus paved, he fer occuan floores, of convenient eight furlougt. height, a pretty way affunder, to help the travellers by to take their horfebacks again without any help. The people for these things highly praising and extolling him, and being ready to make shew nery. The people for their though rightly yearing and carrier and comply one day in his Oration, of their love and good will to him any manner of way, he told them openly one day in his Oration, that he had a request to make unto them, the which if it would please them to grant him, he would think they did him a marvellous pleasure; and if they denied him also, he cared nos much. Then every man thought it was the Confulthing he means to ask, and that he would fue to be Tribune and Conful together. But when the day came to chuse the Confuls, every man looking auentisely what he would do, they marvelled when they the him come down the field of Mons, and brought Caim Fanniss with his friends to further his fuit for the Confulfhip. Therein he ferved Farmiss turn, for and that they thould grant all the LATINES the freedom of ROME. The Senate perceiving his

Ceius Gracebus he was prefendly cholen Conful : and Cains Gracebus was the fecond time cholen Tribune again, not chefen Tribune at his own fute but by the good will of the people. Cains perceiving that the Senators were his own the fecond time pen enemies, and that Fanniss the Confull was but a flack friend use him, he began again to cutry favour with the common people, and to prefer new laws, fetting forth the law of the Colonies, that they should fend of the poor Chizens to replenish the Cities of TARENTUM and CAPUA, power grew great, and that in the end he would be fo frong that they could not withfrand bent, they devifed a new and frange way to pluck the peoples good will from him, in granting them things not alrogenher very honeft. There was one of the Tribunes, a brother in office with Cains called Levism Limit Drufus, a man nobly born, and as well brought up as any other ROMAN: who for wealth and

unto him, and perswaded him to take part with them against Caises, not to use any force or violence against the people to withstand them in anything, but contrarily to grant them those things which were against the people to withstand them in anything, but contrarily to grant them those things which were more honesty for them to deny them with their ill-will. Livium offering to pleasure the Senate with his more honesty for them to deny them with their ill-will. Livium offering to pleasure the Senate with his by Livium Dun. by Living Drie no other end, but contending with Cause who should most flatter the people of thems two, as players do in their common plays, to thew the people passime. Whereby the Sesate shewed that they did not fo much millike form doings, as for the delire they had to overthrow him and his great credit with the people. For where Cain preferred but the replenishing of the two Cities, and defired to fend the honestest Citizens thinker, they objected against him, that he did corrupt the common people. On the other fide also they favoured Drafat, who preferred a law, that they should replenish twelve Colonies, and should tend to every one of them three thousand of the poorest Caizzess. And where they hated Caises for that he had charged the poor Chizens with an annual rent for the lands that were divided unto them, Living in contrary manner did please them by disbordening them of that rent and payment, letting them have the lands (confree. Furthermore also, where Canar did anger the people, because he gave the LATINES the freedom of ROME to give their voices in change of Magistrates as freely as the natural ROMANS, when Drufas on the other fide had preferred a law that thenceforth no ROMAN should whip a souldier of the LATINES with roduce the Wars, they liked the law, and past it. Livin also in every law he put forth said in all his Orations, that he did it by the counsell of the Senate, who were very carefull for the profit of the people : and this was all the good be did in his office unto the Commonwealth. For by this means the people were better pleased with the Senate, and where before they did hate all the Noblemen of the Senate, Liwine took away that malice, when the people faw that all that he propounded, was for the preferencest and benefit of the Commonwealth, with the content and furtherance of the Senane. The onely thing also that perswaded the people to think that Drujas meant uprightly, and that he onely re-spected the profit of the common people, was, that he never preferred any law for himself, or for his ownbenefit. For in the reftoring of these Colonies which he preserved, he always sent other Committioners, and gave them a charge of it, and would never finger any money himfelf: where Cains took upon him the care and charge of all things himself, and specially of the greatest manters. Rubrius also another Tribune, having preferred a law for the re-editying and repleasiting of CARTHAGE again with people, the which Scipio had razed and deftroyed, it was Coins hap to be appointed one of the Commissioners for it: whereupon he took (hip and failed into AFRICK. Drafas in the mean time taking occasion of his ablence, did as much as might be to feek the favour of the common people, and specially by accusing Faloises who was one of the best friends Come had,

TIBERIUS and CAIUS. and whom they had also chosen Commissioner with him for the division of these lands among the Citizens whom they fent to replenish these Colonies. This Fulvius was a seditious man, and there- Fulvius Comfore marvelloufly hated of the Senate, and withall suspected also of them that took part with the missioner with people, that he fecretly practifed to make their Confederates of ITALY to rebell. But yet they feditions man. had no evident proof of it to justifie it against him, more then that which he himself did verifie. because he seemed to be offended with the peace and quietness they enjoyed. And this was one of the chiefest causes of Cains overthrow, because that Fulvine was partly hated for his sake. For when Scipio African was found dead one morning in his house, without any manifest cause how he fhould come to his death fo fuddenly (faving that there appeared certain blind marks of stripes on Scibio Altican. his body, that had been given him, as we have declared at large in his life) the most part of the sufpition of his death was laid to Fulviss, being his mortal enemy, and because the same day they had been at great words together in the Pulpit for Orations. So was Cains Gracehus also partly suspected for it. Howfoever it was, such a horrible murther as this, of so famous and worthy a man as any was in ROME, was yet notwithstanding never revenged, neither any inquiry made of it, because the common people would not fuffer the accufation to go forward, fearing left Cains would be found in fault, if the matter should go forward. But this was a great while before. Now Caim at that time being in Africk about the re-edifying and replenishing of the City of CARTHAGE again, the which he named Junonia, the voice goeth that he had many ill fignes and tokens ap- unlucky figns peared unto him. For the ftaff of his Enfign was broken with a vehement blaft of wind, and with appearing unto the force of the Enlign-bearer that held it fast on the other side. There came a flaw of wind also that Caius. carried away the facrifices upon the Altars, and blew them quite out of the circuit which was marked out for the compass of the City. Furthermore, the Wolvescame and took away the marks which they had fet down to limit the bounds of their circuit, and carried them quite away. This notwithflanding, Caises having dispatched all things in the space of threescore and ten days, he returned incontinently to ROME, understanding that Fulvius was oppressed by Drusus, and that those matters required his presence. For Lucius Hostilius that was all in all for the Nobility, and a man of great This man is credit with the Senate, being the year before put by the Confulfhip by Cains practife, who caused named after-Fannius to be chosen, he had good hope this year to speed, for the great number of friends that wards Opinius, furthered his fuit. So that if he could obtain it, he was fully bent to fet Cains beside the saddle, and the rather, because his estimation and countenance he was wont to have among the people, began now to decay, for that they were full of fuch devices as his were: because there were divers others that preferred the like to pleafe the people withall, and yet with the Senates great good will and favour. So Caius being returned to ROME, he removed from his house, and where before he dwelt in mount Palatine, he came now to take a house under the Market-place, to shew himself thereby the lowlier and more popular, because many of the meaner fort of the people dwelt thereabouts. Then he purposed to go forward with the rest of his laws, and to make the people to establish them, a great number of people repairing to ROME out of all parts for the furtherance thereof. Howbeit the Senate counselled the Consult Fannius to make proclamation, that all those which were no natural ROMANS, refident and abiding within the City felf of ROME, that they should depart out of ROME. Besides all this there was a strange proclamation made, and never seen before; that none of all the friends and Confederates of the ROMANS for certain days should come into ROME. But Cains on the other fide fet up bills on every post, accusing the Consul for making so wicked a proclamation: and further, promiled the Confederates of ROME to aid them, if they would remain there against the Consuls proclamation. But yet he performed it not: for when he saw one of Fan-nius Sergeams carry a friend of his to prison, he held on his way, and would see nothing, neither did he help him: either of likelihood because he seared his credit with the people, which began to decay, or else because he was loth (as he said) to pick any quarrel with his Enemies, which sought it of him. Furthermore, he chanced to fall at variance with his brethren the Tribunes, about this would yield to it. Wherefore he staid till the night before the pastime should be, and then he took all his labourers he had under him, and went and overthrew the scaffolds every one of them : so that the next morning all the Market-place was clear for the common people to fee the pastime at their pleasure. For this fact of his, the people thanked him marvellously, and took him for a wor-fpake fomewhat two proudly to his enemies that were merry with the matter, and laughed him to fcorn: that they laughed a SARDONIANS laugh, not knowing how darkly his deeds were intangled. Furthermore, his enemies having chosen Opimius Consul, they began immediately to revoke divers of Casus laws; as amongst the rest, his doings at CARTHAGE for the re-edifying of that City, procuring thus all the waies they could to anger him, because they might have just occasion of anger to kill him. Cains notwithstanding did patiently bear it at the first:

occasion. The people were to fee the pastime of the Sword-players or Fencers at the sharp, with- Cains Gratchus in the very Market-place, and there were divers of the Officers that to fee the sport, did fet up scaf- tell out with folds round about, to take money for the standing. Caius commanded them to take them down the Tribunes. again, because the poor men might see the sport without any cost. But not a man of them thy man. Howbeit his brethren the Tribunes were very much offended with him, and took him for a bold prefumptuous man. This feemeth to be the chief cause why he was put from his third Caine Gracebus Tribunelhip, where he had the most voices on his side: because his Colleagues, to be revenged the third Triof the part he had played them, of malice and spite made false report of the voices. Howbeit there buneship. is no great troth in this. It is true that he was very angry with this repulle, and it is reported he but afterwards his friends, and specially Fulvius, did encourage him so, that he began again to gather men to resist the Consull. And it is reported also, that Cornelia his mother did help him in it, Sedition betwist Caius Gracchus and the Senate.

fecretly hiring a great number of strangers which she sent unto Rome, as if they had been Reapers, or harvest men. And this is that the wrote secretly in her letter unto her son in Ciphers. And yet otherwrite to the contrary, that she was very angry he did attempt those things. When the day came that they should proceed to the revocation of his laws, both parties met by break of day at the Capitol. There when the Confull Opimius had done facrifice, one of Caius Sergeants called Quintus Attyllius, carrying the intrails of the beaft factificed, faid unto Fulvius, and others of his tribe that were about him : give place to honest men, vile Citizens that ye be. Some say also, that besides these injurious words, in from and contempt he held out his naked Arm to make them ashamed: whereupon they slew him presently in the field with great Bodkins to write with, which they had purpofely made for that intent. So the common people were marvelloufly oftended for this ur Gracebus une, man purposes, man of both fides also were diversly affected. For Caim was very forry Sergent flain murther, and the chief men of both fides also were diversly affected. For Caim was very forry for it, and bitterly reproved them that were about him, faying, that they had given their enemies the occasion they looked for, to fet upon them. Opimius the Conful in contrary manner, taking this occasion, rose upon it, and did stir up the people to be revenged. But there fell a showre of rain at that time that parted them. The next morning the Conful having affembled the Senate by break of day, as he was difpatching causes within, some had taken the body of Anyllim, and laid it naked upon the Bier, and so carried it through the Market-place, (as it was agreed upon before amongst them) and brought it to the Senate door, where they began to make great moan and lamentation, Opimisus knowing the meaning of it, but yet he diffembled it, and feemed to wonder at it. Whereupon the Senators went out to fee what it was, and finding this Bier in the Market place, some fell a weeping for him that was dead, others cryed out, that it was a shamefull act, and in no wife to be suffered. But on the other side, this did revive the old grudge and malice of the people, for the wickednels of the ambitious Noblemen: who having themselves before slain Tiberius Gracehus that was Tribune, and within the Capitol it felf, and had also cast his body into the river, did now make an honourable fnew openly in the Market-place, of the body of the Sergeant Anyllius (who though he were wrongfully flain, yet had himfelf given them the cause that slew him, to do that they did) and all the whole Senate were about the Bier to bewail his death, and to honour the funerals of an hireling, to make people also kill him that was onely left the Protector and Defender of the people. After this, they went again into the Capitol, and there made a decree, whereby they gave the Conful Opimius extraordinary power and authority, An Ordinance by abfolute power to provide for the fafety of the Commonwealth, to preferve the City, and to fupmade by the Prefs the Tyrants. This decree being established, the Consul prefently commanded the Senators Sonate against that were present there, to go arm themselves; and appointed the ROMAN Knights that the next Cains Gracebus morning betimes every man should bring two of their men armed with them. Fulvius on the other fide prepared his force against them, and affembled the common people together. Cains also returning from the Market-place, staid before the image of his father, and looked earnestly uponit without ever a word speaking, onely he burst out a weeping, and setching a great sigh, went his way. This made the people that faw him to pitty him: fo that they talked among themselves, that they were but beafts and cowards at such a straight to forfake so worthy a man. Thereupon they went to his haufe, flayed there all night and watched beforehis gate: not as they did that watched with Fulvius, that paffed away the night in guzling and drinking drunk, crying out, and making noife, Fulvius himself being drunk first of all, who both spake and did many things far unmeet for his calling. For on the other fide, they that watched Caius were very forrowfull, and made no noile, even as in a common calamity of their Countrey, deviling with themselves what would fall out upon it, waking and sleeping one after another by turns. When the day brake, they with Fulvius did awake him, who slept yet foundly for the Wine he drank over night, and they armed themselves with the spoils of the GAULS that hung round about his house, whom he had overthrown in battle the fame year he was Confull: and with great cries, and thundering threats they went to take the mount Aventine. But Cains would not arm himself, but went out of his house in a long Gown, as if he would have gone simply into the Market-place according to his wonted manner, faving that he carried a short dagger at his girdle under his Gown. So as he was going out of his house, his wife staid him at the door, and holding him by the one hand, and a little child of his in her other hand, the faid thus unto him: "Alas Cains, thou doft not The words of a now go as thou were wont, a Tribune into the Market-place to speak to the people, neither to Lithisto her prefer any new laws: neither doft thou go unto an honeft War, that if unfortunately that hubband Crims is should happen to thee that is common to all men, I might yet at the least mourn for thy death Grandhar. " with honour. But thou goeft to put thy felf into bloody Butchers hands, who most cruelly have "flain thy brother Tiberius: and yet thou goeft a naked man unarmed, intending rather to suffer "then to do hurt. Befides, thy death can bring no benefit to the Commonwealth. For the worfer "part hath now the upper hand, confidering that fentence passeth by force of sword. Had thy brother been slain by his enemies , before the City of Numantia, yet had they given us his body to have buried him. But such may be my misfortune, that I may presently go to pray the Ri-"ver or fea to give me thy body, when as thy brothers, it shall likewise be thrown into the same. A-"las, what hope or trust is lest us now in the laws or gods, sithence they have slain Tiberius? As Licinia was making this pittiful moanu to him, Cains sair and softly pulled his hand from her, and lest her giving her never a word, but went on with his friends. But the reaching after him to pull him by the Gown, fell to the ground, lay flatling there a great while, speaking never a word, untill at length her servant took her up in a swoon, and carried her so unto her brother Crassiu. Now Fulvius, by Fulvius sent the perswasion of Caim, when all their faction were met, sent his younger son (which was a pretty fair his son to the boy) with an Heraulds rod in his hand for fafety. This boy humbly prefenting his duty, with the Conful, with an tears in his eyes, before the Conful and Senate, offered them peace. The most of them that were Heraulds rod present thought very well of it. But Opimius made answer, faying, that it became them not to fend to offer peace. meffengers, thinking with fair words to win the Senate : but it was their duty to come themselves in person like subjects, and offenders to make their trial, and so to crave pardon, and to seek to pacifie the wrath of the Senate. Then he commanded the boy he should not return again to them but with this condition he had prescribed. Caius (as it is reported) was ready to go and clear himfelf unto the Senate: but the refidue would not fuffer him to go. Whereupon Fulvius fent his fon back again unto them, to speak for them as he had done before. But Opimius that was defirous to fight, caused the boy to be taken, and committed him to safe custody, and then went prefently against Fulvius with a great number of footmen well armed, and of CRETAN Archers befides, who with their Arrows did more trouble and hurt their enemies, then with any thing elfe, that within a while they all began to fly. Fulvius on the other fide fled into an old hot-house that no body made reckoning of, and there being found shortly after, they slew him and his eldest son. Now The death of for Caims, he fought not at all, but being mad with himself, and grieved to see such blood-shed; Fulvius and his he got him into the Temple of Diana, where he would have killed himself, had not his very good eldett ion. friends Pomponius and Licinius faved him. For both they being with him at that time, took his fword from him, and counfelled him to fly. It is reported that then he fell down on his knees, and holding up both his hands unto the goddels, he befought her that the people might never come out of bondage, to be revenged of this their ingratitude and treason. For the common people (or the most part of them) plainly turned their coats, when they heard proclamation made, that all men had pardon granted them that would return. So Cains fled upon it, and his enemies followed him fo The flight of near that they overtook him upon the wooden Bridge, where two of his friends that were with Gracebus. him flaid, to defend him against his pursuers, and bad him in the mean time make shift for himself, whilst they fought with them upon the Bridge: and so they did, and kept them that not a man got the Bridge of them untill they were both flain. Now there was none that fled with Cains, but one of his men called Philocrates: notwithstanding, every man did still encourage and counsel him, as they do men to win a game, but no man would help him, nor offer him any horse though he often required it, because he saw his enemies so near unto him. This notwithstanding, by their desence that were flain upon the Bridge, he got ground on them fo, that he had leifure to creep into a little grove of wood which was confecrated to the Furies. There his fervant Philocrates flew him. and then flew himself also, and fell dead upon him. Other write notwithstanding, that both the master The faithfuland fervant were overtaken, and taken alive: and that his fervant did fo ftraight embrace his mafter, nefs of Catas that none of the enemies could strike him for all the blows they gave, before he was slain himself. So one of the murtherers strake off Caius Gracchus head to carry to the Consul. Howbeit one of Opimius friends called Septimuleius, took the head from the other by the way, because proclamation was made by Trumpet before they fought, that who foever brought the heads of Fulvius and Caius, they should be paid the weight of them in Gold. Wherefore this Septimuleius carried Caius head upon the top of his spear unto Opimius: whereupon the scales being brought to weigh it, it was found to weigh seventeen pound weight and two third parts of a pound : because Septimuleius besides the horrible murder he had committed, had also holpen it with this villainy, that he had taken out his brain, and in lieu thereof had filled his fcull with Lead. Now the other also that brought Fulvius head, because they were poor men, they had nothing. The bodies of these two men, Cains Gracehus and Fulvius, and of other their followers (which were to the number of three thoufand that were flain) were all thrown into the River, their goods confifcate, and their widdows forbidden to mourn for their death. Furthermore, they took from Licinia Caius wife, her jointer : but yet they dealt more cruelly and beaftly with the young boy, Fulvius fon; who had neither lift up his hand against them, nor was in the fight among them, but onely came to them to make peace before they fought; whom they kept as prisoner, and after the battle ended they put him to death. But yet that which most of all grieved the people was the Temple of Concord, the which Opimius caused to The Temple of be built : for it appeared that he boafted, and in manner triumphed, that he had flain fo many Citizens Concord built of ROME. And therefore there were that in the night wrote under the inscription of the Temple these Contul.

This Opimius was the first man at Rows, that being Consull, usurped the absolute power of the Dictator: and that without law or justice condemned three thousand Citizens of Rows before first Consul, using the condemned three thousand Citizens of Rows before first Consul, using the consultance of t Fulvius Flaccus (who had also been Conful, and had received the honour of triumph) and Caius furping the Gracehus a young man in like case, who in vertue and reputation excelled all the men of his years, power of the This notwithstanding could not keep Opimius from thievery and extortion. For when he was Distor. fent Ambaffador unto Jugurth King of Numidia, he was bribed with Money: and thereupon Opimia bribed being accused, he was most shamefully convicted, and condemned. Wherefore he ended his days Fagurib and with this reproach and infamy, hated and mocked of all the people: because at the time of the condemned.

TIBERIUS and CAIUS GRACCHI, with AGIS and (LEOMENES.

Ow that we be come to the end of this Hiftory, we are to compare the Lives of these two men the one with the other. First, as touching the two Gracchi, their The wildom of Enemies that most hated them, and spake the worst they could of them, could the Gracibi. not deny but that they were the best given to vertue, and as well taught and brought up as any ROMANS that were in their time. But yet it appeareth, that nature had the upper hand of them, in Agis and Cleomenes. For they having been very ill brought up both for Learning and good Manners, for lack whereof the oldest men were almost spoiled, yet did they notwithstanding make themselves the first masters and example of sobriety, temperance, and simplicity of life. Furthermore, the two first having lived in that time when ROME flourished most in honour and vertuous desires, they were more then ashamed to forsake the vertues inherited from their Ancestors. These two last also being born of fathers that had a clean contrary disposition, and finding their Countrey altogether without any order, and infected with diffolute life, were not therefore any whit the more flack in their defire to do well. Furthermore the greatest praise they gave unto the two Gracchi, was, their abstinence and integrity from taking of money all the time they were in office, and dealt in matters of state, ever keeping their hands clean, and took not a penny wrongfully from any man. Where Agis on the other fide was offended if any man praised him, for that he took nothing from another man: feeing that he dispossessed himself of his own goods, and gave it to his Citizens, which amounted in ready coyn to the value of fix hundred talents. Whereby men may eafily judge, how grievous a fin he thought it to take any thing wrongfully from any man, feeing that he thought it a kind of avarice, lawfully to be richer then others. Furthermore, there was marvellous great difference in their alterations, and renewing of the state, which they did both prefer. For the acts of the two ROMANS were to mend high ways and to re-edific and replenish decayed Towns: and the worthiest act Tiberius did, was the law Agraria, which he brought in for dividing of the lands of the Commonwealth amongst the poor Citizens. And the best act his brother Cains also did, was the mingling of the Judges, adding to the three hundred Senators three hundred ROMAN Knights to be indifferent Judges with them. Whereas Agis and Cleomenes in contrary manner were of opinion, that to reform fmall faults, and to redrefs them by little and little, was (as Plate faid) to cut off one of the Hydraes heads, of the which came afterwards feven in the place : and therefore they took upon them a change and innovation, even at once to root out all the mischiefs of their Countrey (or to speak more truly, to take away the diforder which brought in all vice and mifchief to the Commonwealth) and so to restore the City of SPARTA again to her former ancient honourable estate: Now this may be faid again for the government of the Gracchi, that the chiefest men of Rome were ever against their purposes. Where, in that Agis attempted, and Cleomenes ended, they had the noblest ground that could be, and that was the ancient Laws and Ordinances of SPARTA, touching temperance and equality: the first, instituted in old time by Lycurgus, the other confirmed by Apollo.

Furthermore, by the alterations of the first, Rome became no greater then it was before. Where, The sets of the by that which Cleomenes did, all GREECE in short time faw that SPARTA commanded all the the profit Rome, reft of Peloponnesus, and fought at that time against those that were of greatest power in all GREECE, for the figniory thereof. Whereby their only mark and purpose was, to rid all GREECE from the Wars of the GAULS and ILLYRIANS, and to reftore it again to the honeft Government of the race and line of Hercules. Their deaths (methinks) do shew great difference of their courages. For the Gracehi fighting with their own Citizens, were flain flying. Of these two also, The end of the Agu, because he would put never a Citizen to death, was slain in manner voluntarily: and Cleaments receiving injury flood to his defence, and when he had no opportunity to do it, he floutly killed himfelf. And so may it be faid on the other side, that Agis did never any notable act of a Captain or Souldier, because he was slain besore he could come to it. And for the victories of Cleomenes on the other fide, may be opposed the scaling of the walls of CARTHAGE, where Tiberius was the first man that at the assault got up upon the wall, which was no small exploit: and the peace which he made also at the siege of Numantia, whereby he saved twenty thousand sighting men of the Ro-MANS, the which had no means otherwife to fave their lives. And Caim also in the felf fame war, at the fiege of Numantia, and afterwards in Sardinia, did many noble feats of War; for that there is no doubt, but if they had not been slain so soon as they were, they might have been compared with the excellentest Captains that ever were in ROME. Again, touching their doings in civil policy, it appeareth that Agis dealt more flackly, being abuted by Agefilam: who likewise deceived the poor Citizens of the division of the lands which he had promised them. In fine, for lack of courage, because he was very young, he lest the things undone which he had purposed to have performed. On the other fide, Cleomenes went too roundly to work, to renew the ancient government of the Commonwealth again, by killing the Ephores with too much cruelty, whom he might easily have won, or otherwise by force have gotten the upper hand. For it is not the part of a wife Phylician, nor of a good governour of a Commonwealth to ule the fword, but in great extremity, where there is no other help nor remedy; and there lacked judgement in them both, but worst of all in the one, for injury is ever joyned with cruelty. The Gracchi on the other side, neither the one nor the other began to imbrue their hands in the blood of their Citizens. For it is reported, that though they did hurt Caim, yet he would never defend himself: and where it was known that he was very valiant in battle with his fword in his hand against the enemy, he shewed himself as cold again in the uproar against his Citizens. For he went out of his house unarmed, and fled when he faw them fight, being more circumspect not to do hurt, then not to suffer any. Therefore they are not to be thought cowards for their flying, but rather men fearfull to offend any man. For they were driven either to yield to them that followed them, or elfe it they frayed, to fraud to their defence, because they might keep themselves from hurt. And where they accuse Tiberius for the faults he committed, the greatest that ever he did, was when he deposed Ottavisus his colleague from the Tribuneship, and that he himself made suit for the second. And as for Caise, they fallly accused him for the death of Anylliss the Sergeant, who indeed was slain unknown to him, and to his great grief. Where Cleomenes on the other fide, though we should forget the murther he committed upon the Ephores, yet he fet flaves at liberty, and ruled the Kingdom in manner himfelf alone: but yet for manners fake onely he joined his own brother with him, which was of the felf fame house. And when he had perswaded Archidamu (who was next heir to the Kingdom of the other royal house) to be bold to return home from Messina unto Sparta, he suffered him to be flain; and because he did not revenge his death, he did confirm their opinion that thought he was consenting to his death. Lycurgus on the other side, whose example he did counterfeit to follow, because he did willingly refigne the Kingdom unto his brothers son Charilam, and being afraid alfo, that if the young child should chance to miscarry, they would suspect him for his death, he exiled himfelf out of his own Countrey a long time, travelling up and down, and returned not to SPART A again, before Charilam had gotten a fon to succeed him in his Kingdom. But we cannot fet another GRECIAN by Lycurgus comparable unto him. We have declared also that amongst Chemenes deeds, there were many other greater alterations then these, and also many other breaches of the law. So they that do condemn the manners of the one and the other, fay, that the two GRE-CIANS from the beginning had an afpiring mind to be tyrants, still practifing Wars: whereas the two Romans onely, even by their most mortal enemies, could be blamed for nothing else, but for an extream ambition; and did confess that they were too earnest and vehement above their nature, in any strife or contention they had with their adversaries, and that they yielded unto their choler and pattion, as unto ill winds, which brought them to do those things they did in the end. DEMOSTHEN ES.

For what more just and honest intent could they have had, then the first was? had not the rich men (even through floutness and authority to overthrow the laws) brought them against their wills into quarrel : the one to fave his life, the other to revenge his brothers death, who was flain without order, justice, or the authority of any Officer? Thus thou mayeft thy felf fee the difference that was betwirt the GRECIANS and the ROMANS: and now to tell you plainly my opinion of both, I think that Tiberius was the stoutest of the four; and that the young King Agis offended least; and for boldnels and courage, Caius came nothing near unto Cleomenes.

THE LIFE OF DEMOSTHENES.

Ant . Christ. 350.

E that made the little Book of the praise of Alcibiades, touching the victory he True happiness wan at the horfe-race of the Olympian games (were it the Poet Euripides, as confiftethin fome think, or any other) my friend Soffins, faid: that to make a man happy, the mind and the must of necessity be born in some famous City. But to tell you what I think manners of hereof, doubtless, true happiness chiefly consistent in the vertue and qualities of place or Comthe mind, being a matter of no moment, whether a man be born in a pelting vil- try. lage, or in a famous City: no more then it is to be born of a fair or foul mother. For it were a madness to think that the little village of Julide, being the least part of the Isle of CEO (the whole Island of it felf being but a small thing) and that the Isle of EGINA (which is of so small a length, that a certain ATHENIAN on a time made a motion it might be taken away, because it was but a straw in the fight of the haven of Piran) could bring forth famous Poets, and excellent Comedians : and not breed an honeft, just, and wife man, and of a noble courage. For, as we have reason to think that Arts and Sciences which were first devised and invented to make some things necessary for mens use, or otherwise to win fame and credit, are drowned, and cast away in little poor villages: fo are we to judge alfo, that vertue, like a strong and fruitful plant, can take root, and bring forth in every place, where it is graffed in a good nature, and gentle person, that can patiently away with pains. And therefore if we chance to offend, and live not as we should, we cannot accuse the meannels of our Country where we were born, but we must justly accuse our selves. Surely he that hath taken upon our Country water we were born, but we must justly accuse our serves. Surely he that name taken upon this mot put forth any work, or to write any history, in the which he is to thrust many thrange things un-an Hittlion-known to his Country, and which are not ready at his hand to be had, but differed abroad in divers pls- grapher to be had, but differed abroad in divers pls- grapher to be had, but differed abroad in divers pls- grapher to be had, but differed abroad in divers pls- grapher to be had. ces, and to be gathered out of divers books and authorities: first of all, he must needs remain in some a famous City.

great and famous City throughly inhabited, where mendo delight in good and vertuous things, becaule there are commonly plenty of all forts of books: and that perufing them, and hearing talk alfo of many things belides, which other Hittoriographers peradventure have not written of, and which will carry to much more credit, because men that are alive may prefently speak of them as of their own knowledge : whereby he may make his work perfect in every point, having many and divers necessary things contained in it. But I my felf that dwell in a poor little Town, and yet do remain there willingly left it should become lefs, whilst I was in ITALY, and at ROME, I had no leifure to study and ex-ercise the Latine tongue, as well for the great business I had then to do, as also to fatisfie them that came to learn Philosophy of me : fo that even formewhat too late and now in my latter time, I began to take Latine books in hand. And thereby (a strange thing to tell you, but yet true) I learned no nor underflood matters fo much by the words, as I came to understand the words, by common experience and knowledge I had in things. But surthermore, to know how to pronounce the Latine tongue well, or to fpeak it readily, or to understand the figures, translations, and fine joining of the simple words one with another, which do beautifie and fer forth the tongue, furely I judge it to be a marvellous pleasant and sweet thing; but withall it require that long and laboursom study, meet for those that have better leisure then I have, and that have young years on their backs to follow such pleasure. Therefore in this prefent book, which is the fifth of this work, where I have taken upon me to compare the Lives of Noblemen one with another : undertaking to write the Lives of Demostbenes and Cisero, we will confider and examine their nature, manners and conditions, by their acts and deeds in the Government of the Commonwealth, not meaning otherwise to conser their works and writings of eloquence, neither to define which of them two were sharper or sweeter in his Oration. For as the Poet John saith:

> In this behalf a man may rightly say, The Dolphines in their proper foil do play.

The which Cacilius little understanding, being a man very rash in all his doings, hath unadvisedly writempired with ten and fet forth in Print, a Comparison of Demofibene, eloquence with (Icero's, But if it were an easie matter for every man to know himself, then the gods indeed have given us no commandment, neither could men have faid that it came from heaven. But for my opinion methinks Fortune even from the beginning hath framed, in manner, of one felf mold Demosthenes and Cicero, and hath in their natures fashioned many of their qualities one like to the other: as both of them to be ambitious, both of them to love the liberty of their Country, and both of them very fearfull in any danger of Wars. And likewise their fortunes seem to me, to be both much alike. For it is hard to find two Orators again, that being fo meanly born as they, have come to be of fo great power and authority as they two: nor that have deferved theill will of Kings and Noblemen fo much as they have done, nor that have loft their daughters, nor that have been banifhed their Countries, and that have been restored again with honour, and that again have fled, and have been taken again, nor that have ended their lives with the liberty of their Countrey. So that it is hard to be judged, whether Nature have made them liker in manners, or Fortune in their doings: as if they had both like cunning workmafters frived one with the other, to whom they should make them best resemble. But first of all we must write of the elder of them two. Demosthenes the father of this Orator Demosthenes, was (as Theopompus writeth) one of the chief The parenage men of the City, and they called him Macheropaut, to wit, a maker of fword blades, because he of Demofiberer had a great shop where he kept a number of slaves to forge them. But touching Affeinnes the Orators report of his mother, who faid that the was the daughter of one Gelon (that fled from ATHENS being accused of treason) and of a barbarous woman that was her mother, I am not able to say whether it be true, or devited of malice to do him despite. Howsoever it was, it is true that his father The parrimony died, leaving him but feven years old, and left him reasonable well: for his goods came to little lefs of Demofibenes then the value of fitteen talents. Howbeit his Guardians did him great wrong, for they ftole 2 great the liberal fciences which are usually taught unto honest mens sons: and to surther that want also, the was but weakling and very tender, and therefore his mother would not much let him go to School, neither also durft his mafters keep him too hard to it, because he was but a fickly child at the first, and very weak. And it is reported also, that the firname of Battalus was given him in mockery by other fchool boys his companions, because of his weakness of body. This Battalus (as divers men do why he was report) was an effemenate player on the flute, against whom the Poet Antiphanes to mock him, devifed a little play. Others do also write of one Batraliu, a diffolute Orator, and that wrote salcious verses: and it seemeth the Athenians at that time did call a certain part of mans body uncomely to be named, Battalus. Now for Argas (which firname men say was also given him) why innamed he was so called, either for his rude and beastly manners (because some Poets do call a snake Argai) or elfe for his manner of speech, which was very unpleasant to the ear; for Argue is the name of a Poet that made always bawdy and ill-favoured fongs. But hereof enough, as Plato faid. Further-callifratur the more, the occasion (as it is reported) that moved him to give himself to eloquence, was this, Callifirstu the Orator was to defend the cause of one Oropus before the Judges, and every man longed greatly for this day of pleading, both for the excellency of the Orator, that then bare the bell for eloquence: as for the matter, and his accusation, which was manifestly known to all. Demosthenes hearing his Shoolmasters agree together to go to the hearing of this matter, he prayed his School-part of his goods themselves, and did let the rest run to nought, as having little care of it, for they would not pay his School-masters their wages. And this was the cause that he did not learn matters agree rogether to the hearing of this matter, he prayed his School-matter to be so good asto let him go with him. His matter grantes him, and being, acquisited with the keepers of the Hall door where this matter was to be pleaded, the forestreated them, that they placed their scholar in a very good place, where being at his case, the might both hear and see all that was done, and no man could fee him. Thereupon when Demofthones had heard the case pleaded, he was greatly in love The earnest demean count we man Antercompt had gotten; when he faw how he was waited upon home with fuch fire of Densiftent to learn a train of people after him; but yet he wondered more at the force of his great eloquence, that could fo turn and convey all things at his pleasure. Thereupon be left the fludy of all other fciences and all other exercises of wir and body, which other children are brought up in and began to labour continually, and to frame himself to make Orazions, with intent one day to be an Orator among the reft. His mafter that taught him Rhetorick was Ifam, notwithflanding that Iforrates also keep a sichool of Rhesorick at this time: either bedanle that being an Orphan he was not able to pay the Ifans Demof waves that Herrates demanded of his Scholars, which was ten Mina's: or rather for that he found thener School-Has mainer of speech more proper for the use of the eloquence he defired, because it was more master of Rhefine and fubrile. " Yet Hermspres writeth notwithstanding, that he had read certain books having no name of any author, which declared that Demostheres had been Plate's Scholar, and that by hearing of him, he learned to frame his pronunciation and eloquence. And he writeth also of one Crefibion, who reported that Demostheres had becreely read Horrates works of Rhetorick, and also Akcidamus books, by means of one Callian STRACUSAN, and others. Wherefore when he Demoftbenes came out of his wardhip, he began to put his Guardians in fuit, and to write Orations and Pleas first practite in against them; who in contrary manner did ever tile delays and excuses, to fave themselves for giving drawing and any account unto him, of goods and patrianony left him. And thus following this exercise (as penning of O-Thucwooder writeth) it profesered so well with him, that in the end he obtained ir, but not without great pains and danger: and yet with all that he could do, he could not recover all that his father left him, by a good deal. So having now gotten some boldness, and being also used to speak in open presence, and withall, having a feeling and delight of the estimation that is won by eloquence in pleading, afterwards he attempted to put forward himself, and to practife in matters of state. For. sethere goeth a tale of one Luamedon an ORCHOMENIAN, who having a grievous pain in the Aremedy for folecu, by advice of the Phylicians was willed to run long couries to belp him: and that follow- the principle ing their order, he became in the end to lufty and minble of body, that afterwards be would needs folecu. make one run for games, and indeed grew to be the swiftest runner of all men in his time. Even to the like chanced unto Demosthenes. For at the first, beginning to practise Oratory for recovery of his goods, and thereby having gotten good skill and knowledg how to plead, he afterwards took upon him to fpeak to the people in affemblies touching the Government of the Commonwealth; e-wen as he should have contended for some game or prize; and at the length did excell all the Oranors at that time that go up into the Pulpit for Orations : notwithstanding that, when he first ventured to Demostheres speak openly, the people made such la moile, that he could scane be heard; and besides they more mocked of the hed him for his manner of speech that was so ftrange, because he used so many long confused periods; people for his and his matter he frake was fo intricate with argument one upon another, that they were tedious, and that made them weary to hear him. And furthermore, he had a very fost voice, an impediment in his tongue, and had also a short breath, the which made that men could not well understand what of nature. he meant; for his long periods in his Oration were oftentimes interrupted, before he was at the end of his fentence. So at length perceiving he was thus rejected, he gave over to speak any more before the people, and half in despair withdrew himself into the haven of Piras. There Euroman the THESSALLIAN being a very old man, found him, and tharply reproved him, and told him, that he did himfelf great wrong, confidering, that having a manner of speech much like unto Pericles, he drowned himself by his faint heart; because he did not seek the way to be bold against the noise of the common people, and to arm his body to away with the pains and burthen of publick Orations, but suffering it to grow feebler for lack of use and practife. Furthermore, being once again sepulfed and whistled at, as he returned home hanging down his head for shame, and utterly discouraged, Sarprus an excellent player of Comedies being his familiar friend, followed him, and went so speak with him. Demostheres made his complaint unto him, that where he had taken more pains then all the Orators befides, and had almost even worn himself to the bones with study, yet he could by no means devife to please the people: whereas other Orators that did nothing but bib all the day long, and Mariners that understood nothing, were quietly heard, and continually occupied the Pulpit with Orations: and on the other fide that they made no account of him. Satyrus then anfwered him, Thou fayest true Demostbenes, but care not for this, I will help it straight, and take away the cause of all this, so thou wilt but tell me without book certain verses of Eurivides. or of Sophesles, thereupon Demosthenes prefently rehearled some unto him, that came into his mind. Sasysus repensing them after him, gave them quite another grace, with fuch a pronunciation, comely gesture, and modest countenance becoming the veries, that Demosthenes thought them clean changed. Whereby perceiving how much the action (to wir, the comely manner and gefture in his Oration) do give grace and comelines in his pleading, he then thought it but a triffle, and almost nothing to speak of, to exercise to plead well, unless therewithall he did also study to have a good pronunciation and gefure. Thereupon he built him a Cellar under the ground, the which was whole even in Demofibenes DEMOSTHE NESS or three moneths one after another, and did shave his head of purpose, because he durst, not go abfoad in that fort, although his will; was good. And were he took his Theam and matter to declaim upon, and to practice to plead, of the matters he had in hand before, or else upon occasion of such talk as he had with them that came to fee him, while he kept his boule. For they were no fooner gone from him, but he went down into his Cellar, and repeated from the first to the last all matters that had passed between him and his friends in talk together, and alledged also both his own and their answers. And if peradventure he had been at the hearing of any long matter, he would repeat it by himself: and would finely couch and convey it into proper fonences, and thus change and after every way any matter that he had heard or salked with others. Thereof came the opinion menthad of him, that he had no very quick capacity by nature, and that his eloquence was not natural labut, artificially gotten with extream labour. And for proof hereof, they made this probable reason, that they never law Demosthenes make any Oration on the sudden, and that oftentimes when he was feb in the affemfeldom pleased bly, the people would call him by his name, to fay his opinion touching the matter of counfel then in

hand : howbeit that he never rofe upon their call, unless he had first studied the matter well he would fpeak of. So that all the other Orators would many times give him a taunt for it : as # hid among other, that taurting him on a time, told him, his realons fmelled of this lamp. Yea, replied Demof. theres sharply again: so is there difference Pythias betwitt thy labour and mine by lampilight. And himfelf also speaking to others, did not altogether deny it, but told them plainly, that he did not always write at length all that he would speak, neither did he also offer to speak, before he had made Demostherer in briefs of that he would speak. He faid surthermore, that it was a token the man loved the people well, that would be carefull before what he would fay to them. For this preparative (quoth be) doth thew that he doth honour and reverence them. In contrary manner also, he that passeth not how the people take his words, it is a plain token that he despiteth their authority, and that he lacketh no good will (if he could) to use force against them rather then reason and perswasion. But yet further to enlarge the proofs, that Demosthenes had no heart to make an Oration on the sudden, they do alledge this reafon : That Demades many times role up on the fudden to maintain Demagibenes reasons, when the people otherwhile did reject him : and that Demosthenes on the other fide, did never rife to make Demades words good, which he had spoken in his behalf. But now might a man ask again ; If Demosfibenes was fo timerous to fpeak before the people upon the fudden, what meant Afchines then to fay, that he was marvellous bold in his words? and howkhanceth it, that he rifing upon the fudden, did prefentfyanswer the Orator Python BIZANTINE in the field, that wasvery lufty in speech (and rough like a vehement running stream) against the ATHENIANS, and how shanced it that Lamachus MYRRA-ENIAN, having made an Oration in the praise of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon, in the which he spake all the ill he could of the THEBANS, and of the OLYNTHIANS: and when he had read and pronounced it in the open affembly of the Olympian games, Demosfibenes upon the instant rifing upon his feet, declared, as if he had read fome Hiltory, and pointed as it were with his finger up-to all the whole affembly, the notable great fervice and worshy deeds the which the CHALCIDIANS had done in former times, for the benefit and hongur of GREECE? And in contrary manner allo, what milchief and inconvenience came by means of the flatterers that altogether gave themselves to curay favour with the MacEDONIANS & With thefe and fuch like perfwalions, Demoffhenes made fuch ftir amongst the people, that the Orator Lamachus being afraid of the sudden uproar, did secretly Demosthenes convey himself out of the assembly . But yet to tell you what I think . Demosthenes in my opinion to terrified Land- fhioning himself even from the beginning, to follow Pericles steps and examples, he thought that for down his Oo other qualities he had, they were not fo requifite for him; and that he would counterfeir his gravity and fober countenance, and to be wife, and to speak over lightly to every matter at all adventures: judging, that by that manner of wildom he came to be great, And like as he would, not: .lip any good occasion to speak, where it might be for his credit: fo would he not likewife over-izashly hazard his credit and reputation to the mercy of fortune. And to prove this true, the Orations which he made upon the fudden without premeditation before, do shew more boldness and courage then those which he had written and studied long before, if we may believe the reports of Eratosibentes, Demetrius Pha-LERIAN, and of the other Comical Poets. For Eransthenes faid, that he would be often carried away with choler and fury. Demetrius allo faith, that speaking one day to the people, ite sware a great Oath in Rhime, as if he had been possessed with some divine spirit, and said:

By sea and by land, by Rivers, Springs and Ponds.

There are also certain Comical Poets that do call him Ropoperperetha, as who would say, a great babler that speaketh all things that cometh to his tongues end. Another mocked him for too much affecting a figure of Rhetorick called Antitheton : which is, opposition, with faying, Sie recept fi-Est cepit, which fignifieth, he took it as he found it. In the use of this figure Demosshenes much pleafed himfelf, unless the Poet Antiphanes Speaketh it of pleasure, deriding the counsel he gave the people, not to take the Ille of HALONESUS of King Philip, as of gift, but to receive it as their own reftored. And yet every body did grant, that Demades of his own natural wit, without art, was invincible : and that many times speaking upon the sudden, he did utterly overthrow Demosthenes long ftudied realons. And erifte of the Iste of Cuio, hath written Theophrasius judgement of the Orators of that time. Who being asked what manner of Orator he thought Demoßhenes: he answered, worthy of this City. Then again, how he thought of Demades: above this City, faid he. The fame Philosopher writeth also, that Polycethus SPHETTIAN (one of those that practifed at that time in the Common-wealth) gave this fentence : that Demossiblenes indeed was a great Oratour, but Phocions tongue had a sharper understanding, because in few words he comprehended much matter. And to this purpose, they say that Demosthenes himself said also, that as oft as he faw Photion get up into the Pulpit for Orations to fpeak against him, he was wont to fay to his friends : See, the ax of my words rifeth. And yet it is hard to judge, whether he spake that in respect Photoion called of his tongue, or rather for the estimation he had gotten, because of his great wildom; thinking (as the ax of Deof instrongue, or rainer for the extension is based on the lead, of the head, of fuch a man millener Oraindeed it is true) that one word onely, the twinkling of an eye, or a nod of the head, of fuch a man millener Oraitions, (that through his worthines had attained that credit) had more force to persuade then all the fine reasons and devices of Rhetorick. But now for his bodily defects of nature, Demetrius PHALERI-AN writeth, that he heard Demosthenes himself say, being very old, that he did help them by these by industry remeans. First, touching the stammering of his tongue, which was very fat, and made him that he formeth his could not pronounce all fyllables diffinctly, he did help it by putting of little pibble ftones into his defects of namouth, which he found upon the fands by the Rivers fide, and so pronounced with open mouth the ture. Orations he had without Book. And for his small and fost voice, he made that louder, by running up steep and high hills, uttering even with full breath some Orations or Verses that he had without Book. And further it is reported of him, that he had a great Looking-glass in his house, and ever flanding on his feet before it, he would learn and exercise himself to pronounce his Orations. For proof hereof it is reported, that there came a man unto him on a time, and prayed his help to defend his cause, and told him that one had beaten him: and that Demosthenes faid again unto him. I do not believe this is true thou tellest me, for surely the other did never beat thee. The Plaintiff then thrusting out his voice aloud, said : What, hath he not beaten me? Yes indeed, quoth Demofibenes then: I believe it now, for I hear the voice of a man that was beaten indeed. Thus he thought that the found of the voice, the pronunciation or gesture in one fort or other, were things of force to credit or discredit that a man faith. His countenance when he pleaded before the People, did mar- Demosshenes vellously please the common fort: but the Noblemen and men of understanding, found it too base countenance venously preactine common balerian faid, amongst others. And Hermippus writeth, that one called missilised of After being asked of the ancient Oratours, and of those of his time, answered that every man that the Nobility. had feen them, would have wondred, with what honour, reverence and modefly, they spake unto the People; howbeit that Demosthenes Orations (whosoever read them) were too artificiall and vehement. And therefore we may eafily judge, that the Oragions Demosthenes wrote are very severe the much in the solution of th copper) stepping forth to say somewhat of Demosthenes late sitting up a nights, and that he wrote and studied the most part of the night by Lamp-light : Indeed, quoth Demosthemes, I know it grieves thee to fee my Lamp burn all night : and therefore my Lords of ATHENS, methinks you should not wonder to fee fuch robberies in your City , confidering we have thieves of copper , and the walls and fharp. This notwithstanding, otherwiseshe would give many pleasant and witty answersupon Demossheres the fudden. As when Demades one day faid unto him , Demosthenes will teach me : after the common witty answers of our houses be but of clay. We could tell you of divers others of his like pleasant and witty anfwers , but these may suffice for this present : and therefore we will proceed to consider further of his The time of nature and conditions, by his acts and deeds in the affairs of the Common-wealth. Now Domofthe. Demofthenes nes first beginning when he came to deal in the affairs of the State, was in the time of the War coming to prames first beginning when ne came to use in the analy of the order, was in the time of the was first beginning when ne came to use in the almade with the PHOCIONS, and himself reporteth: and as appeareth further in his Orations which fairs of the he made against Philip: of the which, the last were made after the War was ended, and the first Saste. do touch also some particular doings of the same. He made the Oration against Midias, when he Displeasure was but thirty two years old and was of small countenance and reputation in the Common-wealth; betwin De was but thirty two years out, and was of mian connectiance and the want whereof was the chiefest cause (as I think) that induced him to take money for the injury masses, and the want whereof was the chiefest cause (as I think) that induced him to take money for the injury masses.

he had done him, and to let his action fall against him: He was not of a mild and gentle mind . But fierce and hafty to revenge by kind.

But knowing that it was no small enterprise, nor that could take effect by a man of so small Power and Authority as himself, to overthrow a man fo wealthy, fo befriended, and so eloquent as Midias, he therefore yeelded himself unto those that did speak and intreat for him. Neither do I think that the three thousand Drachma's which he received, could have bridled the bitterness of his nature, if otherwise he had seen any hope or likelihood that he could have prevailed against him. Now at Demosthenes his first coming unto the Common-wealth, taking a noble matter in hand, to speak against Philip, an enemy to for the defence and maintenance of the Laws and Liberties of the GRECIANS, he behaved himself the Macedofo worthily, that in short space he wan him marvellous same for his great eloquence and plain man-niant ner of speech. Thereby he was marvellously honoured also through all GREECE, and greatly esteemmed with the King of PERSIA: and Philiphimfelf made more account of him then of all the Oratours in ATHENS; and his greatest foes which were most against him, were driven to confess, that they had to do with a famous man. For in the Orations which Aschines and Hyperides made to accule him, they write thus of him. And therefore I marvell what Theopompus meant, when he wrote cy of Demofiles that Demostheres had a fubtill unconstant mind, and could not long continue with one kind of men, ner against nor in one mind for matters of State. But in contrary manner, in my judgement he continued con- Theopempus ftant still to theend, in one self-manner and order, unto the which he had betaken himself at the beginning : and that not onely he never changed all his life time, but to the contrary, he loft his life, because he would be no changeling. For he did not like Demades, who to excuse himself for that he bad oft turned coat in matters of Government, faid that he went oftentimes against his own fayings, as matters fell out: but never against the benefit of the Common-wealth. And Melampu allo, who was ever against Callifram, having his mouth many times ftopped with Money, he would up to the Pulpit for Orations, and tell the People, that indeed Calliftrains, which maintaineth the contrary opinion against me, is my enemy, and yet I yeeld unto him for this time: for the benefit of the Common-wealth must carry it. And another allo, Aicodomse Messenian, who being first of Caffanders fide, took part afterwards with Demerriss, and then faid, that he did not fpeak against himself, but that it was meet he should obey his superiours. They cannot detect Demossiblenes with the like, that he did ever halt or yeeld either in word or deed. For he ever continued firm and conftant in one mind in his Oration. Infomuch that Panatins the Philosopher faith, that the most pare of all his Orations are grounded upon this Maxime and Principle: that for it felf, nothing is to be taken or accepted, but that which is honest. As, the Oration of the Crown, the which he made against Ariflorates: that also which he made for the Franches and Freedom: and in fine, all his Orations against Philip of MACEDON; in all those he doth not perswade his Countreymen to take Demafibence a that which is most pleasant; easiest, or most profitable: but he proveth that oftentimes honesty is to Demoplemer 2 and some facety or health. So that had he in all his Orations and doings joyned to his ho-timorous man, be preferred above facety or health. So that had he in all his Orations and doings joyned to his honefty, courtefie, and frank speech, valiantness in Wars, and clean hands from bribery, he might defervedly have been compared, not with Mirecles, Polyentius, Hyperides and other Orators: but even with the higheft, with Cimon, Timeidides, and Pericles. For Pho.ion, who took the worst way in government of the Common-wealth, because he was suspected that he took part with the MACEDONIANS: yet for valianmels, wildom and justice, he wasever thought as honest a man as Ephialtes and Ariftides. But Demifibenes on the other fide (as Demetrine faith) was no man to truft to for Wars, neither had be any power to refule gifts and bribes. For though he would never be corrupted by Philip King of MACEDON, yet he was bribed with Gold and Silver that was brought from the Cities of Susa and ECBATANA; and was very ready to praise and commend the deeds of their Ancestors, but not to follow them. Truly, yet was he the honestest man of all other Orators in histime, excepting Phocion. And besides, he did ever speak more boldly and plainly unto the People then any man elfe, and would openly contrary their minds, and sharply reprove the A-THENIANS for their faults, as appeareth by his Orations. Theopompus also writeth, that the People on a time would have had him to actute a man, whom they would needs have condemned. But he refuffing to do it, the People were offended, and did mutiny against him. Thereupon he rifing up, faid openly unto them: My Lords ATHENIANS, I will always counsell you to that which I think beft for the benefit of the Common-wealth, although it be against your minds : but fallily to accuse one to fatisfie your minds, though you command me, I will not do it. Furthermore, that which he did against Ansiphon, sheweth plainty, that he was no People pleaser, and that he did lean more the Authority of the Senate. For when Antiphon was quit by the People in the Affembly of the City, Demofhence notwithstanding took him, and called him again into the Court of the Areopagies, and did not pass for the Peoples ill will; but there convinced him for promising Philip of MACEDON to burn the Arferrall of ATHENS: lieby fentence of that Court he was condemned, and fuffered for it. He did also accuse the Nun Theorides for many lewed parts committed, and a mongft others, for that the taught Slaves to deceive their Mafters : and fo following the matters against her, the was condemned to death, and executed. It is thought also, that he made the Oration Apollodorus spake against the Pretor Timotheus, and proved thereby that he was a debtor to the Commonwealth, and to a naughty man; and that he wrote those Orations, also intituled to Forms o and Stephanus, for the which he was justly reproved. For Formio pleaded against Apollodorus with the Oration which Demoffbener felt had made for him , which was even alike, as if out of one felf Cutlers Shop he had fold his Enemies Swords one to kill another: and for his known Orations, those which he made against Androcion, Timocrates and Ariffreentes, he caused them to give them unto others, when he had not yet dealt in matters of State. For indeed when he did put them forth, he was not passing seven or eight and twenty years old. The Oration which he had made against Arifogiton, and the other alto of liberty, against Ctefppus the Son of Chabrian, he space them, as he said himfelf (or as others write) openly unto the People, because he intended to marry Chabress Mother : howbeit heldid not; bur married a Santan monumpus DemetraniMa Gnestan, writethinhis Book be made, intituted Symonyma. But that he werdte againft Efebines, where he neceifeth him that he dealt fallly, when he was Ambaffadour, it is not known whether it was recited or not, although Idiomeneus writeth; that there lacked but thirry voices onely to have quit . Si, chines. But, in this methinks he spake not truly , and doth but conjecture it by that one and the other have faid in their Orations against the Crown, in the which neither the one nor the other do say, precisely, that this acculation proceeded to judgement. But let other that lift decide this doubt, 1 Now before the War began, it was evident enough, to which part Demosthous would incline in the Common-wealth: For, he would never leave to reprove and withfland Philips doings. Therefore he being more spoken of in Philips Court, then any man elfe, he was fent unto him the tenth person with nine others in Ambasfage. Philip gave them all audience one after another : howbeit he was more carefull and circumspect doing sgainst to answer Demostherer Oration then all the rest. Burotherwise our of that place, he did not Demofiliants fo much honour, nor gave him to good entertainment, as to his other companions for

Philip shewed more kindness, and gave better countenance unto Afchines and Philocrates then unto Wherefore when they did highly praise Philip; and said that he was a well-spoken Prince. a fair man, and would drink freely, and be pleafant in company, Demofthenes smiled at it, and turned all things to the worst, faying, that those qualities were nothing commendable nor meet for a King. For the first was a quality meet for a Pleader, the second for a Woman, and the third for a Sponge, In fine, Wars falling out between them, because Philip of the one fide could not live in peace, and the ATHENIA NS on the other fide were still incensed and stirred up by Dem Sthenes daily Orations. the ATHENIANS first fent into the Isle of EUBOEA (the which by means of certain private Tvrants that had taken the Towns, became subject again unto Philip) tollowing a Decree Demosthenes had preferred, and so went to expulse the MACEDONIANS again. After that also he caused them to fend aid unto the BYZANTINES, and to the PERINTHIANS, with whom Philip made War. For he so perswaded the ATHENIANS, that he made them forget the malice they did bear unto those two Nations, and the fault which either of both the Cities had committed against them in the Wars, touching the rebellion of their Confederates: and he caused them to send them aid, which kept them from Philips force and power. Furthermore, going afterwards unto all the great Cities of GREECE as Ambassadour, he did so solicite and perswade them, that he brought them all in a persoliberees manner to be against Philip. So that the Army which their Tribe should find at their common charge, stirrethub was fifteen thousand Footmen, all strangers, and two thousand Horsemen, besides the Citizens of Greece against every City which should also serve in the Wars at their charge; and the Money also leavied for the the Macedonimaintenance of this War, was very willingly disburfed. T.copbraftus writeth, that it was at that ant. time their Confederates did pray that they would fet down a certain fum of Money, what every City should pay: and that Grobylus an Oratour should make answer, that the War had no certain maintenance: inferring that the charges of War was infinite. Now all GREECE being in Arms, attending what should happen, and all these People and (ities being united in one League together, as the Euboeians, the Athenians, the Corinthians, the Megarians, the Leu-CADIANS , and those of CORFU: the greatest matter Demosthenes had to do , was to perswade the THEBANS also to enter into this League, because their Countrey confined and bordered with AT-TICA; befides, their force and power was of great importance, for that they carried the fame of all GREECE at that time, for the valiantest Souldiers. But it was no trifling matter to win the THEBANS, and to make them break with Philip, who but lately before had bound them unto him by many great pleasures which he had done to them in the War of the PHOCIANS : besides also that betwirt ATHENS and THEBES, by reason of vicinity, there fell out daily quarrels and debates, the which with every little thing were foon renewed. This notwithstanding, Philip being proud of the Victory he had won by the City of AMPHISSE, when he came and invaded the Countrey of E. LATIA, and was entred into PHOCIDE, the ATHENIANS were then fo amazed with it, that no man durft occupie the Pulpit for Orations, neither could they tell what way to take. Thus the whole

Affembly standing in a doubt with great silence, Demosthenes onely stept up, and did again give them

counsell to feek to make league and alliance with the THEBANS: and so did further encourage the People, and put them in good hope, as he was always wont to do. Then with others he was fent

Ambaffadour unto THEBES; and Philip also for his part, fent Ambaffadours unto the THEBANS, Amyntas and Clearchus, two Gentlemen MACEDONIANS, and with them Daschus, The falus, and Thracydem , to answer and withstand the perswasions of the ATHENIANS Ambassadours.

Thereupon the THEBANS began to advise themselves for the best, and laid before their eyes the EOTIA belides. And the Assemblies also of the Councill of THERES were as well governed by him as the Affemblies of ATHENS, being alike beloved both of the one and the other, and having milerable fruits and calamities of War, their wounds being yet green and uncured, which they got by the War of PHOCIDE. Notwithstanding, the great force of Demostheres eloquence (as Theo-force of elopompus writeth) did so inflame the The BAN's courage with desire of honour, that it trod under their quence joyned feet all manner of considerations, and did so ravish them with the love and desire of honesty, that the Thebans they cast at their heels all fear of danger, all remembrance of pleasures received, and all reason per- with the Ather fwading to the contrary. This act of an Oratour was of fo great force, that Philip forthwith fent them from Ambassadours unto the GRECIANS, to intreat for peace, and all GREECE was up to see what philip King of would become of this ftir. Thus, not onely the Captains of ATHENS obeyed Demosthenes, doing Macedon. all that he commanded them, but the Governours also of THEBES, and of all the Countrey of Boa like Authority to command both , and not undefervedly , as Theopompus faith , but by just defert. But some fatall deftiny, and the revolution of times had determined the finall end of the liberty of The over-But tome tatall deftiny, and the revolution of times had determined the liberty of the of the Greeker also many celestial throw of the Greeker forefigns that did foreshew and prognosticate what end should ensue thereof. And amongst others, A- shewed at Chepollo's Nun gave these dreadfull Oracles: and this old Prophecy of the SYBILS was commonly rones by igns fung in every bodies mouth: What time the blondy battell shall be fought at Thermodon, God grant I may be far away; or elfe (to look thereon) Have Eagles wings to four above, among the clouds on hie :

The River of For therethe vanquist side shall weep, and Conquerour shall die, Men do report that this Thermodon is a little River of the Countrey of CHERONEA, which fal- or Hamon, in leth into the River of Cephifus: howbeit at this present timethere is never a River nor Brook in all the Countrey our Countrey, that I know, called Thermodon. And I think, that that River which we call now of Chareness Hamon.

Hamon, was in old time Thermodon: for it runneth by the Temple of Hercules, where the Gre-CIANS lay in Camp. And it may be , that because it was filled with dead bodies , and that it ran bloud at the day of the Battell, it changed her name, and was firnamed Hæmon, because Hæma in the Greek Tongue, fignifieth bloud. Yet Duris writeth notwithstanding, that this Thermodon was no River, but that certain men fetting up their Tent, and trenching it about, found a little Image of stone, whereupon were engraven these Letters: whereby it appeareth that it was a man called Thermodon, who carried an AMA 20 N hurt in his arms; and that for this Image of Thermodon, they do fing such another old Oracle as this:

vice upon his

Te Erns and Ravens turry till the field of Thermodon:

There will be store of carkases of men to feed upon.

This notwithstanding, it is very hard to tell the troth of these things. But Demosshenes trusting to the valiantness and power of the GRECIANS, and being marvellously incouraged to see such a great number of valiant and refolute men, fo willing to fight with the Enemy, he bade them be of good courage, and not to buz about fuch Oracles, and to give ear to fuch Prophecies. And furthermore he told them plainly, that he did miftruft the Nun Pythes did lean unto Philip, as favouring him, and did put the THEBANS in mind of their Captain Epaminondas, and the ATHENIANS of Pericles; and perfwaded them, that those two famous men were always of opinion, that such Prophecies were no other but a fine cloak for cowards, and that taking no heed to them, they did dispatch their matters according to their own discretion. Untill this present time, Demostheres shewed himself always an honest man. But when it came to the Battell, he fled like a coward, and did no valiant act any thing answerable to the Orations whereby he had perswaded the People. For he left his rank, and cowardly flieth from the cast away his Weapons to run the lighter, and was not ashamed at all (as Pythim said) of the words written upon his Shield in golden Letters, which were , Good Fortune. Now Philip having won the Bauell, he was at that present so joyfull, that he fell to commit many a fond part. For after he had drunk well with his friends, he went into the place where the Overthrow was given, and there in mockery began to fing the beginning of the Decree which Demosphenes had preferred (by the which the ATHENIANS accordingly proclaimed Wars against him) rising and falling with his voice, and dancing it in measure with his foot:

Demosthenes the Son of Demosthenes Paanian did put forth this.

But afterwards beginning to wax fober, and leaving his drunkenness, when he had remembred of himself what danger he had been in , then his hair stood bolt upright upon his head , considering the force and power of fuch an Oratour, that in a piece of a day had enforced him to hazard his Realm and life at a Battell. Now Demosthener same was so great, that it was carried even to the great King of Demoplered in Persia's Court, who wrote unto his Lieutenants and Governours, that they should feed Dimeter with all the states of the states o corrupted with money and should procure to entertain him above all the men in GREECE, as he that could best withdraw Philip, and trouble him with the Wars and tumults of GREECE. And this was afterwards proved by Letters found of Demosthenes himself, the which came to King Alexan-King of Perder, hands in the City of SARDIS; and by other Writings also of the Governours and Lieutenans of the King of Persia, in the which were named directly, the express tums of Money which had been fent and given unto him. Now the GRECIANS being thus overthrown by Battell, the other Orators, adverfaries unto Demossibenes in the Common-wealth, began to fet upon him, and to Prepare to accuse him. But the People did not onely clear him of all the accusations objected against him , but did continue to honour him more then before, and to call him to Affemblies, as one that loved the honour and benefit of his Countrey, 'So that when the bones of their Countreymen which were flain at the Battell of CHERONEA, were brought to be openly buried according to the cuftom, the People gave him the honour to make the Fonerall Oration in praise of the dead, and made no thew of forrow or grief for the lofs they had received (as Theopompus witneffeth, and doth nobly declare) but rather in contrary manner thewed that they did not repent them in following of his counfell, but did honour him that gaveit. Demofiberes then did make the Funerall Oration, But afof Charenca. terwards in all the Decrees he preferred to the People, he would never subscribe any, to prevent the The death of philip King of insifter luck and misfortune of his name, but did pass it under his friends names one after another, until he army companions and the control of the control o untill he grew couragious again; (Rorrly after that he underflood of the death of Thilip, who was flain immediatly after the Victory he wan at CHERONEA. And it feemeth this was the meaning of the Prophecy or Oracle in the two last Verses:

Demofthenes

Macedon.

Demosthenes preferreth the joy of his Countrey before the forrow for his own Daughter. Æschines ré-Plusarch for his that blubbering and for-

and charity.

The wanquished bewailes his Inchlefs lot, And he that wing , with tife escapeth not. Now Demofibenet hearing of Philips death, betore the news were openly known, to prevent them, he would put the People again in good hope of better luck to come. Thereupon he went with a chearfull countenance into the Affenthly of the Councill , and told them there , that he had a certain dream that promifed great good hap, and that out of hand unto the ATHENIAMS: and immediate the ATHENIAMS: atly after , the Meffengers arrived ; and brought certain news of King Philips death. Thereupon the ATHENIANS made Sacrifices of joy to the gods for this happy news, and appointed a Crown unto Panjanias that had flain him. Demosibeness also came abroad in his best Gown, and crowned with Flowers, seven days after the death of his Daughter, as As shines reporteth; who reproved him for it, and noteth him to be a man having stitle love or charity unto his own children. But indeed Achimes felf deferveth more blame, to have such a tender womanish heart, as to believe, that weeping and lamenting are figure of a gentle and charitable mature, condemning them that with patience and constancy do passaway such missortunes. But now to the ATHENIANS again. With patiente and comments at they did wifely to shew such open signs of joy, as to wear Crowns and Garlands upon their heads; nor alio, to facrifice unto the gods for the death of a Prince. that and Gariands upon their means, inches them in the Victories he had won of them. For behaved himself fo Princely and courteoully unto them in the Victories he had won of them. For though indeed all cruelty be subject to the revenge of the gods, yet is this an act of a vile and base mind, to honour a man while he lived, and to make him free of their City; and now that another had flain him, they to be in fuch an exceeding jollity withall, and to exceed the bounds of modesty fo far, as to ramp in manner with both their teet upon the dead, and to fing Songs of victory, as if they themselves had been the men that had valiantly slain him. In contrary manner also, I praise and Plotareb praithey themselves had been the men that had variantly main that the leaving the tears and lamentarion of his seth Demossible commend the constancy and courage of Demossible to the leaving the tears and lamentarion of his set constancy. commend the command, and himself in the mean time that he thought was for the benefit of the for leaving of nome-trouble unto wonter, and in my opinion, I think he did therein like a man of courage, and worthy to his mourning be a Governour of a Common-wealth, never to ftop nor yeeld, but always to be found ftable and to rejoyce for constant, for the benefit of the Common-wealth, rejecting all his troubles, cares, and affections, in his common contrant, for the penetri of the Country; and to keep his honour much more carefully, then common neft. Players use to do, when they play the parts of Kings and Princes, whom we see neither weep nor laugh when they lift, though they be on the Stage, but when the matter of the Play falleth out to give them just occasion. But we omit those reasons, if there be no reason (as indeed there is not) to leave and for fake a man in his forrow and trouble, without giving him some words of comfort. but rather to devise somematter to asswage his forrow, and to withdraw his mind from that to think upon some pleasanter thing: even as they should keep fore eyes from seeing bright and glaring colours, in offering them green and darker. And from whence can a mantake greater commort for his troubles and griefs at home, when the Common-wealth doth well, then to joyn their private griefs with common joys, to the end that the better may obscure and take away the worse? But thus far I digressed from my History, enlarging this matter, because Afchines in his Oration touching this matter, did move the Peoples hearts too much unto womanish forrow. But now tothe reft. The Cities of GREECE being again stirred up by Demosthenes, made a new League Demosthenes again together and the THEBANS also having armed themselves by his practife, did one day fet raisethup the upon the Garifon of MACEDONIANS within their City, and flew many of them, The ATHE- Grains aupon the Garlion of MACEDONIANS with the Thebans behalf, and Demofflines was daily at gainlt Alexanall the Affemblies of Councill, in the Pulpit, perfwading the People with his Orations; and he wrote alfo into Asia unto the King of Persia's Lieutenants and Captains, to make war with Alexander on their fide, calling him Child, and Margites, as much to fay, as Fool. But after that Alexander having fet all his things at stay within his Realm, came himself in person with his Army, and invaded the Countrey of BOEOTIA, then fell the pride of the ATHENIANS greatly, and Demostheres also plied the Pulpit no more as he was wont. At length the poor THEBANS being left unto themselves forfaken of every man, they were compelled themselves alone to bear the brunt of this War, and fo came their City to utter ruine and destruction. Thereby the ATHENIANS being in a marvellous fear and perplexity, did suddenly choose Ambassadours to send unto this young King, and Demosthenes chiefly among others: who being afraid of Alexanders sury and wrath. durft not go to him, but returned from Mount Cytharon, and gave up the Ambassade. But Alex- Alexander reander fent to fummon the ATHENIANS, to fend unto him ten of their Oratours, as Idomeneus and quired certain Duris both do write: or eight, as the most Writers and Historiographers do report, which thens. thens. were these: Domossteines, Polyentim, Ephialies, Lyenrgin, Myvocles, Damon, Callistenes and Domossteines Charictenus. At which time they write that Domossteines told the People of Athens the Fable Tale of the of the Sheep and Wolves, how that the Wolves came on a time, and willed the Sheep, if they Sheep and would have peace with them, to deliver them their Mastives that kept them. And so he compared Woives. himself and his companions that travelled for the benefit of the People, unto the Dogs that keep the Flocks of Sheep, and called Alexander the Woolf. Moreover, he faid, like as you fee thefe Corn-mafters bringing a fample of their Corn in a Dish or Napkin to shew you, and by that little do fell all that they have: fo I think you will all wonder, that delivering of us, you shall also deliver your selves into the hands of your Enemies. Aristobeliu of Cassandria reporteth this matter thus. Now the ATHENIANS being in confultation, not knowing how to refolve Demades having taken five Talents of them whom Alexander demanded , did offer himself , and promifed to go in this Ambassage unto Alexander, and to intreat for them; either because he trusted in the love the King did bear him, or else for that he thought and hoped he should find him pacified, as a Lion glutted with the bloud of Beafts which he had flain. Howfoever it happened, he perswaded the Peopleto send him unto Alexander, whom he so handled, that he got their pardon, and did reconcile him with the City of ATHENS. Thereupon Alexander being retired, Demades and his fellows bare all the fway and authority, and Demosthenes was under foot. Indeed when Agis King of LACEDEMON, came with his Army into the Field, he began a little to rouze himself, and to lift up his head : but he shrunk collar again soon after , because the A-THENIANS would not rife with the LACEDEMONIANS, who were overthrown, and Agis The judge-flain in Battell. At that time was the cause of the Crown pleaded against Crespen, and the Plea ment of the was written a little before the Battell of CHERONEA, in the year when Crarondas was Provoft Crown 2of ATHENS : howbeit no sentence was given till ten years after , when Aristophon was Pro-gainst Ctefivost. This was such an open judgement, and so famous, as never was any, as well for the great Fame phon.

of the Orators that pleaded in emulation one of the other, as also for the worthinels of the Judges that gave fentence thereof : who did not leave Demofthenes to his Enemies, although indeed they were of greater power then he , and were also supported with the favour and good will of the MA CEDONIANS: but they did notwithstanding so well quit him, that Afchines had not so much as the fifth part of mens voices and opinions on his fide, Wherefore immediately after the fentence given, he went out of ATHENS for shame, and travelled into the Countrey of lonia, and unto the RHODE'S, where he did teach Rhetorick. Shortly after, Harpalus flying out of Alexanders fervice, came unto Athens, being to be charged with many foul matters he had committed by his exceedman came to Athers, thing ing prodigality: and also because he feared Alexanders sury, who was grown severe and cruen unto from Alexan his chiefest Servants. He coming now amongst the ATHENIANS with store of Gold and Silver, the Oratours beeing greedy and desirous of the Gold and Silver he had brought, began straight to fpeak for him, and did counfell the People to receive and protect a poor Suiter that came to them for succour. But Demosthenes gave counsell to the contrary, and bad them rather drive him out of the City, and take heed they brought not Wars upon their backs, for a matter that not onely was not necessary, but furthermore meerly unjust. But within few days after, an Inventory being taken of all Harpalus Goods, he perceiving that Demosthernes took great pleasure to see a Cup of the Kings, and confidered very curiously the fashion and workmanship upon it, he gave it him in his hand, to judge what it weighed. Demosthenes poizing it, wondered at the great weight of it, it was to beavie: fo he asked how many pound weight it weighed. Harpalus finling, answered him: It will bring thee Demonstrates twenty Talents. So when night was come, he fent him the Cup, with the twenty Talents. This Harpalas was a very wifeman, and found straight by Demosshenes countenance that he loved Money, and could prefently judge his nature by feeing his pleafant countenance, and his eyes ftill upon the Cup. So Demostbenes refused not his Gift, and being overcome withall, as if he had received a Garison into his House, he took Harpalin part. The next morning he went into the Affembly of the People, having his neck bound up with wooll and rolls. So when they called him by his name to ftep up into the Pulpit, to speak to the People as he had done before, he made a fign with his head, that he had an impediment in his voice, and that he could not speak. But wise men laughing at his fine excuse, told him, that it was no fquinance that had stopped his wefell that night, as he would make them believe : but it was Harpales Money which he had received, that made him in that case. Afterwards when the People understood that he was corrupted , Dimosthenes going about to excuse himself , they would notabide to hear him, but made a noise and exclamation against him. Thereupon there role *The conceit up a pleasant conceited man, and said : Why my Masters, do ye resule to hear a man that hath *fuch a golden tongue? The People thereupon did immediately banish Harpaim, and fearing lest King Alexander would require an account of the Gold and Silver which the Oratours had robbed any other lan- and pilfered away among them , they made very diligent fearch and inquiry in every mans House, guage, then in excepting Gallicles houle, the Son of Arenidas; whose house they would by no means have Greek. For he sinh, and fearched, because he was but newly married, and had his new Spoule in his houle, as Theopompus Redarte 73 7h writech. Now Demosthenes desiring to shew that he was in no fault, preferred a Decree, that the ROBARIA STATE Court of the Areopagites should hear the matter, and punish them that were found faulty, and therewithall straight offered himself to be tried. Howbeit he was one of the first whom the Court condemned in the furn of fifty Talents, and for lack of payment, they put him in Prison: where he could not endure long, both for shame of the matter for the which he was condemned, as also for his fickly body. So he brake Prifon, partly without the privity of his Keepers, and partly also pleasant speech with their consent: for they were willing he should make a scape. Some do report, that he fled not far from the City: where it was told him, that certain of his enemies followed him, whereupon he would have hidden himfelf from them. But they themselves first called him by his name, and coming to him, prayed him to take Money of them, which they had brought him from their houles to help him in his banishment : and that therefore they ranaster him. Then they did comfort him the best they could, and perswaded him to be of good cheer, and not to despair for the misforune that was come to him. This did pierce his heart the more for forrow, that he answered them : Why, would you not have me be forry for my missortune, that compelleth me to for fake the City, where indeed I have to courteous enemies, that it is hard for me to find any where to good friends? So he took his banishment unmanly, and remained the most part of his banishment in the City of Æ01-NA, or at the City of TROEZEN, where oftentimes he would caft his eyes towards the Countrey of ATTICA, and weep bitterly. And some have written certain words he spake, which shewed no mind of a man of courage, nor were answerable to the noblethings he was wonk to perswade in his Orations. For it is reported of him, that as he went out of ATHENS, he looked back again, and holding up his hands to the Castle, faid in this fort: O Lady Minerva, Lady Patroness of this City: why doeft thou delight in three fo mischievous Beasts: the Owl, the Dragon, and the People? Befides, he perswaded the young men that came to see him, and that were with him, never to meddle in matters of State: affuring them, that if they had offered him two wayes at the first, the one to go into the Assembly of the People, to make Orations in the Pulpit, and the other to be put to death prefently; and that he had known as he did then, the troubles a man is compelled to fuffer, that medleth with the affairs of the State, the fear, the envy, the acculations, and troubles in the fame, he would rather have chosen the way to have suffered death. So Demosthenes continuing in his exile, King Alexander died, and all GREECE was up again: infomuch as Leofthenes being a man of great valour, had shut up Antipater in the City of LAMEA, and there kept him straightly besieged.

Then Pytheas and Callimedon, firnamed Carabos, two Oratours, and both of them banished from ATHENS , they took part with Antipater , and went from Town to Town with his Ambaffadours Antibater be and friends, perswading the GRECIANS not to stir, neither to take part with the ATHENIANS. sieged of the But Demolthenes in contrary manner , joyning with the Ambaffadours fent from ATHENS into every Athenians. Quarter to solicite the Cities of GREECE, to seek to recover their liberty, he did aid them the best he could, to folicite the GRECIANS, to take Arms with the ATHENIANS, to drive the MACEDONIANS out of GREECE. And Phylarchus writeth that Demosthenes encountered with Priheas words in an open Affembly of the People in a certain Town of ARCADIA. Priheas having spoken before him, had said: Like as we presume always that there is some sickness in the house whither we do fee Affes milk brought : fo must that Town of necessary be fick, wherein the Ambaffadours of ATHENS do enter. Demosthenes answered him again, turning his comparison against him: That indeed they brought Affes milk, where there was need to recover health: and even fo. the Ambassadours of Athens where sent to heal and cure them that were sick. The People at A-THENS understanding what Demosthenes had done, they so rejoyced at it, that presently they gave order in the Field, that his banishment should be revoked. He that perswaded the Decree of his re- Demosshenes vocation, was called Damon P.E.A.NIAN, that was his Nephew: and thereupon the ATHENIANS called home fent him a Galley to bring him to ATHENS, from the City of ÆGINA. So Demosthenes being arrived at the Haven of Piræa, there was neither Governour, Prieft, nor almost any Townsman left in the City, but went out to the Haven to welcom him home. So that Demetring MAGNESIAN writeth, that Demosthenes then lifting up his hands unto Heaven, faid, that he thought himself happy for the honour of that journey, that the return from his banishment was far more honourable then Alcibiades return in the like case had been. For Alcibiades was called home by force : and he was fent for with the good will of the Citizens. This notwithstanding, he remained still condemned for his Fine : for by the Law , the People could not dispense withall , nor remit it. Howbeit they devifed a way to deceive the Law: for they had a manner to give certain Money unto them that did prepare and fer out the Altar of Jupiter faviour, for the day of the folemnity of the Sacrifice, the which talents remit. they did yearly celebrate unto him: fo they gave him the charge to make this preparation for the ted-fum of fifty Talents, being the fum of the Fine aforefaid wherein he was condemned. Howbeit, he did not long enjoy the good hap of his restitution to his Countrey and Goods: for the affairs of the GRECIANS were immediately after brought to utter ruine. For the Battell of CRANON which they loft, was in the Moneth Munychion (to wit, July:) and in the Moneth Bodromion next enfuing (to wit , August) the Garison of the MACEDONIANS entred into the Fort of Munychia. And in the Moneth Pyanepsion (to wir , the October following) Demosthenes died in this manner. When news came to Athens, that Antipater and Craierus were coming thither with a great Army , Demoffhenes and his friends got out of the Town a little before they entred ; the People by Demades perswasion, having condemned them to die. So, every man making shift for himself, Antipater fent Souldiers after them to take them : and of them Archine was Captain , firnamed Physica Archine Physica - Arch dotheras, as much to fay, as a hunter of the banished men. It is reported that this Archias was hunter of the born in the City of THURIES, and that he had been fometimes a common Player of Tragedies : banished men. and that Polis also who was born in the City of ÆGINA (the excellentest Craitimaster in that faculty of all men) was his Scholar. Yet Hermippus doth place him amongst the number of the Scholars of Lacritus the Oratour. And Demetrins also writeth, that he had been at Anaximenes School. Now this Arthias having found the Oratour Hyperides in the City of EGINA, Aristonicas MA-RATHONIAN, and Hymeress the Brother of Demetries the PHALERIAN, which had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Ajax, he took them out of the Temple by force, and fent them unto Antipater, who was at that time in the City of CLEONES, wherehe did put them all to death: and some fay, that he did cut off Hyperides tongue. Furthermore, hearing that Demosthenes had taken San-Cuary in the Isle of Calauria, he took little Pinaces, with a certain number of Thracian Souldiers, and being come thinter, he sought to perswade Demosshers to be contented to go with him unto Ansipater, promising him that he should have no hurt. Demossibenes had a strange dream the night before, and thought that he had played a Tragedie contending with Archias, and that he dream. handled himfelf so well, that all the lookers on at the Theater did commend him, and gave him the honour to be the best Player : howbeit that otherwise he was not so well furnished as Archias and his Players, and that in all manner of furniture he did far exceed them. The next morning when Archias came to speak with him, and using gentle words unto him, thinking thereby to win him by fair means to leave the Sanctuary, Demosthenes looking him full in the face, fitting still where he was, without removing, faid unto him: O Archia; thou diddeft never perswade me when thou playedft a Play, neither shalt thou now perswade me, though thou promise me. Then Archias began to be angry with him, and to threaten him. O faid Demosthenes, now thou speakest in good earnest, without diffimulation, as the Oracle of MACEDON hath commanded thee : for before, thou spakest Demosibenes without unimination, as the Oracle of MACEDON hast collinated thee; to reduce, thou peaks taketh profine in the clouds, and far from thy thought: but I pray thee stay a while, till I have written somewhat taketh profine to my friends. After he had said so, he went into the Temple as though he would have dispatched in the Temple fome Letters, and did put the end of the quill in his mouth which he wrote withall, and bit it as his of Neptu manner was when he did use to write any thing, and held the end of the quill in his mouth a pretty In the Isle of while together: then he cast his Gown over his head, and layed him down. Archias Souldiers see- Calauria. ing that, being at the door of the Temple, laughed him to fcorn (thinking he had done fo, for that he was afraid to die) calling him coward, and beaft. Archias also coming to him, prayed him to

rife, and began to use the former perswasions to him, promising him that he would make Antipater his friend. Then Demesthenes feeling the poylon work, cast open his Gown, and boldly looking Archies in the face, faid unto him: Now when thou wilt, play Creens part, and throw my body to the dogs, without further grave or buriall. For my part, O god Mersune, I do go out of thy Temple being yet alive, because I will not profane it with my death : but Antipater, and the Macedoni-ANS, have not spared to defile thy Sanctuary with bloud and cruell murther. Having spoken these words, he prayed them to stay him up by his arm-holes, for his feet began already to fail him; and thinking to go forward, as he paft by the Altar of Megrame, he fell down, and giving one gaspe, gave up the ghost. Now touching the poylon, Arifo reporteth, that he sucked and drew it up into his mouth our of his quill, as we had faid before. But one Pappus (from whom Hermippus hath taken his Hiftory) writeth, that when he was laid on the ground before the Altar, they found the beginning of a Letter which faid : D. mossbenst unto Antipater , but no more. Now his death being thus fudden, the THRACIAN Souldiers that were at the Temple door, reported that they faw him pluck the poyfon which he put into his mouth, out of a little cloth he had, thinking to them that it had been a piece of Gold he had swallowed down. Howbeit a Maid of the house that served him, being examined about it, told them, that he had carried it about him a long time for a prefervative for him. Eratofthenes writeth, that he kept this poyfon in a little box of gold made hollow within, the which he ware as a bracelet about his arm. There are many Writers also that do report his death diverily, but to recite them all were in vain: faving that there was one called Democharts (who was Descriptions very friend) who faid, that he died not fo fuddenly by poylon, but that it was the fociall favour of the gods (to preferve him from the cruelty of the MACEDONIANS) that fuddenly took him out of this life, and made him feel so little pain. Demosthenes died the sixteenth day of the Moneth Pynephion (to wit, October) on the which day they do celebrate at ATHENS the Feaft made a Law besides, that the oldest man of his Houle should for ever be kept within the Palace, at the charge of the Common-wealth: and ingraved these Verses also upon the base of his Image: Hadft, thou Demosthenes, had strength according to thy heart, The Macedons foould not have wrought the Greeks such wo and smart.

of Ceres , called Telmophoria , which is the dolefulleft Feaft of all the year : on the which day allo, the women remain all day long in the Temple of the goddes, , without meat or drink. Shortly

For they that think that it was Demosthemes himself that made these Verses in the 1se of Calau-RIA, before he took his poyfon, are greatly deceived. But yet a little before my first coming to ATHENS, there went a report that such a thing happened: A certain Souldier being sent fortocome unto the Captain, did put such pieces of Gold as he had into the hands of Demospheres Statue, which had both his hands joyned together: and there grew hard by it a great Plane-tree, divers leaves whereof either blown off with wind by chance, or else put there of purpose by the Souldier, covered fo this Gold, that it was there a long time, and no man found it: untill fuch time as the Souldier came again, and found it as he left it. Hercupon this matter running abroad in every mans mouth, there were divers men that took occasion of this subject, to make Epigrams in the praise of Demifibenes , as one who in his life was never corrupted. Furthermore , Demades did not long enjoy the honour he thought he had newly gotten. For the justice of the gods, revenger of the death of Demoffbener, brought him into MACEDON, to receive just punishment by death, of those whom he difhoneftly flattered: being before grown hatefull to them, and afterwards committed a fault where by he could not escape. For there were Letters of his taken, by the which he did perswade and pray *He sain An . * Perdiccus to make himself King of MACEDON, and to deliver GREECE from bondage, saying, rigonar, in the ferances command many and yet it was half rotten, meaning thereby Antipater. Dinarchus CORINTHIAN accused him, that he wrote these Letters: the which so grievously offended Coffander, that first he slew his own Son in his arms, and then commanded they should afterward kill Demades death Demades, making him feel then by those miseries (which are the cruelless that can happen unto man) that Traytors betraying their own Countrey, do first of all betray themselves. Dimosthenes had often forewarned him of his end, but he would never believe him. Thus, my friend Soffim, you have what we can deliver you, by reading or report, touching Demosthenes Life and Doings.

touching Cicero's Mother, whose name was Helvia, it is reported she was Cicero's parena Gentlewoman born, and lived always very honestly: but for his father, tage. the reports of him are divers and infinite. For some say, that he was born and brought up in a Fullers shop : others report, that he came of Tullus Appins, who while he lived was honoured among the VOLSCES as King, and made very sharp and cruell Wars with the ROMANS. But furely it feemes to me, that the first of that name called Cicero, was some famous man, and that for his fake his Off-spring continued still that sirname, and were glad to keep it; though many men scorned it, because Cicer in English fignifieth a cich pease: and Cicero had a thing upon the Cicero, why so tip of his note, as it had been a little wart, much like to a cich peale, whereupon they firnamed him called.

But this Cicero, whole Life we write of now, nobly answered certain of his friends on a time giving him counfell to change his name, when he first made suite for Office, and began to pra-chise in matters of State: that he would endeavour himself to make the name of Cicero's more noble and famous, then the Scouri or Catuli. After that , Cicero being made Treasurer in SICILE, he gave an Offering of certain Silver Plate unto the gods, and at large engraved on it his two first names, Marcus Tullius: and in place of his third name, he pleafantly commanded the Workman to cut out the form and fashion of a cich pease. Thus much they write of his name. Now for his birth, it was laid that his Mother was brought to bed of him without any pain, the third day of January; on Citero's birth. which day the Magistrates and Governours of Rome do use at this present, yearly to make solemn Prayers and Sacrifices unto the gods, for the health and prosperity of the Emperour. Further, it is reported, that there appeared an Image to his Nurse, that did prognosticate unto her, she gave a An Image ap-Child fuck, which in time to come should do great good unto all the ROMANS. to the study of Poetry then any other. There is a pretty Poem of his in Verses of eight staves, called Postins Glaucus, extant at this day, the which he made when he was but a boy. After that, being given more earneftly unto his study, he was not onely thought the best Oratour, but the best Poet allo of all the ROMANS in his time : and yet doth the excellency of his eloquence, and commendation of his tongue continue even to this day, notwithstanding the great alteration and change of the Latine Tongue, But his Poetry hath loft the name and estimation of it, because there were many after him that became far more excellent therein then he. After he had left his childish studies , he became then Philo's Scholar, the Academick Philosopher, the onely Scholar of Clitomachus Scholars, whom the ROMANS efteemed fo much for his eloquence, and loved more for his gentle behaviour and conversation. He gave himself also to be a follower of Mutina Scavola, who at that time was a great man in ROME, and Prince of the Senate, and who did also instruct Cicero in the Laws of ROME. He did alfo follow Sylla for a time, in the Wars of the MARSIANS. But when he faw that the Common-wealth of Rome fell to Civill Wars, and from Civill Wars to a Monarchy, then he returned again to his Book and contemplative life, and frequented the learned men of GREECE. and always fludied with them , untill Sy//4 had gotten the upper hand , and that he faw all the Common-wealth again at fome stay. About that time, Sylla causing the Goods of one that was faid to be flain, to be fold by the Crier (being one of the Outlaws and Proferipts, to wit, banished by Bills fer up on Pofts) Chrylogonus, one of Sylla's freed Bondmen, and in great favour with his Mafter. bought them for the fum of two thousand Drachma's. Therewithall the Son and Heir of the dead person called Roscius, being marvellously offended, he shewed that it was too shamefull an abuse: for his Fathers Goods amounted to the fum of two hundred and fifty Talents. Sylla finding himfelf thus openly touched with publick fraud and deceit, for the onely gratifying of his man, he procured Crylogonus to accuse him , that he had killed his own Father. Never an Oratour durft speak in Roscins behalf to defend his cause, but shrunk back, fearing Sylla's cruelty and severity. Wherefore poor Rofeins the young man, feeing every man for fake him, had no other refuge but to go to Cicero, whom his friends did counfell and perswade boldly to take upon him the desence of Roscius cause: for he should never have a happier occasion, nor so noble a beginning to bring himself into estimation , asthis. Thereupon Cicero determined to take his cause in hand, and did handle it so well, that he obtained the thing he fued for : whereby he wan him great fame and credit. But yet being afraid of Sylla's displeature, he absented himself from ROME, and went into GREECE, giving it our , that his travell was for a difeafe he had upon him. Indeed Cicero was dog-lean , a little eater, and would also eat late, because of the great weakness of his stomack : but yet he had a good loud voice, though it was somewhat harsh, and lacked grace and comeliness. Furthermore, he was so earnest and vehement in his Oration, that he mounted still with his voice into the highest tunes: info-Giero, Asiis much that men were afraid it would one day put him in hazard of his life. When he came to A-THENS, he went to hear Antiochm of the City of ASCALON, and fell in great liking with his fweet tongue, and excellent grace, though otherwise he misliked new opinions in Philosophy. For Antiochus had then forfaken the opinions of the new Academick Philosophers, and the Sect of Carneades: being moved thereunto, either through the manifest proof of things, or by his certain judgement, or (as some say) for that of an ambition or diffention against the Scholars and followers of Clicomachus and Philo, he had reproved the resolutions of the Academicks, which he had of long time defended, onely to lean for the most part to the Stoicks opinion. Howbeit Ciaero had most affection unto the Academicks, and did fludy that Sect more then all the reft, of purpole, that if he faw he were forbidden to practife in the Common-wealth at ROME, he would then go to ATHEMS (leaving all Pleas and Affairs of the Common-wealth) to bestow the rest of his time quietly in the The commo-dity of Philosophy. At length, when he heard news of Sylla's death, and faw that his body was dity of czercife. grown to good state and health by exercise, and that his voice became daily more and more to fill mens care with a sweet and pleasant found, and yet was loud enough for the constitution of his body: receiving Letters daily from his friends at Roms, that prayed him to resum home; and moreover, Antiochus self also earnestly persuading him to practise in the Common-wealth, be began again to fall to the study of Rhetorick, and to frame himself to be eloquent, being a necellary thing for an Oratour, and did continually exercise himself in making Orations upon any Speech or Proposition, and so frequented the chief Oratours and Masters of eloquence that were at that time. To this end therefore he went into ASIA unto RHODES, and amongst the Orators of Asia he frequented Xenocles ADRAMETTIN, and Dionyfins, MAGNESIAN, and fludied also with Menippus CARIAN: at RHODES he heard Apollomius Molon , and the Philosopher Possodonius. And it is reported also, that Apollonius wanting the Latine Tongue, he did pray Cicero declai- Cicero for exercife fake to declaim in Greek. Cicero was very well contented with it, thinking that thereby his fault should be the better corrected. When he had ended his Declamation, all those that were present were amazed to hear him, and every man praised him one after another. Howbeit Apollonius all the while Cicero spake, did never shew any glad countenance : and when he had ended, he stayed a great while, and said never a word. Cicero milliking withall, Apollomus at length faid unto him : As for me Cicero, I do not onely praise thee, but more then that , I wonder at thee : and yet I am forry for poor GREECE, to fee that Learning and Bloquence (which An Oracle gi- were the two onely gifts and honours left us) are by thee obtained with us , and carried unto the Royearo Cierro. MANS. Now Cierro being very well disposed to go with good hope to practise at ROME, he was a little discouraged by an Oracle that was told him. For inquiring of the god Apollo DELCHIAN, how he might do to win fame and estimation; the Nun Pytheas answered him, he should obtain it, fo that in his doings he would rather follow the disposition of his own nature then the opinion of Cicero's first the common People, Wherefore when he came to Rome, at the first he proceeded very warily and practifing in discreetly, and did unwillingly seek for any Office, and when he did, he was not greatly esteemed: wealth. for they commonly called him the GRECIAN, and Scholar, which are two words which the Artificers (and fuch base mechanical People at ROME) have ever ready at their tongues end. Now he being by nature ambitious of honour, and prickt forward also by the perswasion of his Father and friends, in the end he began to plead; and there obtained not the chiefest place by little and little, but fo foon as he fell to practife, he was immediatly efteemed above all the Orators and Pleaders in his time, and did excell them all. Yet it is reporteth notwithstanding, that for his gesture and pronunciation, having the felf-fame defects of nature at the beginning which Demosthenes had to reform them , he carefully ftudied to counterfeit Rofcius , an excellent Comedian , an Afor also a Player of Tragedies. Of this Afop men write, that he playing one day Airem part upon a Stage Resemble and (who determined with himself how he might be revenged of his Brother Thyestes) a servant by chance Elop comhaving occasion to run suddenly by him, he forgetting himself, striving to shew the vehement pasti- mon Players. on and fury of this King, gave him fuch a blow on his head with the Scepter in his hand, that he flew him dead in the place. Even to Cicero's words were of great force to perswade, by means of his grace and pronunciation. For he mocking the Orators that thrust out their heads, and cried in their Orations, was wont to fay, that they were like to lame men, who were driven to ride, because they could not go on foor : even fo (faid he) they cry out because they cannot speak. Truly plea- Cicero a fine] fant taunts do grace an Oratour, and shew a fine wit; but yet Cicero used them so commonly, that they were offensive unto many, and brought him to be counted a malicious scoffer and spightfull man. He was chosen Treasurer in the time of dearth, when there was great scarcity of Corn Cicero chosen at ROME : and the Province of SICILE fell to his lot. At his first coming thither, the SICILI- Qualtor. ANS milliked him very much, because he compelled them to send Corn unto Rome : but after shey had found his diligence, justice, and lenity, they honoured him above any Governour that ever was fent from ROME. Now there were divers young Gentlemen of ROME, of noble Houses, Cicero's dilliwho being accused for fundry faults committed in Wars against their Honour and Martiall Discipline, had been fent back again unto the Prætor of SICILE: for whom Cierro pleaded, and did and lenity. so excellently defend their cause, that they were pardoned every man. Thereupon, thinking well of himself, when his time was expired, he went to ROME, and by the way there hapned a pretty jeft unto him. As he passed through the Countrey of CAMPANIA (otherwise called the Land of labour) he mer by chance with one of the chiefest ROMANS of all his friends. So falling intalk with him , he asked him what they faid of him at ROME , and what they thought of his doings : imagining that all Rome had been full of the glory of his name and deeds. His friends asked him again: And where haft thou been Cicero all this while, that we have not feen thee at ROME? This killed his heart straight, when he faw that the report of his name and doings, entring into the City of ROME as into an infinite Sea, was fo suddenly vanished away again, without any other fame or freech. But after that, when he looked into himfelf, and faw that in reason he took an infinite cicero ambitilabour in hand to attain to glory, wherein he faw no certain end whereby to attain unto it, it eut ous, and defioff a great part of the ambition he had in his head : and yet the great pleasure he took to hear his rous of praise. own praise, and to be over-much given to defire of honour and estimation, these two things continued with him even to his dying day, and did effloors make him swerve from justice. Furthermore, when he began throughly to practife in the affairs of the State, he thought it an ill thing that Artificers and Crattimen thould have many forts of Instruments and Tools without life, to know the names of every one of them, the places where they should take them, and the use whereto they should employ them: and that a man of knowledge and quality (who doth all things with the help and fervice of men) should be flothfull and careless to learn to know the names of his Citizens. Therefore he gave himself to know, not onely mens names of quality, but the streets also Citero given to they dwelt in , what part of the City foever it was ; their goodly Hollies in the Countrey , the friends know mens they made of , and the neighbours whom they companied with. So that when he went abroad names, their into It's LY, whereforer he became, Cierto could thew and name his friends Houses. He was not friends. very rich, and yet he had enough to serve his turn : the which made men muse the more at him; and they loved him the better, because he took no Fee nor Gift for his pleading, what Caule loever he took in hand, but then specially, when he desended a matter against Verres. This Verres had been Prator of Spritta and had committed many lewed parts there , for the cicero's doings which the SICILIA'NS did accure him. Cisers taking upon him to defend their Caule, made Verres, gaint Verres, to be condemned, not by pleading; but in manner without pleading, that in this fort. The Prætors being his hidger, and favouring Ferrer, fad niade to many retoinments and delays, that they had driven it off to the latt day of hearing? "Circul perceiving then he should not have time to speak all that he had to fay against him, and that thereby nothing should be done and judged, he role up and faid, that there needed no further plea in this matter, But onely brought forth the Witnelles before the Judges; and having caused their depositions to be taken, he prayed they would procred to fentence, according to their evidence given on that behalf. Yet some do report, that Cicero gave many pleatant taunts and girds; in pleading the acculation of the SICILIANS against Verres. The ROMANS do tall a Bore, Perres. There was one Cacilius, the Son of a freed Bondman, who was suspected to hold with the superstition of the JEWS. This Calius would have put by the SICILIANS from following the acculation of Verres, and would have had the matter of his accusation onely referred to him, for the profecuting of it against him. Cieero scorning his suit, said unto him : What hath a J k w to do with a bore ? This Verres had a Son somewhat above swenty years of age, who (as the report went) had a very ill name for his beauty. And therefore when Verres one day thought to mock Cieero, faying, that he was too effeminate : Thy children (faid he) are to be reproved of that fecretly at home. In this acculation, Horsenfius the Orator durft not directly defend Verres: but touching the condemnation of his fine, he was then contented to answer for him, for he bad a Sphinx of Ivory given him by Verres for his reward. Thereupon Cicero gave him a pretty nip by the way: but Hortenfius not understanding him , said, he could not skill of dark speeches. Well , faid Cierre, yet haft thou a Sphinx in thy houle. In the end Verres being condemned, and a fine fer on his head to the value of threefcore and fifteen Myriades, Cierro notwithftanding was sufpected to bebribed with money for agreeing to cast him in fo small a sum. But yet when he came to be Ædilis, the SICILIANS to flew themselves thankfull to him, both brought and sent him many Presents Cicero chosen out of SICILE. Of all that betook nothing to his own use, but onely bestowed their liberality in Cierro's tiches bringing down the prices of Victuals at ROME. He had a goodly house within the confines of the City of ARPOS, a Farm also by NAPLES, and another about the City of POMPEII: but all thelewere no great things. Afterwards he had also the Joynter of his Wife Teremia, which amountains ted to the sum of twelve Myriades, and besides all this, there came to him by inheritance, cleven Myriades of their Denarii. Thereupon he lived very honeftly and foberly, without excess, with his familiar friends that loved him, both GRECIANS and ROMANS, and would never go to supper till after Sun-fet, not fo much for any great business he had, as for the weakness of his stomack, But otherwife he was very curious, and carefull of his person, and would be rubbed and anointed, and he would use also to walk a certain number of turns by proportion : and so exercising his body in that fort, he was never fick, and befides was also very strong and lufty of body, able to abide great pains and forrows which he fell into afterwards. He gave his Fathers chief manfion house to his Brother, and went himself to dwell in the Mount Palatine: because such as came to wait upon him to do him honour, should not take the pains to go so far to see him. For he had as many men daily at his gate every morning, as either (Fraffus tad for his wealth, or Pompey for his estimation among the Souldiers, both of them being at that time the chiefest men of ROME. Yea furthermore, Pomptys felf came unto Gierro, because his Orations flood him to great purpose, for the increase of his honour and authority. Now when Gierro came to make fuit to be Prator (which is, to be as an ordinary Judge) though he had many competitors, and fellow-fuiters with him, yet was he first chofen afore them all : and he did fo honeftly behave himself in that Office, that they did not fo much as once suspect him of bribery or extortion. And for proof hereof, it is reported, that Lieinius Macer (a man that of himself was of great power, and yet favoured and supported besides by Crassia) was accused before Cicero of theft and extortion in his Office; but he trusting much to his supposed credit, and the great fuit and labour his friends made for him, went home to his house, before sentence was pronounced against him (the Judges being yet to give their opinions) and there speedily trimmed his beard, and pur a new Gown upon his back, as though he had been fure to have been Litialist Macer quit of his acculation; and then returned again into the Market-place. But Graffist went to meet him, and told him, all the Judges had condemned him. Lieinius Macer took fuch a grief and conceit upon it, that he went home to his house again, laid him down on his bed, and never rose after. This judgement wan Cicero great fame, for they praifed him exceedingly for the great pains he tools, to fee justice duly executed. Another also called Vatinius (a bedlem fellow, and one that behaved himself very unreverently to the Magistrates in his pleading, and besides had a swollen neck (came very arrogantly one day unto Cierro being in his Pratoriall seat, and asked him a thing which Cierro cero would not granthim there, but would think of it at better leifure. Thereupon Vatinius told him, that he would not be crupulous to grant that, if he were Prator. Gierro turning to him, anfwered him again : No more have I (laid be) fuch a fwollen neck as thou haft. Towards the end of his Office, two or three days before his time expired, there was one accused Manilius before him, that he also had robbed the Common-wealth. This Manilius was very well beloved of the common People, who were perfusaded that he was put in fuit, not for any fault he had committed, but onely to despight Pompey with, whose familiar friend he was. So he required certain days to answer the matter he was accused of : but Ctero would give him no further respite, but to answer it the next day. The People therewith were marvellously offended, because the other Prators in fuch like cases, were wont to give ten days respite unto others. The next morning when the Tribunes had brought him before the Judges, and also accused him unto them, he befought Citero to hear him patiently. Citero made him answer, that having always used as much favour and courtefe as he possibly might by Law, unto those that were accused, he thought he should offer Manilius too great wrong, if he should not do the like to him: wherefore, because he had but one day more to continue Prator in Office, he had purposely given him that day to make his answer before him. For he said, that to leave his accusation to the hearing of another · Cietre withone Practor, he could not have been thought a man that had born him good will, and meant to pleafure word pacified him. These words did marvellously change the Peoples opinion and affection towards him, and granted them : and coming from the Bench , flanding at the Bar like an Oratour to pleat for him, he made a notable Oration, and spake both boldly and sharply against the chief men every man speaking well of him , they prayed him to defend Massilius canfe. He willingly of the City, and those specially that did envy Powpey: This notwithstanding, when he came to sue to be Consul, he sound as great favour amongst the Nobility; as he did with the commonalty. For Citers made they did further his fuit, for the Commonwealths fake; upon this occasion. The change and Consulalteration of Government the which Sylla brought in, was thought strange at the first among the ancration or constrained in a state of the being used to its, it was throughly etholisted, and no man millited it. At that time many men practifed to subvert the Government, not for the benefit. of the Commonwealth, but to ferve their own covetous minds. For Pompey being then in the The conformer East parts, made Wars with the Kings of PONTUS and ARMENTA; and had not left fufficient of Carlline. the parts, make visit their feditious perfons, that fought nothing but rebellion: Their men had received their Captain, a desperate man to attempt any great enterprise; subtil and catifine which make Lucius Catifine their Captain, a desperate man to attempt any great enterprise; subtil and catifine which make out of nature. He was accused before (besides many other vise faults) for deflowing of address. his own Daughter, and killing his Brother: and being afraid to be put in fuit for it, he prayed Sills to put his Brother amongst the number of the Out-laws (or Proferipts) asif he had been then alive. Thefe wicked Rebelshaving chofen them, such a Captain, were; sworn, and, bound one to another in this manner. They killed a man, and did eat of his fielh pogether, and had befides corrupted the most part of all the youth. For Cariline their Captain suffered every man to take his pleafire, as his youth was inclined unto, as to banquet, to follow Harlots; and gave them Money largely to bestow in these vain expences. Furthermore, all Thus CAN began to rise, and the most part of GAUL alfo, lying between the Alpes and ITALE. The City of ROME it felf was also in great danger of rifing, for the inequality of the Goods of the Inhabitants. For the Noblemen and of greatest courage, had spent all their Lands in Plays and Feasts, or in Buildings and common Works. which they built at their own charge, to curry favour with the common People, that they might obtain the chief. Offices: fo that thereby they became very poor, and their Goods were, in the hands of the mean men and wretches. Thus the frate of Home flood in great hazard of uproar, the which any man might eafily have procured that durft have taken upon him any change or alteration of Government, there was then such division among them in the State. Catilina notwithstanding. to provide him of a ftrong bulwark to profecuse his intent, came to fue to be Conful, hoping that he should be chosen with Case Materius, a man that of himself was apt neither to do any great good, nor much hurt, and yet that he could be agreat strength and aid unto him that would actempt any thing. Divers noble and wife men forefeeing, that, did procure Cicero to fue for the Confulfhip. The People accepted him, and rejected Cariline. Antonism and Cicerothereupon were a families created Confuls, although that Ciorro of all the fuiters for the Confulfhip was but onely a Knights and M. T. Son, and not the Son of a Senator of Rome. Now, though the common People understood not Citeroctere the fecret practife and meaning of Catiline, yet at the beginning of Cicero's Confulfing, there sail Confuls our great trouble and contention in the Commonwealth. For they, of the one fide, whom Sylls had Great trouble our great roughe and communitation the Communication. The Tribunes on the other side preferred Laws and Ordinances to further this device. They preferred the Law to shoole the Determini, with for A Law preferversign power and authority through all ITALY and SYRIA, and also through all the Countries red for the creand Provinces which Pompey had newly conquered to the Empire of Rome to fell and release all thority of the Lands belonging to the State of ROME, to accuse any, man whom they thought good, to builth any Decembri.

Anothits was it that the Noblemen most feared of all other things. Direcupon Gisera its provide first an groven this danger, granted to him the Province of the Realm of Macanon: and the Province of Gana being offered unto himself, he refuted it. By this good turn be man Anonius like a hired Player, making him to promife him that he would affilt and aid him for the benefit of the Commonwealth, and that he would say no more, then he should will him. When he had brought him to this, and had won him to his mind, he then began to be the bolder, and more flourly to rediff them that were Authors of this innovation and new Laws, Cicero therefore in open Sanate, did one day sharply reprove and inveighagainst this Law of the December, which the Tribunes would have established, And thereby he slid so terrifie the Authors thereof, that there was not one man dust the stable of the stabl speak against him. This noswithstanding, the Tribunes afterwards attempted lonce again to overthrew the have it to pals, and appointed the Confuls to appear before the People. Howbeit Gicero being Law of the nothing abashed at it, he commanded the Sensue, to follow history. So he did not onely overthrow December. this Law of the Decemviri, which the Tribune did prefer, but furthermore, they were unterly discouraged and our of hope to bring any of their matters to pass they intended, he strook them fo dead with his Eloquence. For Cierce onely set, all men in ROME made the ROMANS know, how much Eloquence doth grace and beautifue that which is beneft, and how invincible right and justice are, being eloquently fer forth : and also how that a min that will be counted a wife Governour of a Commonweal, should always in his doings rather-prefer profit, then feek to curry

All thefe things being throughly loafidered, a decree period by this sense, that they should refer the kare of the Commonwealth unto the Cornfult; so the entit that with abblance authority shey might (as well as they could) provide for the fatered and preferention thereof. Such manner of decree and authority was not loften feen concluded of in the Sentie , but in title 16 perfent fear and danger. Now Cicere having this ablolus powie | he referred all perriege mutters to Quinnut Merelus charge, and did himself take upon him the care and Government of all civil affairs within ROME. On the day time when he went up and down the Town, he had fuch a Troop of men after him. that when he came through the great Market-place, he almost filled it with his train that followed him. Thereupon Catiline would no longer delay time, but resolved to go himself unto Manlim. where their Armylay. But before he departed, he had drawn into his confederacy one Martine, and another called Gethegus, whom he commanded betimes in the morning to go to Cicero's house with short Daggers to kill him, pretending to come to salute him, and to give him a good morrow. But there was a noble Woman of Rome called Fulvia, who went over-night unto Cicero, and Fulvitheway. hade him beware of that Cethegus, who indeed came betimes the next morning unto him; and be-eth Catilines ing denied to be let in, he began to chafe and rail before the gate. This made him the more to be intent to kill suspected. In the end Cicero coming out of his house, called the Senate to the Temple of Tupiter Cicero. Stator, (as much to fay, as Stayer) which standeth at the upper end of the holy street as they go to the Mount Palatine. There was Catiline with others, as though he meant to clear himself of the suspition that went of him: howbeit there was not a Senator that would fit down by him, but they did all rife from the bench where Catiline had taken his place. And further, when he began to freak, he could have no audience for the great noise they made against him. So at length Cicero role, and commanded him to avoid out of ROME, saying, that there must needs be a separation of walls between them two, considering that the one used but words, and the other force of arms. Catiline thereupon immediately departing the City with three hundred armed men, was no fooner Catiline deparout of the Precincts of the Walls, but he made his Sergeants carry Axes and bundles of Rods before ted. him, as if he had been a Conful lawfully created; and did display his Ensigns of War, and so went in this order to feek Manlius. When they were joyned, he had not much less then twenty thousand men together, with the which he went to practise the Towns to rebell. Now open War being thus proclaimed, Antonim, Cicero's Colleague and fellow Conful, was fent against him to fight with him. In the mean space, Cornelius Lentulus, strnamed Sura (a man of a noble house. but of a wicked disposition, and that for his ill life was put off the Senate) affembled all the reft called Sura which were of Catalines conspiracy, and that remained behind him in ROME, and bad them be as fraid of nothing. He was then Przetor the second time, as the manner is when any man comes to recover again the dignity of a Senator which he had loft. It is reported, that this firmame of Sura was given him upon this occasion. He being Treasurer in Sylla's Dictatorship, did fondly waste and confume a marvellous fum of Money of the common Treasure. Sylla being offended with him for it, and demanding an account of him before the Senate, he carelefly and contemptionally flepped forth, faying, he could make him no other account, but shewed him the calfoot his leg, as Chila dren do when they make a fault at Tennis. And thereof it came, that ever after that they called him Sura, because Sura in Latine fignifieth the calf of the leg. Another time also being accused for a lewd part he had committed, he bribed fome of the Judges with Money; and being onely quit by two voites more which he had in his favour, he faid, he had loft his Money he had given to one of those two Judges, because it was enough for him to be cleared by one voice more. This man being of this disposition, was first of all incensed by Gatiline, and lasty marred by certain Wizards and false Prognosticators that had mocked him with a vain hope, singing Verses unto him which they had fained and devifed, and false Prophesies also, which they bare him in hand they had taken out of Sybilles Books of Prophecy, which faid, that there should reign three Cornelis at Rome, of Oracles of the which, two had already fullfilled the Prophecy, Cinna and Sylla; and for the third fortune laid three Cornelis it upon him, and therefore bad him go through withall, and not to dream it out, lofing opportunit that should ty as Catiline had done. Now this Lentuline undertook no small enterprize, but had an intent with reignest Rome. him to kill all the whole Senate, and as many other Citizens as they could murther, and to fet fire on Great treason ROME, sparing none but Poimpey's Sons, whom they would referve for pledges, to make their peace practiled in Rome by C. afterwards with Pompey: for the rumour was very great and certain also, that he returned from Lentulus and very great Wars and Conquefts which he had made in the East Countries. So, they laid a plot to Cothegue. put their Treason in execution, in one of the nights of Saturner Feasts. Further, they had brought Flax and Brimstone, and a great number of Armours and Weapons into Cethegias, house, Besides all this provision, they had appointed an hundred men in an hundred parts of the City, to the end that fire being raifed in many places at one time, it should the sooner run through the whole City. Other men allo were appointed to stop the Pipes and water Conduits which brought water to Rome. and to kill those also that came for water to quench the fire. In all this flir, by chance there were two Ambassadors of the Allobroges, whose country at that time did much mislike of the Ro-MANS, and were unwilling to be subject unto them. Learning thought these men very fit instruments to cause all Gaul to rebell. Thereupon practifing with them, he wan them to be of their conspiracy, and gave them Letters directed to the Council of their Countrey, and in them did promise them freedom. He sent other Letters also unto Cariline, and perswaded him to proclaim Liberty to all bondmen, and to come with all the speed he could to Rome: and sent with them one Titus of the City of CROTONA, to carry these Letters. But all their counsels and purpoles (like fools that never met together but at Feafts, drinking drunk with light Women) were eafily found out by Cicero, who had a carefull eye upon them, and very wifely and discreetly saw through them. For he had appointed men out of the City to foy their doings, which followed them to fee what they intended. Furthermore, he spake secretly with some he trusted, (the which others also

Ambassadors of the ALLOBROGES, and drawn them into their conspiracy. At length he watch-The confirm ed them one night to narrowly, that he took the Ambassadors, and Titus CROTONIAN with tors apprehenting the Letters he carried, by help of the Ambassadors of the Allogroups, which had secretly informed him of all before. The next morning by break of day, Cierro affembled the Senate in the Temple of Concord, and there openly read the Letters, and heard the evidence of the Witnefies. Further, there was one Junius Syllanus a Senator that gave in evidence, that some heard Carbegus fay that they should kill three Consuls and four Prators. Pife a Senator also, and that had been Conful, told in manner the felf fame tale. And Cains Sulpitius a Prator, that was fent into Cethegas boule, reported that he had found great store of Darts, Armour, Daggers, and Swords new made. Laftly, the Senate having promited Tiras CROTONIAN he should have no hurt, so he would tell what he knew of this compiracy, Lemulus thereby was convinced, and driven to give up his Office of Prator before the Senate, and changing his purple Gown, to take another meet for his milerable state. This being done, Lennhus and his Comforts were committed to ward to the Prætorshoufes, Now growing towards evening, the People waiting about the place where the Senate was Affembled, Cierro at length came our, and rold them what they had done within. Thereupon he was conweyed by all the People usto a friends house of his hard by: for that his own house was occupied by the Ladies of the City, who were buse, folennly celebrating a secret Sacrifice in the honour of the godders, called of the ROMANS the Good godders, and of the GRECIANS Gynecia, to wit, Feminine: unto her this yearly Sacrifice is done at the Confuls houle, by the Wife or Mother of the Confull then being, the Vertall Nuns being prefent at it. Now Cieers being come into his Neighbours house, began to bethink him what course he were best to take in this matter. For to punish the offenders with severity, according to their deferts, he was atraid to do is, both because he was of a courteous nature, as also for that he would not feem to be glad to have occasion to thew his abfolure power and authority, to punish (as he might) with rigour, Caizens that were of the noblest houses of the City, and that had besides many friends. And contrariwiscallo, being remitain fo weighty a matter as this, he was afraid of the danger that might enfue of their raffinels, mittrufting that if he should punish them with less then death, they would not amend for it, imagining they were well rid of their trouble, but would rather become more bold and desperate then ever they were, adding moreover the fling and spite of a new malice unto their accustomed wickednels ; befides that he himfelf should be thought a coward and timorous man , whereas they had already not much better opinion of him. Cierre being perplexed thus with their doubts, there appeared a Miracle to the Ladies, doing facrifice a home in his house. For the fire being though to be clean out upon the Altar where they had facrificed, there fuldenly role out of the Embers of the Riods or Barks which they had burnt, a great bright flame, which amazed all the other Ladies. Howbeit the Vestall Nose willed Terenris (Cicero's wife) to go straight unto her Husband, and to bid him not to be atraid telescence that boldly which he had confidered of, for the benefit of the Commonwealth, and that this godders had raised this great flame, to thew him that he should have great honour by doing of it. Terentia, that was no timorens nor faint hearted Woman, but wery ambitious, and furthermore had gotten more knowledge from her Husband of the Affairs of the State, then otherwise she had acquainted him with her housewifery in the house, as Cicero himfelf reporteth, the went to make report thereof uncohim, and prayed him to do execution of those men. The like did Quintus Cierro his Brother, and also Publius Migidius his friend and cllow Sudent with him in Philosophy , and whose counsell also Cieers followed much in the Government of Syllams fee, the Commonwealth. The next morning the matter being propounded to the Arbitrement of the Screace, how these Maletactors should be punished, Systems being asked his opinion sire, sad, they should be pur in person, and from thence to fuffer execution. Otherwisewrife that followed were all of that mind, but Cains Cafer, that afterwards came to be Dictator, and was then but young man, and began to come forward, but yet furth 2 one, 25 by his behaviour and the hope he hid, took such a course, that afterwards he brought the Commonweakh of Rome into an absolute Monar-Cafar privy to thy. For at that time Cierro had vehement sufpitions of Cafar but no apparent proof to convince him.

Catilities con. And some say, that is was brought so near, as he was almost convicted, but yet faved himself. O. thers write to the contrary, that Cierrs winingly differabled, that he either heard or knew any figns which were told him against Cafar, being arraid indeed of his friends and estimation. For it was a clear case, that if they had accuted Cesar with the reft, he undoubtedly had sooner saved all their lives then he should have lost his own. Now when Cefar came to deliver his opinion touching the punishment of the Prisoners, he strood up and faid, that he did not think it good to put them to death, but to confilcate their Goods; and as for hereir Persons, that they should bestour them in Prison, some in one place, some in another, in such Citigraf IT ALY as pleased Citers best, untillthe War of Cariline were ended. This sentence being very mild, and the Author thereof marvellous Eloquent to make it good. Cierro himself added thereunto a counterpoile, inclining unto either of both the opinions, partly allowing the first, and partly also the opinion of Cefer. His friends thinking that Cefer's 0soulbitatofsparsion was the inicht for Cicero, because thereby he should deserveles blane for that he had not put the Prisoners to death, they followed rather the second. Whereupon Syllams also recented that he had spoken, and expounded his opinion, saying, that when they spake he should be put to death, it meant nothing to, but thought the last punishment a Senator of Roma could have, was the Prilon. But the first that conversed this opinion, was Cantus Lastadus; and after him Care, who with veheurest words enforced Cofars Sulpition, and furthermore filled all the Senate with wrath and outrage : fo that even upon the inftant it was decreed by most voices, that they should suffer death. But Cafar stept up again, and spake against the confiscation of their goods, misliking that they should reject the gentlest part of his opinion, and that contrariwise they should stick unto the feverest onely: howbeit because the greatest number prevailed against him, he called the Tribunes to aid him, to the end they should withstand it; but they would give no ear unto him. Cicera thereupon yielding of himself, did remit the confiscation of their goods, and went with the Senate to fetch the Prisoners, who were not all in one house, but every Prætor had one of them. So he went first to take C. Lentulus, who was in the Mount Palatine, and brought him through the holy street and the Market-place, accompanied with the chiefest men of the City who compassfed him round about, and guarded his person. The People seeing that, quaked and trembled for sear. paffed by, and faid never a word : and specially the young men, who thought it had been some folemn Mystery for the health of their Countrey, that was so accompanied with the chief Magistrate, and the Noblemen of the City, with terrour and fear. So when he had passed through The execution the Market-place, and was come to the Prison, he delivered Lentulus into the hands of the hang- of the conspiman, and commanded him to do execution. Afterwards also Cethegus, and then all the rest, one rators. after another, whom he brought to the Prison himself, and caused them to be executed. Furthermore, feeing divers of their accomplices in a Troop together in the Market-place, who knew nothing what he had done, and watched onely till night were come, supposing then to take away their Companions by force from the place where they were, thinking they were yet alive, he turned unto them, and faid aloud, They lived. This is a phrase of speech which the ROMANS use some They lived, a time, when they will finely convey the hardness of the speech, to say he is dead. When night was word usurpec come, and that he was going homeward, as he came through the Market-place, the People did for the dead, wait upon him no more with filence as before, but with great cries of his praise, and clapping of hands in every place he went, and called him Saviour, and second Founder of ROME. Besides all Ciccro's praise, this, at every mans door there were Links and Torches lighted, that it was as light in the ftreets as at noon days. The very Women also did put lights out of the tops of their houses to do him honour, and also to see him so nobly brought home, with such a long train of the chiefest men of the City, (of the which many of them had ended great Wars, for the which they had triumphed, and had obtained many famous Conquests to the Empire of ROME, both by Sea and Land) confessing between themselves one to another, that the ROMANS were greatly bound to many Captains and Generals of Armies in their time, for the wonderfull riches and spoils, and encrease of their power which they had won, howbeit that they were to thank Cicero onely for their health and prefervation, having faved them from fo great and extream a danger. Not for that they thought it so wonderfull an Act to have striken dead the Enterprize of the Conspirators, and also to have punished the offenders by death: but because the conspiracy of Catiline, being so great and dangerous an infurrection as ever was any, he had quenched it and pluckt it up by the roots, with so small hurt, and without uproar, trouble, or actuall sedition. For the most part of them that were gathered together about Cataline, when they heard that Lemulus and all the reft were put to death, they prefently for fook him: and Catiline himself also fighting a Battle with them he had about him, against Antonius the other Confull with Cicero, he was flain in the Field, and Catiline flain all his Army defeated. This norwithftanding, there were many that spake ill of Civero for this Fact, in battle by and meant to make him repent it, having for their heads Cafar, (who was already chosen Practor Cafar chosen for the year to come) Metellius and Bestia, who should also be chosen Tribunes. They so soon Prezior, as they were chosen Tribunes, would not once fuffer Cicero to speak to the People, notwithstand- Metellin and ing that he was yet in Office of Confull for certain days. And furthermore, to let him that he Bestia, Trishould not speak unto the People, they did fer their benches upon the Pulpit for Orations, which bunes of the they call at ROME Rostra: and would never suffer him to set soot in it, but onely to refign his People. Office, and that done, to come down again immediately. He granted thereunto, and went up to the Circo relign-Pulpit upon that condition. So, filence being made him, he made an Oath, not like unto other eth his Office. Confuls Oaths when they refign their Office in like manner, but strange, and never heard of before, swearing that he had saved the City of Rome, and preserved all his Countrey and the Empire of Rome from utter ruine and destruction. All the people that were present confirmed it, and did Iwear the like Oath. Wherewithall Cafar and the other Tribunes his Enemies were fo offended with him, that they devised to breed him some new stir and trouble, and amongst others, they made a decree that Pompey should be fent for with his Army to bridle the Tyranny of Cicero. Cato (who at that time was also Tribune) did him great pleasure in the furtherance of the Commonwealth, opposing himfelf against all their practises, with the like authority and power that they had being a Tribune and Brother with them, and of better estimation then they. So that he did not onely easily break all their Cicero's Condevices; but also in a goodly Oration he made in a full affembly of the people, he so highly praised and sulfhip praised extolled Cicero's Confulfhip unto them, and the things he did in his Office, that they gave him by Cato the greatest honours that ever were decreed or granted unto any man living. For by decree of the Ciero the first People he was called, Father of the Countrey, as Cato himself had called him in his Oration: the man called, which Name was never given to any man, but onely unto him: and also he bare greater sway in Countrey.

ROME at that time then any man beside him. This notwithstanding, he shade himself envied and milliked of many men, not for any ill Act he did, or meant to do, but onely because he did too Gierra rea much boaft of himself. For he never was in any Affembly of People, Senate, or Judgement, but much given to

filling the Books and Works he compiled befides full of his own prairies: the which made his fweet and pleafant Stile tedious and troublesome to those that heard him, as though this misfortune ever followed him to take away his excellent grace. But now, though he had this worm of ambition, and extream covetous defire of honour in his head, yet did he not malice nor envy any Citero friendly others glory, but would very frankly praise excellent men, as well those that had been before to praife others him, as those that were in his time. And this appeareth plainly in his Writings. They have written also certain notable words he spake of some ancient men in old time, as of Aristotle, that he was like a golden flowing River: and of Plato, that if Jupiter himself would speak, he would foeak like him: and of Theophrastus, he was wont to call him his delight: and of Demossibenes Orations, when one asked him on a time which of them he liked beft: The longest, said he. There be divers Writers also, who to shew that they were great followers of Demosthenes, do follow Cicero's faying in a certain Epiftle he wrote unto one of his friends, wherein he faid, that Demosteres slept in some of his Orations: but they forgot to tell how high he praised him in that place; and that he calleth the Orations which he wrote against Antonius (in the which he took great pains, and fludied more then all the reft) PHILIPPIANS: to follow those which Demosthenes wrote against Philip King of MACEDON. Furthermore, there was not a famous man in all his time, either in Eloquence or in Learning, whose fame he hath not commended in writing, or otherwise in honourable speech of him. For he obtained of Cesar, when he had the Empire of Rous in his hands, that Cratippus the PERIPATETICK Philotopher was made Cuizen of Rome. Further, he procured that by decree of the Court of the AREO PAGITES, he was entreated to remain at ATHENS. to teach and instruct the youth there: for that he was a great Honour and Ornament unto their City. There are extant alfo of Cieero's Epiftles unto Herodes, and others unto his Son, willing him to follow Cratippus in his study and knowledge. He wrote another Letter also unto Gorgias the Rhetorician, and iorbad him his Sons company, because he understood he enticed him to drunkennes, and to other great diffionefty. Of all his Epiftles he wrote in Greek, there is but that onely written in choller, and another which he wrote unto Pelops BYZANTINE. And for that he wrote to Gorgias, he had great reason to be offended with him, and to taunt him in his Letter, because (as it feemed) he was a man of very leud life and conversation. But in contrary manner, writing as he did to Pelops, finding himself grieved with him, for that he was negligent in procuring the By ZAN-TINES to ordain fome publick honours in his behalf: that, methinks, proceeded of overmuch ambition, the which in many things made him too much forget the part of an honest man, and onely because he would be commended for his Eloquence. When he had on a time pleaded Munation Caufe before the Judges, who shortly after accused Sabinus a friend of his, it is reported, that he was so angry with him, that he told him, What Munatius, hast thou forgotten that thou wert discharged the last day of thine. Accusation, not for thine innocency, but for a Mist I cast before the Judges eyes, that made them they could not differn the fault? Another time also, having openly praised Marcus Crassus in the Pulpit, with good Audience of the People, shortly after he spake to the contrary all the evil he could of him, in the fame place. Why, how now, faid Craffus, didft thou not the felf highly praife me in this place, the laft day? I cannot deny it, faid Cieco: but indeed I took an ill matter in hand to flew mine Eloquence. Another time Graffus chanced to fay in an open Afferebly, that none of all the Craft of his house had ever lived above threescore years: and afterwards again repenting himfelt, he called it in again, and faid, Sure I know not what I did, when I faid fo. Cieero answered him again: Thou knewest well enough the People were glad to hear it, and therefore thou spakest it to please them. Another time Crassus liking the Opinion of the STOICK Philosophers, that faid, the wife man was ever rich, Cicero answered him, and bade him consider whether they meant not thereby, that the wise man had all things. Crassist coverousness was defamed of every man. Of Crassis Sons, one of them did much refense Alius, and therefore his Mother had an ill name by him: one day this Son of Crassis made an Oration before the Senate, which divers of them commended very much. So, Gieero being asked AEin Kestare how he liked it : Methinks, faid he, it is * Attins of Crassus. About this time, Crassus being Affine is a pro- ready to take his Journey into Syria, he defired to have Ciero his friend rather then his Eneper Name of a my. Therefore one picht making much of him, he sald Green that he would come and Sim per Name of a my. Therefore one night making much of him, he told Cicero that he would come and Sup Roman, and Africa with him. Cicero faid, he should be welcome. Shortly alter, some of his friends told him of fignifieth, wor- Vatinius, how he was defirous to be made friends withhim, for he was his Enemy. What, quoth Cicero, and will he come to Supper too? Thus he used Crassus. Now this Vatinius having a swola neck, one day pleading before Cicero, he called him the fwoln Orator. Another time when he heard fay that he was dead, and then that he was alive again : A vengeance on him, faid he, that preffed in any hath lyed fo shamefully. Another time when Gefar had made a Law for the dividing of the Lands of CAMPANIA unto the Souldiers, divers of the Senate were angry with him for it, and among other, Lucius Gellius (a very old man) faid, he would never grant it while he lived. Cicero pleafantly answered again, Alas, tarry a little, the good old man will not trouble you long. Another time there was one Octavist, supposed to be an * Africa w born: he when Cicero on a time pleaded a matter, faid, that he heard him not si Ciceso prefently answered him again, And yet haft thou a hole bored through thine ear. Another time Merellus Nepas told him, that he had overthrown more men by his Witness then he had saved by his Eloquence. I grant, faid Citero, for indeed I have more Faith, then Eloquence in ine. Su was there also a young man that was suspected to have poyloned his Father with a Tart, that boafted he would revile Ciciro : It had rather have that of thee, quoth Cicero, then thy Tart. Publius Sextius also having a matter before the Judges. entertained Cicero, with other of his Counfellors: but yet he would speak all himself, and give none of the Orators leave to fay any thing. In the end, when they faw plainly that the Judges would difcharge him, being ready to give fentence, Cicero faid unto him, beffir thee hardly to day, for to morrow Sextim thou shalt be a private man. Another, one Publim Cotta, who would fain have been thought a wife Lawyer, and yet had little wit and understanding, Cicero appealed to him as a Wirnefs in a matter; and being examined, he answered he knew nothing of it. Cicero replied to him again: Thou thinkest peradventure they ask thee touching the Law. Again, Metellus Nepos, in a certain disputation he had with Cicero, did many times repeat, Who is thy Father? Cicero answered him again: Thy Mother hath made this question harder for thee to answer. This Nepos Mother was reported to be a light housewife, and he as subtle witted and unconstant. For he being Tribune, left in a jear the exercise of his Office, and went into Syria to Pompey upon no occasion: and as fondly again he returned thence upon a fudden. His School-master Philager also being dead, he buried him very honeftly, and fet a Crow of Stone upon the top of his Tomb. Cicero feeing it, told him, Thou haft done very wifely: for thy mafter hath taught thee rather to fly, then to fpeak. Another time Appins Clodius pleading a matter, said in his Preamble, that his friend had earneftly requested him Approximately requested him to employ all his knowledge, diligence, and faith upon this matter. O gods, faid Cicero, and haft thou shewed thy felf so hard-hearted to thy friend, as to perform nothing of all that he requested thee? Now to use these fine taunts and girds to his Enemies, it was a part of a good Orator: but fo commonly to gird every man to make the People laugh, that wan him great ill-will of many, as shall appear by some examples I will tell you. Marcus Aquinius had two Sons-in-law, who were both banished : Cicero therefore called him Adrastus. Lucius Cotta by chance also was Cenfor at that time, when Cicero fued to be Conful: and following his fuit at the day of Election, he was athirft, and was driven to drink. But while he drank, all his friends ftood about him. and after he had drunk, he faid unto them: It is well done of ye (faid he) to be airaid left the Cenfor should be angry with me because I drink Water: for it was reported the Censor loved Wine well. Another time Cicero meeting one Voconius, with three foul Daughters of his with him . he cryed out aloud:

It was thought in ROME that Marcin Gellin was not born of free Parents by Father and Mother. who reading certain Letters one day in the Senate very loud : Cicero faid unto them that were about him. Wonder not at him, quoth he, for this man hath been a Cryer in his days. Fauftus, the Sonne of Sylla Dictatour at Rome, which fet up Bills Out lawing divers Romans, making it lawfull for any man to kill them without danger where they found them, this man after he had spent the most part of his Fathers Goods, was so fore in debt, that he was driven to fell his houshold Stuff, by Bills fet up on every Post. Cicero when he saw them, Yea marry, said he, these Bills please me better. then those which his Father set up. These taunts and common quips without purpose, made divers men to malice him. The great ill-will that Clodius bore him, began upon this occasion. Clodius was The malice beof noble house, a young man, and very wild and insolent: he being in love with Pompesa Casars twix: Cicro Wife, found the means fecretly to get into Cafars house, apparelled like a young singing Wench and Glodius. because on that day the Ladies of Rome did solemnly celebrate a secret Sacrifice in Casars house, which, is not lawfull for men to be present at. So there was no man there but Clodius, who thought he should not have been known, because he was but a young man, without any hair on his face, and that by this means he might come to Pompeia amongst the other Women. He being gotten into this great house by night, not knowing the Rooms and Chambers in it, there was one of Casars Mothers Maids of her Chamber, called Aurelia, who feeing him wandring up and down the house in this fort, asked him what he was, and how they called him. So being forced to answer, he faid he fought for Aura, one of Pompeia's Maids. The Maid perceived straight it was no Womans voice, and therewithall gave a great shriek, and called the other Women, the which did fee the Gates fast shut, and then sought every corner up and down, so that at length they sound him in the Maids Chamber with whom he came in. His offence was straight blown abroad in the City, whereupon Casar put his Wife away: and one of the Tribunes also accused Clodius. and burdened him that he had prophaned the holy Ceremonies of the Sacrifices. Cicero at that time was yet his friend, being one that had very friendly done for him at all times, and had ever accompanied him to guard him, if any man would have offered him injury in the bufie time of the conspiracy of Catiline. Clodius stoutly denied the matter he was burdened with, and said that he was not in Rome at that time, but far from thence. Howbeit Cicero gave evidence against cicero gave ehim, and deposed, that the self same day he came home to his house unto him, to speak with vidence against him about certain matters. This indeed was true, though it feemeth Cicero gave not this evidence for much for the truthes fake, as to please his Wife Terenia: for the hated Codius to the death, because of his Sifter Clodia that would have married Cicero, and did secretly practise the marriage by one Tullius, who was ficero's very friend; and because he repaired very often to this Clodia that dwelt hard by Cicero, Terentia began to suspect him, Terentia being a cruel Woman, and wearing her Husbands Breeches, allured Cicero to fet upon Clodius in his adverfity, and to Witness against him, as many other honest men of the City also did: Some that he was perjured, others that he committed a thousand lewd parts, that he bribed the People with Money, that he had enticed and deflowred many Women. Luculus also brought forth certain Maidens, which deposed that Clodins had deflowred the youngest of his own Sisters, she being in the house with him, and married. And there went a great rumour alfo, that he knew his two other Sifters, of the which the one was called * Terentia, and married unto King Marrius: and the other Clodia, whom Metellus Celer had married, and whom they commonly called Quadrantaria: because one of her Paramours sent her a Purse full of Quadrines (which are little pieces of Copper Money) inflead of Silver. Clodius was flandered more by her, then with any of the other two. Notwithstanding, the People were very much offended with them that gave evidence against him, and accused him. The Judges being atraid of it, got a great number of armed men about them, at the day of his Judgement, for the fafety of their Perfons : and in the Tables where they wrote their Sentences, their Letters for the most part were confusedly fer down. This notwithstanding, it was found that he was quit by the greatest number : and it is reported also that some of them were close filted. Catalus therefore meeting with some of them going home, after they had given their fentence, told them: Surely ye had good reason to be well guarded for your safety, for you were afraid your Money should have been taken from you, which you took for Bribes. And Gicero faid unto Clodius, who reproved him that his Witnels was not true he gave against him: Clean contrary, quoth Cieero, for five and twenty of the Judgeshave believed me, being fo many that have condemned thee; and the thirty would not believe thee, for they would not quit thee before they had fingred Money. Notwithstanding in this judgement Cefar never gave evidence against casus words they had integred money. Informationing in this paragraphic casus gave evacute against of the parting Clodius: and faid moreover, that he did not think his Wife had committed any adultery: howbeit away his Wife that he had put her away, because he would that Cefar's Wife should not onely be clean from any Pempeia.

Pife and G4- common People by deviling of new Laws which he preferred for their benefit and commodity: to both the Confuls he granted great and large Provinces: unto Pife, MACEDON, and to Gabinius, Syria. He made also many poor men free Citizens, and had alwaies about him a great number of Slaves armed. At that present time there were three notable men in ROMB, which three of the made much both of the one and the other: the third was Cefar, who was prepared for his Journey greated men in into GAUL with an Army. Cieero did lean unto him, (though he knew him no faft friend of his, and that he miltrusted him for matters past in Carilines conspiracy) and prayed him that he might go to the Wars with him, as one of his Lieutenants. Cafar granted him. Thereupon Clodina perceiving that by this means he got him out of the danger of his Office of Tribunefhip for that year, he made fair weather with him (as though he meant to reconcile himfelf unto him) and told him that he had cause rather to think ill of Terenia, for that he had done against him, then of himfelf: and always spake very courteously of him as occasion fell out, and faid, he did think nothing in him, neither had any malice to him, howbeit it did a little grieve him, that being a friend, he was offered unkindnels by a friend, These sweet words made Cicero no more afraid, fo that he gave up his Lieutenancy unto Cefar, and began again to plead as he did before. Cefar took this in fuch disdain, that he heartned Clodius the more against him, and besides, made Poma pey his Enemy. And Cefar himself also said before all the People, that he thought Cieero had put Lennulus, Cerbegus, and the reft unjustly to death, and contrary to Law, without lawfull trial Giero accessed and condemnation. And this was the fault for the which Cicero was openly accused. Thereupon Ciero feeing himfelf accused for this Fact, he changed his usuall Gown he wore, and put on a mourning Gown: and so suffering his beard and hair of his head to grow without any combing, he went in this humble manner, and fixed to the People, But Cledius was ever about him in every place and freet he went, having a fight of Rascals and Knaves with him, that shamefully mocked him for that he had changed his Gown and Countenance in that fort, and oftentimes they cast The Knights of dirt and stones at him, breaking his talk and requests he made unto the People. This notwith-Rome and Se standing, all the Knights of Rome did in manner change their Gowns with him for company; nate changed and of them there were commonly twenty thouland young Gentlemen of noble houles which follows for ments for the many their areas and were faiters to the People for him. Furthermore, ed him with their hair about their ears, and were fuiters to the People for him. Furthermore, the Senate affembled to decree that the People should mourn in Blacks, as in a common calamity: but the Confuls were against it. And Clodim on the other side was with a band of armed men about the Senate, fo that many of the Senators ran out of the Senate, crying and tearing their cloaths for forrow. Howbeit, these men seeing all that, were nothing the more moved with pity and shame, but either Cicero must needs absent himself, or else determine to fight with Clo diss. Then went Cicero to entreat Pompey to sid him, but he absented himself of purpose out of the City, because he would not be entreated, and lay: at one of his houses in the Countrey, near unto the City of Alba. So he first of all fent Pife his Son-in-law unto him to entreat him, and afterwards went himself in Person to him. But Pompley being told that he was come, had not the heart to fuffer him to come to him, to look him in the face : for he had been past all shame to have Pomery would refused the request of so worthy a man, who had before shewed him such pleasure, and also done not be Gireo. not tee cuero and faid fo many things in his favour. Howbeit Pompey being the Son-in-law to Cefar, did unfortunately (at his request) forfake him at his need, unto whom he was bound for fo many infi-

nice pleafures, as he had received of him afore: and therefore when he heard fay he came to him. he went out at his back-gate, and would not speak with him. So Cicero seeing himself betrayed of him, and now having no other refuge to whom he might repair unto, he put himfelf into the hands of the two Confuls. Of them two, Gabinius was ever cruell and churlish unto him. but Pife on the other fide spake always very courteously unto him, and prayed him to absent himselt for a time, and to give place a little to Clodius fury, and patiently to bear the change of the time. For in so doing, he might come again another time to be the preserver of his Countrey, which was now for his fake in tumult and fedition. Cicero upon this answer of the Conful, confulted with his friends; among the which Luculius gave him advice to tarry and faid that he should be the stronger. But all the rest were of contrary opinion, and would have him to get him away with speed, for the People would shortly wish for him again, when they had once been beaten with Cloding fury and folly. Cicero liked best to follow this counsel. Whereupon having had a Statue of Minerva along time in his house, the which he greatly reverenced, he carried her himself, and gave her to the Capitoll, with this inscription: Unto Mi- Cicero's Exile nerva Protettor of ROME. So his friends having given him fafe conduct, he went out of ROME about midnight, and took his way through the Countrey of Luke by Land, meaning to go into SICILE. When it was known in Rome that he was fled, Cloding did presently banish him by decree of the People, and caused Bills of inhibition to be set up, that no man should fecretly receive him within five hundred miles compass of ITALY. Howbeit, divers men reverencing Cicero, made no reckoning of that inhibition : but when they had used him with all manner of courtefie possible, they did conduct him besides at his departure, saving one City onely in Luke, called at that time HIPPONIUM, and now VIBONE : where a SICILIAN cal- Hibbonium tel Vibins (unto whom Ciecro before had done many pleasures, and specially among others, had alias Vibons, a made him Master of the Works in the year that he was Consul) would not once receive City in Luce. bim imo his house, but promised him he would appoint him a place in the Country that he might go unto. And Cains Virgilius also, at that time Prætor and Governour of Sicile, who before had shewed himself his very great friend, wrote then unto him, that he should not come near unto Sicile. This grieved him to the heart. Thereupon he went directly unto the City of BRUNDUSIUM, and there imbarked to pals over the Sea unto DYRRACHIUM, and at the first Awondershew. had wind as will, but when he was in the main Sea, the wind turned, and brought him back inhiserile. again to the place from whence he came. But after that he hoifed fail again; and the report went. Cicero's faintthat at his arrival at DYRRACHIUM when he took Land, the Earth shook under him, and heart in his the Sea gave back together: whereby the Soothfayers interpreted, that his exile should not be exile. long, because both the one and the other was a token of change. Yet Cicero, norwithstanding that many men came to fee him for the good will they barehim, and that the Cities of GREECE contended who should most honour him, he was always sad, and could not be merry, but cast his eyes full towards ITALY, as passionate Lovers do towards the Women they love : shewing himself faint-hearted, and took this adversity more basely then was looked for of one so well studied and learned as he. And yet he oftentimes prayed his friends, not to call him Orator, but rather Philosopher: faving, that Philosophy was his chiefest Profession, and that for his Eloquence he did not use it, but as a necessary instrument to one that pleadeth in the Commonwealth. But glory and opinion hath great power to take mans reason from him, even like a The wondercolour, from the minds of, them that are common Pleaders in matters of State, and to make full power of them feel the felf-fame pathions that common People do, by daily frequenting their company. Glory, unless they take great heed of them, and that they come to practife in the Commonwealth with this resolute mind, to have to do with the like matters that the common People have, but not to entangle themselves with the like passions and moods, by the which their matters do rise. Now Cledius was not contented that he had banished Cicere out of ITALY, but further, he burnt all his houses in the Countrey, and his house also in Rome standing in the Market-place, of the which he built a Temple of Liberry, and caused his Goods to be fold by the Cryer: so that the Cryer was occupied all day long crying the Goods to be fold, and no man offered to buy any of them. The chiefest men of the City beginning to be afraid of the violent parts, and having the common People at his Commandment, whom he had made very bold and infolent, he began to inveigh against Pompey, and spake ill of his doings in the time of his Wars, the which every man elfe but himself did commend. Pompey then was very angry with himself that he had so Pompey the forfaken Cicero, and repented him of it, and by his friends procured all the means he could to ing mind doth call him home again from his banishment, Clodius was against it all he could. The Senate not-fayour Cicero, withflanding with one full confent ordained, that nothing should be established for the Com-Lentus Con-monwealth, before Cicero's banishment were first repealed. Lenulus was at that time Conful, ful. and there grew such an uproar and stir upon it, that some of the Tribunes were hurt in the Market-place, and Quintus Cicero (the Brother of Cicero) was beaten down and hidden under the dead bodies. Then the People began to change their minds. And Annius Milo, one of the Tribunes, was the first man that durst venture upon Cloubes, and bring him by force to be tried before the Judges. Pompey himself also having gotten a great number of men about him, as well of the City of Rome as of other Towns adjoyning to it, being strongly guarded with them, he came out of his house, and compelled Cledius to get him out of the Market-place, and then called the People to give their voices for the calling home again of Cicero. Cicero's Integrity for the

the People never passed thing with so great good-will, nor so wholly together, as the return of Cicero. And the Senate for their parts allo, in the behalf of Cicero, ordained, that the Cities which had honoured and received Cieero in his exile, should be greatly commended: and that his houses which Clodius had overthrown and razed, should be re-edified at the charge of the Commonwealth. So Cicero returned the fixteenth Moneth after his banishment, and the Towns and Cities he came by, (hewed themselves so joyfull of his return, that all manner of men went to meet and honour him, with fo great love and affection , that Cicero's report thereof afterwards came indeed short of the very truth as it was. For he said, that ITALY brought him into ROME upon their shoulders. Informuch as Craffiu himself, who before his banishment was his Enemy, went then with very good will unto him, and became his friend, faying: That he did it for the love of his Son, who loved Cicero with all his heart. Now Cicero being returned, he found a time Citero taketh when Clodius was out of the City, and went with a good company of his friends unto the Capiway the Tatoll, and there took away the Tables, and brake them, in the which Clodiss had written all his bles of Glestin Acts that he had passed and done in the time of his Tribuneship. Clodises would afterwards have accufed Cierro for it: But Cierro answered him, that he was not lawfully created Tribune, because he was of the PATRICIANS, and therefore all that he had done in his Tribunethip was void, and of none effect. Therewith Caro was offended, and spake against him, not for that he liked of Clodius doings, (but to the contrary, uterly milliked all that he did) but because he thought it out of all reason, that the Senate thould cancell all those things which he had done and pailed in his Tribuneship, and specially, because amongst the rest, that was there which he himself had done in the Isle of CYPRUS, and in the City of BYZANTIUM. Hereupon there grew some frangeness betwirt Cicero and Cato, the which notwithflanding broke not out to open enmity, but onely to an abstinence of their wonted familiarity, and access one to another. Shortly after, Milo flew Clodins. Milo being accused of murther, prayed Cicero to plead his cause. The Senate fearing that this Accusation of Mile, (who was a hardyman, and of quality besides) would move fome fedition and uproar in the City, they gave Commission to Pompey to fee justice executed as well in this cause as in other offences, that the City might be quiet, and judgment also executed with fafety. Thereupon Pompey the night before took the highest places of the Marker-place, by his Souldiers that were armed, whom he placed thereabout. Milo fearing that Cicere would be afraid to fee such a number of harnessed men about him, being no usuall matter, and that it might peradventure hinder him to plead his cause well, he prayed him he would come betimes in the morning in his Litter into the Market-place, and there to flay the coming of the Judges, till the place were full. For Cicero was not onely fearfull in Wars, but timerous also in pleading. For indeed he never began to speak, but it was in fear; and when his Eloquence was come to the best proof and perfection, he never left his trembling and timerounces. Infomuch that pleading a cafe for Matine Murena (accused by Cate) striving to excell Hortenssius, whose pleading was very well thought of, he took no rest all night, and what through watching and the trouble of his mind, he was not very well, fo that he was not fo well liked for his pleading as Hortensius. So, going to defend Mile's caule, when he came out of his Litter, and saw Pompey let aloft as if it had been in a Camp, and the Market-place compassed about with armed men, glistering in every corner, it so amazed him, that he could scan fashion himfelf to speak, all the parts of him did so quake and tremble, and his voice could not come to him. But Milo on the other fide flood boldly by himfelf, without any fear at all of the judgement of his cause, neither did he let his hair grow, as other men accused did: neither did he wear any mourning Gown, the which was (as it feemed) one of the chiefest causes that condemned him. Yet many held opinion that this timorousness of Cierre came rather of the good will he bore unto his friends, then of any cowardly mind of himfelf. He was also Citers cholen one of the Priefts of the Soothfayers, which they call Augures, in the room of Publius Crassus the younger, who was slain in the Realm of PARTHIA. Asterwards, the Province of CILICIA being appointed to him, with an Army of twelve thousand Footmen, and two thouland and five hundred Horlemen, he took the Sea to go thither. So when he was arrived there, he brought Cappadocia again into the subjection and obedience of King Arisberzants, according to his Commission and Commandment given by the Senate: moreover, both there and elfewhere he took as excellent good order as could be devifed, in reducing of things to quienels without Wars. Furthermore, finding that the CILICIANS were grown fomewhat from and unruly, by the overthrow the ROMANS had of the PARTHIANS, and by reason of the rising and rebellion in Syria, he brought them unto reason by gentle perswasions : and never received Gifts that were fent him, no not from Kings and Princes. Furthermore, he did disburden the Provinces of the Feats and Banquets they were wont to make other Governours before the Provinces of the real and Dangues 127 the company of good and Learned-men at his him. He would courteoully receive all them that came to falure and vifit him. Further they report of him, that he never caused man to be beaten with rods, nor to tear his own Garments. In his anger he never reviled any man, neither did spitefully see Fine upon any mans head. Finding many things also belonging to the Commonwealth, which private men had from and embezeled to their own use, he restored again unto the Cities, whereby they grew very rich and wealthy: and yet did fave their honour and credit that had taken them away, and didthem no other hurr, but onely constrained them to restore that which was the Come monwealths. He made a little War also and drave away the Thieves that kept about the Mounty Mon Among monweating. Fit made a manual factor of the which exploit his Souldiers called him Imperator, to fay, thief Captain Citero called in About that time there was an Orator called Cacilian, who wrote auto him from Rome, to pray Imperator. him to fend him fome Leopards or Panthers out of SILICIA, because he would shew the People fome patime with them. Cicero-boatting of his doings, wrote, the him again, that there were no more Leopards in SILICIA; but that they were all fled into CARIA for anger, that feeing all things quiet in SILICIA, they had leiture now to hunt them. So when he returned towards ROME, from the charge of his Government, he came by RHODES, and stayed a tew days at A-THENS with great delight, to remember how pleasantly he lived there before, at what time he fludied there. Thither came to him the chiefest Learned men of the City, and his friends also, with whom he was acquainted at his first being there. In fine, having received all the bosourable entertainment in GREECE that could be, he returned unto Rome, where at his arrival he found great factions kindled, the which men faw plainly would grow in the end to civil War. Thereupon the Senare having decreed that he should enter in Triumph into the City, he answered, that he would rather (all parties agreed) follow Cafar's Coach in Triumph. So he travelled very garneftly between Pompey and Cafar, eftloons writing unto Cafar, and also speaking unto Pompey that was Given seeken present, seeking all the means he could, to take up the quarrell and misliking betwire them two to pacific the But it was fo impossible a matter, that there was no speech of agreement would take place. So Pomes quarrel bepey hearing that Cafar was not far from ROME, he durft no longer abide in ROME, but fled with twist Pompey divers of the greatest men in Rome. Cicero would not follow him when he fled, and therefore and Cafar. men thought he would take part with Cefar: but this is certain, that he was in a marvellous perplexity, and could not eafily determine what way to take. Whereupon he wrote in his Epiffies'; What way should I take? Pompay had the juster and honester cause of War, but Casar can bester. execute, and provide for himself and his friends with better lafety: fo that I have means eriough to Cicero's words fly, but none to whom I might repair. In all this flir, there was one of Cefar's friends called of Pompey and Trebatine, which wrote a Letter unto Cicere, and told him that Cafar wished him in any cafe to come to him, and to run with him the hope and fortune he undetrook : but if he excufed himself by his age, that then he should get him into GREACE, and there to be quiet from them bothy Giero marvelling that (solor wrote not to him himfelf, allowered in anger, that he involved on and thing unworthy of his acts all the days of his life thinberto : and to this effect he wrote in his Letters! Now Cafar being gone into SPAIN, Cicero imbarked prefently to go to Pempey fo when he Cicero goeth came unto him, every man was very glad of his coming, but Cate. Howbeit (an icorethy ress unto Pampe), laying whap for himlels he had been without all bonethy as that sime to have forfaken that part the which he had always taken and followed from the beginning of his first practise in the Commonwealth; bin for him, on the other file, that it had been better for the fafery of his Countrey, and chiefly for all his friends, that he had been a notice to both, and he to have taken things as they had fallen out : and that he had no manner of reason nor infrant cause to make him to become Cafar's Enemy, and by coming thinher to pur himfelf into logreat peril. These persuasions of Case overthrew all Cicero's purpose and determination, besides that: Famps, himself did not employ him in any matter of service or importance. But hereof himself was more in fault then Pompey, because he confessed openly that indid repent him he wascome thither. Fires thermore, he scorned and distanced all Papper's perpurations and counsels, the which indeed made him to be had in jeatouse and sufpicion. Also the would ever be steering and gibing at those that took Pemperspart, though he had no lift himself to be merry. He would also go up and down the Camp very fad and beavy, but yet he wouldt ever have one jeast or other to make men laugh abhough they had as little luft; to be merry as helicand furely, it shall do no burt to call fome of then to mind in this place. When Cierre came to BRUNDUSIUM, he stayed there a certain time for Cafar's coming, who came but flowly, by reason of his troubles he had in Asia, and also in &-GYPT. Howbeit news was brought at length that Cafar was arrived at TAREN YUM, and that he came by Land unto BRUNDUS 1UM: Gieere departed thence to go meet him, not militrufting that Gafar would not pardon him, but rather being ashamed to come to his Enemy being a Conqueror, before such a number of men as he had about him. Yet he was not forced to do or speak any thing unformly to his calling : for Cofar. feeing him coming towards him far before the reft that came with him, he lighted from his horfe and embraced him, and walked a great way on foot with him, fill talking with him onely; and ever after he did him great honour, and made much of him. In-Comuch as Cierre having written a Book in praise of Cate, Cefar on the other fide wrote another, and praifed the Eloquence and Life of Cieers, matching it with the Life of Pericles, and Theramines, Gierro's Book was intituled Cato, and Cafar's Book called Anticato, as much to fay, against Cato, They say further, that Quintur Ligarius being accused to have been in the Field against Casar, Cisere took upon him to defend his cause: and that Cafer faid unto his friends about him, What hurt is it for us to hear Cefar fpeak, whom we have not heard of long time? for otherwise Ligarius (in my opinion) standeth already a condemned man, for I know him to be a valiant man, and mine E-The force of nemy. But when Cicero had begun his Oration, he moved Cafer marvelloully, he had so sweet Giere's Elo- 2 grace, and fuch force in his words, that it is reported Cefar changed colour often, and shewed quence, how it plainly by his countenance, that there was a marvellous alteration in all the parts of him. For, in altered Gafar the end when the Orator came to touch the Battle of Phansalta, then was Cafar to troubled, that his Body shook withall, and besides, certain Books he had sell out of his hands, and he was driven against his will to fet Ligarian at liberty. Afterwards, when the Commonwealth of ROME erme to be a Kingdom, Cicero leaving to practife any more in the State, he gave himself to read and fo they were. For Green Sind, that by that courtefie in fetting up of Rompey's Statues again, the did ethablish his own. So Green being determined to write all the Rom Ann Miltory, and to mindle with it many of the Gabetans. doings, adding thereunto all the fables and devices which they Chee did put do write and regions, he was hindred of his purpose against his will, by many open and private troubles away his Wife that came upon him at once : whereof notwithstanding he himself was cause of the most of them. For first of all, he did pur away his Wife Tereinia, because the had made but finall account of him in all the Wars; so that he departed from Roma having no necessary thing with him to entertain him out of his Country; and yet when he came back again; into ITALY, the never thewes any spark of love or good will towards him. For the never came to Brundusium to him, where he remained a long time; and worfe then that, his Daughter having the heart to take fo long a Journey in hand to go to him, theneither gave her company to conduct her, nor Money, nor other farming convenient for her, but so handled the matter, that Gierry at his return to Rome found bare walls in his bouse and nothing in it, and yet greatly brought in debt befides. And these were the bonest causes alledged for their Divorce. But besides that Torestia denied all these, Gieero himself Citero married gave her a good occasion to clear her felf, because he shortly stars married a young Maid, being ayong Mai: fallen in fancy with her (as Terentia faid) for her beauty 1:00, 30 Tyre his fervant wrote, for her riches, to the end that with her Goods he might pay his Detas, ther the was very rich, and Citer al-fo was appointed her Guardian, the being left Sole-Heir. Now, because the ought a marrellous tun-

of money. his parents and friends did counsel him to marry this young maiden, notwithstanding he was too old for her, because that with her goods he might fatisfie his creditors. But Antonius speaking of this marriage of Cicero, in his answers and Orations he made against the PHILIPPIANS, he doth reprove him for that he put away his wife, with whom he was grown old; being merry with him by the way, for that he had been an idle man, and never went from the fmoak of his Chimney, nor had been abroad in the Wars in any service of his Countrey or Commonwealth. Shortly after that he had married his fecond wife, his daughter died in labour of child, in Lentulus house, whose second wife she was, being before married unto Pifo, who was her first husband. So the Philosophers and learned men came of all fides to comfort him: but he took her death fo forrowfully, that he put away his fecond wife, because he thought she did rejoyce at the death of his daughter. And thus much touching the state and troubles of his house. Now touching the conspiracy against Cafar, he was not made privy Cicero not to it. although he was one of Brutus greatest friends, and that it grieved him to fee things in that state made privy to they were brought unto, and albeit also he wished for the times past, as much as any other man did, the conspiracy But indeed the confpirators were afraid of his nature, that lacked hardinels: and of his age, the which against Cafar. often times maketh the floutest and most hardiest natures faint-hearted and cowardly. Notwithflanding, the conspiracy being executed by Brutus and Cassius, Casar's friends being gathered together every man was afraid that the City would again fall into civil wars. And Antonius alfo. who was Conful at that time, did affemble the Senate, and made some speech and motion then to draw things again unto quietness. But Cicero having used divers perswasions fit for the time, in the end he moved the Senate to decree (following the example of the ATHENIANS) a generall oblivion of things done against Cafar, and to assign unto Brutus and Cassius some governments of Provinces. Howbeit nothing was concluded : for the people of themselves were forry, when they saw Casar's body brought through the Market-place. And when Amonius also did shew them his Gown all bebloodied, cut, and thrust through with swords, then they were like mad men for anger, and sought up and down the Market-place if they could meet with any of them that had flain him: and taking firebrands in their hands, they ran to their houses to fet them on fire. But the conspirators having prevented this danger, faved themselves: and fearing that if they tarried at Rome, they should have many fuch alarms, they for fook the City. Then Antonius began to look aloft, and became fearfull to all men, as though he meant to make himself King: but yet most of all unto Cicero above all o- Private grudge thers. For Antonius perceiving that Cicero began again to encrease in credit and authority, and know- betwist Antoing that he was Brutus very friend, he did millike to fee him come near him; and befides there was miss and Citero at that time some jealousie betwixt them, for the diversity and difference of their manners and dispofitions. Cicero being afraid of this, was first of all in mind to go with Dolabella to his Province of Sy-RIA, as one of his Lieutenants. But they that were appointed to be Confuls the next year following after Antonius, two noble Citizens, and Cicero's great friends, Hircius and Panfa, they entreated him not to forfake them, understanding that they would pluck down this over-great power of Antonises, so he would remain with them. But Cicero, neither believing nor altogether mistrusting them, forfook Dolabella, and promifed Hircian and Panfa, that he would spend the Summer at ATHENS, and that he would return again to ROME fo foon as they were entred into their Conful-Thip. With this determination Cicero took the fea alone, to go into GREECE. But as it chanceth Cicero faileth often times, there was some let that kept him he could not fail, and news came to him daily from into Greese. ROME (as the manner is) that Antonius was wonderfully changed, and that now he did nothing any more without the authority and confent of the Senate, and that there lacked nothing but his perfon to make all things well. Then Cicero condemning his dastardly fear, returned forthwith to Rome, not being deceived in his first hope. For there came such a number of people out to meet him, that he could do nothing all day long but take them by the hands, and embrace them, who to honour him, came to meet him at the Gate of the City, as also by the way to bring him to his house. The next morning Antonius affembled the Senate, and called for Cicero by name. Cicero refused to go, and kept his bed, faining that he was weary with his journey and pains he had taken the day before: but indeed the cause why he went not, was, for fear and suspition of an amoust that was laid for him by the way, if he had gone, as he was informed by one of his very good friends. Antonius was marvelloufly offended that they did wrongfully accuse him, for laying any ambush for him: and therefore fent fouldiers to his house, and commanded them to bring him by force, or else to set his house on fire: After that time, Cicero and he were always at jar, but yet coldly enough, Ill will betwine one of them taking heed of another: untill that young Cafar returning from the City of APOL- Citero and An-LONIA, came as lawfull heir unto Julius Cafar Dictator, and had contention with Antonius for the tonius. fum of two thousand and five hundred Myriades, the which Antonius kept in his hands of his fathers goods. Thereupon Philip who had married the mother of this young Cafar, and Marcel-Odivine Cafar has who had also married his fifter, went with young Cesar unto Cierro, and there agreed toge-joyned in ther, that Cierro should help young Cesar with the savour of his authority and eloquence, as friendship. well towards the Senate, as also to the people: and that Cafar in recompence of his good will should fland by Cicero, with his money and fouldiers : for this young Cafar had many of his fathers Souldiers about him, that had served under him. Now there was another cause that made Gicero glad to embrace the friendship of this young Cafar, and that was this. Whilest Pompey and Julius Cefor were alive and in good cafe, Gieror dreamed one night that the Senators fons were called into a circumstance of Carino and the Capitol, because Impirer had appointed to shew them him that one day should come to be Lord dopped fon of ward lines. and King of Rome, and that the ROMANS being defirous to see who it should be, ran all unto the Fulius Cafar.

Temple: and that all the children likewife were waiting there in their goodly garded Gowns of purple, untill that fuddenly the doors of the Temple were open ; and then that all the children arose one after another, and went and passed by the image of Jupiter, who looked upon them all, and sent them away discontented, saving this young Cesar, unto whom he put forth his hand as he passed by, and faid: My Lords of Rome, this child is he that shall end all your civil wars, when he cometh to be Lord of ROME. Some fay, that Cicero had this vision in his dream, and that he carried in good memory the look of this child, howbeit that he knew him not : and that the next morning he went of purpose into the field of Mars, where these young boys did exercise themselves, who, when he came thither, had broken up from playing, and were going home; and that amongst them he first faw him whom he had dreamed of, and knew him very well, and musting at him the more, asked him whose fon he was. The boy answered, that he was the fon of one Octavius (a man otherwise of no great calling) and of Accia, the fifter of Julius Cafar: who having no child, he made him his heir by his last will and testament, and less him all his lands and goods. After that time, it is reported, that Civiss Cajar.
Officials Cafar cero wasvery glad to ipeak to him when he met withhim, and that the boy also liked Cicero's friendwas born in the ship, and making much of him : for by good hap the boy was born the same year that Gieero was Conyear of Gierro's full. And these be the reasons alledged, why Gierro did favour this young Cesar. But in truth, first of Consulting, all the errest malice the bare unto Antonius. and secondly his nature that was ambitious of bonour were all the great malice he bare unto Antonius, and secondly his nature that was ambitious of bonour, were (in my opinion) the chiefeft causes why he became young Cefar's friend: knowing that the force and power of his fouldiers would greatly strengthen his authority and countenance in managing the affairs of the state; besides that the young man could flatter him so well, that he called him father. But Brutus being offended with him for it, in his Epistles he wrote unto Atticus he sharply reproveth Cicero, faying, that for fear of Antonius he flattered this young Cafar: whereby it appeared, he did not fo much feek for the liberty of ROME, ashe did procure himself a loving and gentle mafter. This notwithstanding Brutus brought with him Cicero's fon that studied Philosophy at ATHENS, and gave him charge of men under him, and employed him in great affairs, wherein he shewed himself Chero's great very forward and valiant. Now Cicero's authority and power grew again to be as great in ROME, power at Rome. as ever it was before. For he did what he thought good, and fo vexed Anonim, that he drave him out of the City, and fent the two Confuls Hircius and Panfa against him, to fight with him: and caused the Senate also to decree, that young Cesar should have Sergeants to carry Rods and Axes before him, and all other furniture for a Prator, as a man that fighteth for his Countrey. After that Antonius had lost the battle, and that both the Confuls were slain, both the Armies came unto Cafar. The Senate then being afraid of this young man that had fo great good fortune, they practifed by honours and gifts to call the Armies from him, which he had about him, and fo to minish the greatness of his power: saying, that their Countrey now stood in no need of force nor fear of detence, fith her enemy Antonius was fled and gone. Cafar fearing this, fent men fecretly unto Cicero, to pray him to procure that they two together might be chosen Consuls, and that when they should be in office, he should do and appoint what he thought good, having the young man at his commandment, who defired no more but the honour onely of the name. Cefar himself consessed asterwards, that being afraid he should have been utterly cast away, to have been left alone he finely ferved his turn by Cicero's ambition, having perswaded him to require the Consulship through the help and affiftance that he would give him. But there was Cicero finely colted, as old as he was, by a young man, when he was contented to fue for the Confulship in his behalf, and to make the Senate agreeable to it: wherefore his friends presently reproved him for it, and shortly after he perceived he had undone himself, and together also lost the liberty of his Countrey. For this young man Ottavisus Cafar being grown to be very great by his means and procurement, when he faw Offevine Cafer that he had the Confulship upon him, he forfook Cicero, and agreed with Antonius and Lepidus. Then joyning his Army with theirs, he divided the Empire of ROME with them, as if it had been lands left in common between them: and besides that, there was a bill made of two hundred men and upwards; whom they had appointed to be flain. But the greatest difficulty and difference that fell out between them, was about the out-lawing of Cicero. For Antonius would hearken to no peace between them, unless Cicero were flain first of all : Lepidus was also in the same mind with Antoof the 1tium- nine: but Cefar was against them both. Their meeting was by the City of BOLONIA, where they viti, Antendas, continued three days together, they three onely fectedly confulling in a place environed about Lepidas, Olds with a little liver. Some for that Cafes thick hard with Cicero the two first days, but at the third with a little River. Some fay that Cefar fluck hard with Cicero the two first days, but at the third Giero appoint, that he yielded and for fook him. The exchange they agreed upon between them, was this, Cefar et to be flain. for fook fieero: Lepidus, his own brother Parties and agreed upon between them, was this, Cefar forfook Cicero: Lepidus, his own brother Paulus; and Antonius, Lucius Cefar his Uncle by the mothers fide. Such place took wrath in them, as they regarded no kindred nor blood: and to speak more properly, they shewed that no brute or savage beaft is so cruel as man, if with his licentiousness he have liberty to execute his will. While these matters were a brewing, Cicero was at a house of his in the Countrey, by the City of Thus Culum, having at home with him also his brother Q Cicero. News being brought them thither of these proscriptions of out-lawries, appointing men to be slain, they determined to go to ASTYRA , a place by the fea fide where Cicero had another house, there to take fea, and from thence to go into MACEDON unto Brutus. For there ran a rumor that Brutus was very strong, and had a great power. So they caused themselves to be conveyed thither in two Litters, both of them being so weak with forrow and grief, that they could not otherwise have gone their ways. As they were on their way, both the Litters going as near to each other as they could, they bewailed their miferable estate : but Quint m chiefly, who took it most grievoully. For, remembring that he took no money with him when he came from his house, and that Cicero his brother also had very little for himself, he thought it best that Cicero should hold on his journey, whileft he himfelf made an errand home to fetch fuch things as he lacked, and fo to make hafte again to overtake his brother. They both thought it best so, and then tenderly embracing one another, the tears falling from their eyes, they took leave of each other. Within few days after, Quintus Cicero being betrayed by his own servants, unto them that made search for him, he was cruelly flain, and his fon with him. But Marcus Tullius Cicero being called into As TYRA, and there Quintus Cicero finding a ship ready, imbarked immediately, and sailed along the coast unto Mount Circe, having a sain, good gale of wind. There the Mariners determining forthwith to make sail again, he came as shore, either for fear of the fea, or for that he had fome hope that Cafar had not altogether for laken him: and therewithall returning towards ROME by land, he had gone about an hundred furlongs thence. But then being at a straight how to resolve, and studdenly changing his mind, he would needs be carried back again to the fea, where he continued all night marvellous forrowfull, and full of thoughts. For one while he was in the mind to go fecretly unto Octaviu: Cafar's house, and to kill himself by the hearth of his Chimney, to make the furies of hell to revenge his blood : but being afraid to be intercepted by the way, and cruelly handled, he returned from that determination. Then falling into other unadviled determinations, being perplexed as he was, he put himself again into his fervants hands, to be conveyed by fea unto another place called * CAPITES. There he had a very * Some do read proper pleasant Summer house, where the North winds, called Etesia, do give a trim fresh air Caieta. in the Summer season. In that place also there is a little Temple dedicated unto Apollo, not far from the sea side. From thence there came a great shole of Crows, making a marvellous noise, that came flying toward Cicero's fhip, which rowed upon the shore. This shole of Crows came and lighted upon the yard of their fail, some crying, and some pecking the cords with their bills: so that every man judged ftraight, that this was a fign of ill luck at hand. Circero notwithstanding this amount of the standard of th most part of these Crows came and lighted upon the Chamber window where he lay, making a Crows unto wonderfull great noise: and some of them got unto Cicero's bed where he lay, the cloaths being cast Cicero. over his head, and they never left him, till by little and little they had with their bills pluckt off the cloathes that covered his face. His men feeing that, and faying to themselves that they were too vile beafts, if they would tarry to fee their mafter flain before their eyes (confidering that bruit beafts had care to fave his life, feeing him to unworthily entreated) and that they should not do the best they could to save his life: partly by entreaty, and partly by force, they put him again into his Litter to carry him to the fea. But in the mean time came the murtherers appointed to kill him, Herennim a Centurion, and Popilim Lana, Tribune of the fouldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thousand men, whole cause Cicero had once pleaded before the Judges, when he was accused for the murther of his Herennius and own father) having fouldiers attending upon them. So Cicero's gate being thut, they entred the Popilins fent to house by force, and missing him, they asked them of the house what was become of him. They an-Iwered they could not tell. Howbeit, there was a young boy in the house called Philologia, a flave 70. enfranchised by Quintus Cicero, whom Tullius Cicero had brought up in the Latine tongue, and had taught him the liberal Sciences: he told this Herennius that his servants carried him in a Litter towards the lea, through dark narrow lanes, shadowed with wood on either fide. Popilius the Colonel taking fome fouldiers with him, ran about on the outfide of the lanes to take him at his coming out of them: and Herennius on the other fide entred the lanes. Cicero hearing him coming, commanded his men to fet down his Litter, and taking his beard in his left hand, as his manner was, he froutly looked the murtherers in the faces, his head and beard being all white, and his face lean and wrinckled, for the extream forrows he had taken : divers of them that were by, held their hands before their eyes, M. T. Cictro whilft Herennius did cruelly murther him. So Cicero being threefcore and four years of age, thrust flain by Herenhis neck out of the Litter and had his head cut off by Antonius commandment, and his hands al-To, which wrote the Orations (called the Philippians) against him. For so did Cleero call the Orations he wrote against him, for the malice he bare him: and they do yet continue the same name untill this present time. When these poor dismembred members were brought to Rome, Antonius by chance was bufily occupied at that time about the election of certain Officers; who when the heard of them and faw them, he cryed our aloud, that now all his Outlawries and profectiptions of write the cryed our aloud, that now all his Outlawries and profectiptions of the cryed our aloud, that now all his Outlawries and profectiptions of the cryed our aloud, that now all his outlawries and profectiptions of the cryed our aloud, that now all his outlawries and profectiptions of the cryed our aloud, the head of all Amiritation and the cryed our aloud the head of the cryed our aloud the cryed ou were executed; and thereupon commanded his head and his hands should straight be fetup over the Pulpit for Orapulpit for Orations, in the place called Rostra. manners.

His is as much as we could gather by our knowledge touching the notable Adi and Deeds worthy of memory, written of Gieero and Demosithenes. Furthermore, leaving the comparison aside of the difference of their eloquence in their more, leaving the comparison aside of the difference of their eloquence in their Orations, methinks I may fay thus much of them: That Demofitienes did wholly employ all his wit and learning (natural or artificial) unto the Art of Rhetorick; and that in force and vertue of eloquence he did excell all the Orators in his time : and for gravity and magnificent stile, all those that onely write for shew or oftentation: and for sharpness and Art, all the Sophisters, and Masters of Rhetorick. And that Gieero was a man generally learned in all Sciences, and that had fludied divers books as appeareth plainly by the fundry books of Philosophy of his own making, written after the manner of the Academick Philosophers. Furthermore, they may fee in his Orations be wrote in certain manner of the Academica and Arabet Market Cought occasions in his by-talk to show men that he was excellently well learned. Furthermore, by their phrases a man may discert some spark of their manners and conditions. For Demostherns phrase hath no manner of finencis, jefts, nor grace in it, but is allogether grave and harth; and not onely smelleth of the lamp, as Pythias said when he mocked him, but sheweth a great drinker of water, extream pains, and therewith also a sharp and sowre nature. But Civers oftentimes fell from pleafant taunts unto plain fourrillity, and turning all his pleadings of matters of importance to sport and laughter, having a grace in it, many times he did forget the comelines that became a man of his calling. As in his Oration for Calins, where he faith, It is no marvel if in fo great abundance of wealth and finencis he gave himfelf a little to take his pleasure : and that it was a folly not to tile pleasures lawfull and tolerable, fith the famoulest Philosophers that ever were did place the chief felicity of man, to be in pleasure. And it is reported also that Marcus (ato having accused Mura-116, Cicero being Conful, delended his cause, and in his Oration pleasantly girded all the sect of the Stoick Philosophers for Cato's fake, for the strange opinions they held, which they call Paradoxes: in for much as bemade all the people and Judges also fall on laughing a good. And Cate himfelfalfo fmiling a little faid unto them that fate by him: What a laughing and mocking Conful have we, my Lords? But letting that pafs, it feemeth that Cieero was of a pleafant and merry nature: for his face shewed ever great life and mirth in it. Whereas in Demosthenes countenance on the other side, they might discens marvellous diligence and care, and a pensive man, never weary with pain: infomuch that his enemies Desoftbener

(as he reporteth himfelf) called him a perverte and froward man. Furthermore, in their writings is difficult to thindels to the cerned, that the one speaketh modefully in his own praise, so as no man can justly be offended with him: Giero too fall and yet not always, but when necessity enforceth him for some matter of great importance, but otherof oftension. wife very differeet, and modest to speak of himself. Citero in contrary manner, using too often repetition of one felf thing in all his Orations, shewed an extream ambition of glory, when inceffantly he Let frear and sheild give place to Gown, And give the tongue the Lawrel Crown.

How fenfes and arts do a. gree and differ

HO light likened Arts to our Senies, feemeth to have respected especially that one property of them both, in receiving objects of contrary quality: for, in the use and end of filtir operation, there is great difference. The Senies reteive indifference. rently, without diffretion and judgement, white and black, foreer and fowre, foft and hard : for their office is onely to admit their feveral objects, and to carry and refer the judgement thereof to the common lende. But Arts being the perirection of Reason, receive and allow those things onely which make for their operation, regarding and etherwing the contractis. The one chiefly, and or the other by way, and with intent to avoid them. So Physick dealeth with Difeates, Musick with Diffcords, to theend to remove them, and work their contraries. And the great Ladies of all other Arts, Temperance, Justice, and Wildom, do not onely confider honesty, uprightness, and profit: but examine withall, the nature and effects of lewdness, corruption and damage. And innocency, which vaunteth her want of experience in undue practife, men call simplicity, and ignorance of sings that be necessary and good to be known. And therefore the ancient LACEDEMONIANS in their The manner of folemn feafts forced their Itotis the bondmen, to overcharge themselves with Wine; and such The manner of toleran teaths forced their 110155 the bondamen, to overcharge themselves with Wishe; and such the spartant of they shewed them unto their youth, by their apparent beaffliness of drunken then, to work in them an abborring so loathsome vice. two Sons by his wife Seratonice, the daughten of Confesto, the one of them he named Demetrius. and the other Philip after his fathers hand, militus far the milit writers do agree; howbeit fome hold reninge, spinion, that Demetrius was not the Son of ed migorius; but his Nephew. But because his father died leaving him a child, and that his mother was ftraight married again unto Antigonus, thereupon came the reportulat he was Antigonal long Howloever it was, Philip, that was not much younger then Demerring died. Now for Demerring though he was a nerry big man, he was nothing to high as The death of his father, this ver fo passing and wonderfull fair, that no Painter could possibly draw his picture Philip the and counterfeir to his likeness. For they faur a sweet countenance, mixed with a kind of gravity in younger bo his face, a fear with courtefies and incomparable Princely Majefty, accompanied with a lively spirit ther of Demcthis face, a rear-with counterty and marmers were futh, that they were both fearfull, and pleasant into men Demorrhis that frequented him. For as he was most pleasant in company having leifure, and most given to banquetting, pleasant life, and more wantonly given to follow lust and pleasure, then any King that e- Demetring ver was: fo was he always wery carefull and diligent in dispatching matters of importance. And manners. therefore he marvelloully commended, and also endeavoured to follow Deenyfus (as much to fay, as Bacchus) above all the other gods, as he that had been a wife and valiant Captain in war, and that in peace invented and used all the pleasure that might be. He marvellously loved and reverenced his father, and it feemeth that the dutifulness be shewed unto his mother, was more to discharge the due Demetrius love Obedience and duty of a fon, then otherwise to entertain his father, for fear of his power, or to his father, hope to be his heir. And for proof hereof we read, that one day as he came home from hunting, he went unto his father Anrigonus, giving andience to certain Ambassadors; and after he had done his duev to him, and kiffed him, he fate down by him even as he came from hunting, having his darts in his hand; which he carried our a hunting with him. Then Antigonia calling the Ambaffadors alond to they went their way, having received their answer : My Lords, said he, you shall carry home this report of my fon and me, be witneffes I pray you, how we live one with another. As meaning to thew thereby that the agreement betwirt the tather and the fon together, is a great fafety to the affairs of a King, as also a manifest proof of his greatness to jealous is a King to have a compani. A King can a. on, besides the liate and mistrust it should breed. So that the greatest Prince and most ancientest of bide no equal. all the forceffors of Alexander; boatted, that he stood not in fear of his fon, but did fuffer him to fit by him; having a dart in his hand. So was this house onely of all other the MACEDONIAN Kings, leaft defiled with fuch villany, many forcessions after : and to confess a troth, in all Antigonus race there was not one but Philip onely, that flew his own Son. But we may have many examples of The sport of divers other houses of Kings, that have put their fons, wives, and mothers to death : and for their the East Kings brethren, it was an ordinary thing with them to kill them, and never fluck at it. For like as Geome-own children, there would have men grant them certain propolitions which they suppose, without proof: even wives, and mo-To was this holden for a general rule, to kill their brethren, for the lafety of their eftate. But fur- thers. Ther, to thew you more plainly that Demetrine was of a noble and courteous nature, and that he Demetrius dearly loved his friends, we may alledge this example. Mithridates the fon of Ariobarzanes, was courtefie. his familiar friend and companion (for they were both in manner of an age) and he commonly followed Antigonal Court, and never practifed any villany or treason to him, neither was he thought Tuch a man : yet Anisgonia did Somewhar suspect him, because of a dream he had. He thought that being in a goodly great field, he lowed of the ferapings of gold, and that of that feed, first of all came up goodly wheat which had ears of gold : howbeit thortly after returning that way again. The found northing but the ftraw; and the cars of the wheat out off; and that he being very angry and Forry for it; forme told him, that Michridates had cut off these golden ears, and had carried them with him into the Realm of PONT. Antigonia being marvelloully troubled with this dream, after he Titl made his fon fwear unto him that he would make no man alive privy to that he would tell him. he told him all his dream what he had dreamed, and therewith that he was determined to put this yoing man Milbridates to death. Demersion was marvellously forry for it, and therefore the next morning, this young noble Prince going as he was wont; to pale the time away with Mitbridates, be durft not by word of mouth utter that he knew, because of his oath : howbeit, taking him afide from his other familiars when they were both together by themselves, he wrote on the ground with the thd of his dart, Mithridates looking on him ? Fly Mithridates. Mithridates found ftraight what he Demetrius faintenti, and field the very fame night into CAP PADOCIA; and shortly after it was his destiny to fulfill ved Mibrida-"Millional dream." For he conquered many goodly Countries, and it was he onely that established to life. the four of the Kingdom of Pont, the which the Romans afterwards overthrew, about the Kingdom of Pont, which the Romans afterwards overthrew, about the Kingdom of Pont. eighth fucceffien. By thele examples we may easily conjecture the good nature and courtefie of Deme- *Because he Trisis. For like as the Elements (according to Empedocles opinion) are ever at * ftrife together, but faid, that love specially those that are nearest each to other : even so, though all the successors of Alexander were at and discord continual Wars together, yet was it soonest kindled, and most cruell between them which bordered efficient causes mearest unto each other, and that by being near neighbours had alwaies occasion of brawl together, of generation as fell out at that time between Antigonia and Prolomy. This Antigonia lay most commonly in the and corruption Country of Prix or A : who having intelligence that Prolomy was gone into Cyprus, and that he of all things. over-ran all STRTA; winning by force, or fair means, all the Towns and Cities subject unto Enmity behim, he fent his fon Demerrias thinher, being at that time but two and twenty years of age; and twist Antigo-'it was the first time that ever he took charge, as General to his father, in matters of great amport Democratic Ge-fance. But he being a young man, and that field no skill of Wars, fighting a battle with an old foul neral to Antidier (trained up in the discipline of Wars under Alexander the Great, and that through him, and gonas against

Now Demetrine took not this overhow like a young man though it was his first fouldier-fare : but like an old and grife Gapusio, that had abidden many overthrows, he used great diligence to gather men again, to make newsolermours, and to keep the Citites and Countries in his hands under obedience, and did train; and tracrefic his fundings in arms, whom he had gathered together. Antigemes having news of the openhabow of his fon Demetria, whom he had gathered together. Antigemes having news of the openhabow of his fon Demetria, and that afterwards he should fight faid no more, but that Ptolomy had overcome heardless men; and that afterwards he should fight with bearded men. Bur now, because hie would not discourage his son altogether, who staved leave once again to fight a battle with Piolomy, the granted him. 1: So, thotaly after came Citter; Prolomer Generall, with a great puillant Army, to drive him altogether out of Syrain : for they made no great account of Demetrius , because he had once been overthrown before. Howbeit Demetring, Dometriar vi- ftole upon him, gave him charge on the fudden, and made him to afraid, that he took both the there of Pulse Camp and the General, with leventhouland priloners befoles, and wanta marvellous treasure of money : which made him a glad man, not fo much for the gain he thould have by it, as for the opportunity he had thereby to come out of Prolomy's debt ; nothing regarding the treasure nor the honour helad gotten by this victory, but onely the benefit of his requitat of Prolomy's courtefe towards him. But yet he did nothing of his own head, before he had written to his father; and then receiving full grant and committion from him to dispose of all things as be, thought good, he sent back Cilles unto Prolomy, and all his other friends befides, with great and rich gifts which he bountfully bestowed on them. This missortune and overthrow did unterly put Pselomy out of all Syria, and brought Antigonus also from the City of CELENES, for the exceeding joy he had of this victory, as allo for the great defire he had to fee his fon. After that he fent Demerrins into ARABIA, against unto Ptolomy. a people called the NABATHENIANS, to conquer them the but there he was in great, danger and diffrels in the deferts for lack of water, howbeit he never shewed any fign that he was afraid Thereby he fo aftonied the barbarous people, that the had leifure enough to retire with fafety, and Demotrius inyaded Arabia. with a great booty of a thouland Camels, which he brought away with hum. About that time Selences (whom Antigonus hads driven from Barr 100 N) returning thisher again, he came and conquered it without other aid then of himfelf: and were with a great Army against the People and Nations coafitting upon the Indias, and the Provinces adjoying unto mount Gaucajus, 10 conquer them, Thereupon Demetrius hoping to find MESOPOTAMIA without any guard or defence, fuddenly paffed over the River of Euphrates, and came unlooked for unto Basylon, and there diffred the Garrison of Seleucus, that kept one of the Cattles or Citadelsofinibe City, being two of them; and then putting in feven thousand souldiers to keep shiem, he commanded the rest of his mento go what they could, and to bring it away with them. After that he marched towards the feator reun home, leaving thereby the Realm and Kingdom of Selences in better flate, and fatery, then it was when he invaded it. For it appeared that he had taken all the Country from Sciences, leaving him nothing in it, by spoiling and forraging all that was there. At this return home, news was brought him that Prolony lay at the fiege of the City of HALICARNASSUS; whereupon he drew thinker with speed to make him raife the siege, and thereby saved the City from him. Now because by this Antigonus and exploit they wan great fame, both of them (Antigonus and Demetrius) fell into a marvellous delire Demeritus do to, fet all Greece at liberty, the which Prolomy and Caffender kept in fervitude and bondage. Negrotout to fet of King took in hand a more honourable, nor juster Way and enterprise, then that was. For, what power or riches he could gather together, in opporching of the barbarous people; he bestowed it all in power or riches he could gather together, in opprefling of the barbarous people; he bestowed it all in refloring the GRECIAN'S to their liberty; and onely to win fame and honour by it. So, they being in confultation what way to take, to bring their purpole and defire to pals, and having taken order to begin first at ATHENS, one of Anigona chiefest friends about him, told him, that he should take the City, and place a good Garrison there for themselves, if they could once win it: for (laidbe) it will be a good bridge, to pais further into all GREECE. , Assignmer would not bear ken to that, but faid, that the love and good will of men was a furer bridge, and that the City of ATHENS was as a Beacon to all the land, the which would immediately make his doings thine through the world, as a Creffet light, upon the top of a keep or waith-tower. Thus Demetrism holled fail, having five thousand filver talents, and a Fleet of two hundred and fifty fail, and failed towards the City of ATHENS : in the which Demetrica PHALERIAN was Governour in the behalf of Politrian, Go- Caffander, and kept a strong Garrison where within the Haven and Castle of Mungenta. He had an excellent good wind to further his journey, fo that with this good forelight and, fpeed he made, he arrived in the Haven of PIREA, the five and weentieth day of the moneth Thangalian (now called May) before any man knew of his coming. Now when this Fleet was within a kenning of the City, and lefs, that they might eafily fee them from thence, every man prepared bimiled to receive them, taking them to be Protomies ships. But in fine, the Captains and Governours understanding 100 late who they were, did what they could to help themselves; but they were all in hurly burly, $ men compelled to fight out of order, to keep their engages from landing, and to repute them, comin so suddenly upon them. Demetrins having found the bar of the Haven open launched in presently. Then being come to the view of them all, and standing upon the hatches of his Galley, he made figns with his hand, that he prayed filence. The tumult being pacified, he proclaimed aloud by one of his Heraulds, that his father had fent him in a happy hour to deliver the ATHENI-ANS from all their Garrisons, and to restore them again to their ancient liberty and freedom, to Demetrius reenjoy their laws and ancient government of their foreignhers. After the proclamation made, all the floreth the A. emoy their laws and anterior government government and their feet, to clap their hands their liberty with great shouts of joy: praying him to land, and calling him aloud, their Saviour and benefactor. Now for them that were with Demetrius PHALERIAN, they all thought good to let the treat of peace. Demetrius received them very courteoully, and fent with them for pledge. one of MEGARA, within the which Cassander also kept a strong Garrison. Demetrine busily following these matters, was advertised that Cratesipolis, sirnamed Polyperchon (who had been Alexanders wife) a Lady of paffing fame and beauty, and lay at that time in the City of PATRAS, would be glad to fee him, he leaving his Army within the Territory of the MEGARIANS, took his journey presently unto her, with a few of his lightest armed men, and yet he stole from them, and made his Tent to be fet up a good way from them, because this Lady might not be seen, when she came unto him. Some of his enemies having present intelligence thereof, came and set upon him before he knew it. Deme-gain unto ATHENS, and laid fiege to the Caltle of Muny CHIA, the which he took, and drave out the Garrison, and afterwards razed it to the ground. After that, through the entreaty and earnest defire of the ATHENIANS, who prayed him to come and refresh himself in their City, he made his entry into it, and caused all the people to affemble, and then restored unto them their ancient Demetrius re-which they gave him. For first of all, they called Antigonus and Demetrius Kings, who before that by the Athense time had always refused the name, and the which (among all other princely honours and prerogatives and granted) they that had divided between them the Empire of Philip and Alexander, durft never once prefume to challenge nor to take upon them. So unto them onely they gave the file and names of the gods faviours, and took away their yearly Major, whom they called Eponymes, because they did them the years of old time by the names of them that had been Majors. Furthermore, in stead thereof they ordained in the Council of the City, that there should yearly be chosen one by voices of the people, whom they should name the Priest of their faviours, whose name they should write and

Subscribe in all publick grams and covenants, to shew the year: and besides all this, that they should cause their pictures to be drawn in the weil or holy banner, in the which were set out the images of their gods, the Patrons and Protectors of their City. And furthermore they did confecrate the place where Demetrius first came out of his Coach, and there did see up an Altar, and called it Demetrius the Government of the Commonwealth of ATHENS, flood more in fear of the people of A-THENS, then of his enemies. Therefore Demetrius regarding the fame and vertue of the man, Demetrius And caused him to be conveyed (according to his desire) unto THEBES, with good and sufficient safe conduct. And for Demetriss himself, although he was very desirous to see the City, he said he would reth Demetriss not come into it, before he had first restored it unto her ancient liberty and freedom, and also driven Phalerian.

After that the City of MEGARA was taken and wan from Cassan Demetriat winder's men, where Demetricus fouldiers would have facked all : howbeit the ATHENIANS made hum- neth the City ble intercession for them, that they might not be spoiled. The boldness of Stratocles Athenian.

Altar coming out of his Coach ; and unto their tribes they added two other, the ANTIGONIDES, and the DEMETEIADES. Their great Council at large, which they created yearly of five hundred men. was then first of all brought unto fix hundred, because every tribe must needs furnish of themselves fifty Counsellours. But yet the strangest act, and most new-found invention of flattery, was that of Stratocles (being the common flatterer and people-pleaser) who put forth this decree, by the which it was ordained: That those whom the Commonwealth should send unto Antigonus and Demerrius, should inftead of Ambaffadors be called Theori, as much to fay, as, Minifters of the Sacrifices. For fo were they called, when they fent to Delphos to Apollo Pythias, or unto Elide to Jupiter Olympias, at the common and folemn feafts of all GREECE, to do the ordinary facrifices and oblations for the health and preservation of the Cities. This Stratocles in all things else was a desperate man, and one that had always led a wicked and diffolute life: and for his shameless boldness, he seemed wholly to defend the Reps of Cleons tool-hardiness and old infolency, which (when he lived) he shewed unto the people. He openly kept a harlot in his house, called Phylacion. One day she having bought for his supper, Stratelles cruel beafts leads and necks commonly eaten, he faid unto her: Why, how now ? thou half bought me acates which we tofs like balls, that have to do in the Commonwealth. Another time when the Army of the ATHENIANS was overthrown by fea, by the Isle of AMORGOS, he would needs prevent the news of this overthrow, and came through the freet of Ceranicus crowned with Garlands of flowers, as if the ATHENIANS had won the battle : and was also the author of a decree whereby they did sacrifice unto the gods, to give them thanks for the victory; and meat was given amongst every tribe, in token of common joy. But thortly after the messengers arrived, which brought report of the shipwrack and overthrow. The people were in an uproar withall, and fent for Stratocles in a marvellous rage. But he with a face of brais came unto them, and arrogantly defended the peoples ill will, and angrily told them : well, and what hurt have I done you, if I have made you merry thefe two days? Such was Stratocles impudency and raftnels. But, as the Poet Aristophanes faith :

But hotter matters were that time in hand, Then fire that wasteth both by sea and land.

For there was another that passed Stratocles in knavery, who procured a decree, that as often as Demetriss came into the City of ATHENS, he should be received with all ceremonies and like solemnity, as they use in the feasts of Ceres and Bacchu: and further, that they should give unto him that did excell all the rest in sumptuousnels and riches at such time as Demetrius made his entry into the City, so much money out of the common treature as thould ferve to make an image or other offering, which should be confectated to the Temples in memory of his liberality. And last of all, they changed the The moneth of name of the moneth Munichion (to wit, the moneth of January) and called it Demetrion: and the last Manythin al-day of the moneth, which they called before, The new and old Moon, they then called it the Demetered, and called the District of the Moon tered, and cal-ted Demetrion triade: and the feafts of Bacchus also, called then Dionysia, they presently named Demetria, But for the honour the gods by divers figus and tokens shewed plainly, that they were offended with these changes and alterations. For the holy banner: in the which (according to the order fet down) they had painted Antigains and Demetries, with the pictures of Jupiter and Minerva, as-they carried it a procession through the Street Ceranics, it was torn afunder in the midft by a tempeft of wind. And furthermore, about the Altars which were fet up in the honour of Demetrius and Antigonus, there grew a great deal Hemlock, the of Hemlock, the which otherwife was unpossible to grow there. On the feast day also of Bacchas, of Hemock, the which otherwise was algorithms by were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for that day, it was such an extrean bard frost out they were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for that day, it was such as few with the just they were compelled to leave the few fell such a mil.dew and great frost upon it, that not onely their Vines with the fell such as they were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for that day, it was such as few and they were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for that day, it was such as few and they were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for that day, it was such as few and they were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for that day, it was such as few and they were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for that day, it was such as few and they were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for that day, it was such as few and they were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for that day, it was such as few and they were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for that day, it was such as few and they were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for that day, it was such as few and they were compelled to leave the pomp or procedion for the pomp of the pom win the juice of all feason: and besides, there fell such a mil-dew and great frost upon it, that not onely their Vines polfoned often- and Olives were killed with it, but also the most part of the Wheat blades which were newly sprung up, ders at Athens. And therefore the Poet Philippides (an enemy of the forefaid Stratocles) in one of his Comedies Philippides the Writeth certain verses against him to this effect :

The party for whose wickedness the weil was rent in twain, Which wish the honour due to God did wor hip men most vain, Is be for whom our budding Vines were blasted with the frost, Those things and not our Comedies have us so dearly cost.

This Philippides was very well beloved of King Lysimachus, informed that for his fake the King had done many pleasures to the Commonwealth of ATHENS. For he loved him so dearly, that as of ten as he faw him, or niet with him at the beginning of any war, or matter of great importance, he was of opinion that he brought him good luck. For indeed he did not for much efteen him for the excellency of his art, but he wasmuch more to be beloved and efteemed for his vertuous and honel, conditions. He was no troublefome man, neither was he infected with the finencis of Courts, as he shewed one day when the King made much of him, and giving him good countenance, faid unto Philippates no him: What wilt thou have me give thee of my things Philippides? Even what it shall please thee, O table nower King, fo it be none of thy fecrets. Thus much we thought good to fpeak of him in by-talk, because the first the first three fi unto King Ly- an honeft Player of Comedies should match with a shamelels and impudent Orator of the people, But yet there was another Demselides, of the village of Spharagus, that dreamed out a more this fecreu.

But yet there was another Demselides, of the village of Spharagus, that dreamed out a more firange kind of honour, touching the confecration of their Taygesta, which they dedicated to the Temple of Apollo in Dalphos, that is to fay, that they should go and ask the Oracle of Demetrial. But I will shew you the very effect and form of the law, as it was fet down. In good hour, the production of the law, as it was fet down. In good hour, the production of the law, as it was fet down. the people ordain that he should be chosen one of the Citizens of ATHENS, which shall go unto our faviour : and after that he hath done due facrificeunto him, he shall ask Demetrins our faviour. after what fort the people shall with greatest holiness and devotion, without delay, make confectation of their holieft gifts and offerings: and according to the Oracle it shall please him to give them, the people shall duly execute it. Thus laying upon Demetrins all these foolish mockeries, who besides was no great wile man, they made him a very fool. Demetrius being at that time at leifure in ATHENS, Demetrius marwas no great whe man, my man the married a widdow called Eurydice, which came of that noble and ancient house of Militades, and ried unto Europe had been married before unto one Ophelias Prince of the CYRENIANS, and after his death returned a- dice at Atheres gain to ATHENS. The ATHENIANS were very glad of this marriage, and thought it the greatest honour came to their City, supposing he had done it for their fakes. Howbeit he was soon won to be Demetrius had married, for he had many wives, but amongst them all he loved Phila best, and gave her most honour many wives roand preheminence above them all, partly for the respect of her father Antipater; and also for that she phila Demohad been first married unto Craterus, whom the MACEDONIANS loved best when he lived, and most triss wife Anlamented after his death above all the other successors of Alexander. His father, I suppose, made him tipaters daughto marry her by force, although indeed her years was not meet for him: for was marvellous young, tet, and Craznaud file very old. And when Demerrius feemed not to be contented withall, his father rounded him The judgement

But so much did Demetrius honour his wife Phila, and all his other wives he married, that he was not ashamed to keep a number of Curtizans, and other mens wives besides: so that he onely of all other Kings in his time, was most detected with this vice of letchery. While these things passed on in this fort, he was commanded by his father to fight with Ptolomy for the Realm of Cyprus. So there was no remedy but he must needs obey him, although otherwise he was very forry to leave the War he had begun, to fet the GRECIANS at liberty, the which had been far more honourable and famous. Howbeit, beforehe departed from ATHENS, he fent unto Cleonides Ptolomy's General, that kept the Cities of CORINTH and SICYONE, to offer him money if he would fet their Cities at liberty. But Cleonides would not be dealt withall that way. Thereupon Demetrius straightway took sea, and failed with all his Army towards Cy PRUS, where at his first coming he overcame Menelaus Ptolomy's brother. But shortly after, Ptolomy went thither in person with a great Army both by sea and land, and there paffed betwirt them fierce threatnings and proud words to each other. For Ptolomy feff to Demetrius to bid him depart if he were wife, before all his Army came together : which would tread him under their feet, and march upon his belly if he tarried their coming. Demetrius on the other fide fent him word, he would do him this favour to let him escape, if he would swear and promise unto him to withdraw his Garrisons which he had in the Cities of CORINTH and SICYONE. So the expectation of this battle made these two Princes not onely very pensive to fight one with the other, but also all the other Lords, Princes, and Kings: because the success thereof was uncertain, which of them two should prevail. But every man judged this, that which of them obtained the victory, he should not onely be Lord of the Realm of CY PRUS, and SYRIA, but therewith also of greater power then all the rest. ProBattle by sea in Demetrius on the other side prepared ten Galleys against these three- Ptolomy. fcore, thinking them enough to choak up the havens mouth being but narrow, fo that none of the Galleys that were within could come out: and furthermore, he dispersed his Army by land upon the foreland points which reach unto the fea, and went himfelf into the main fea with nine fcore Galleys, and gave fuch a fierce charge upon Prolomy, that he valiantly made him fly. Who when he faw his Army Denetring view, fled as speedily as he could with eight Galleys onely: for all the rest were either broken or Gory of Prolom funk in fight, and those eight onely escaped, besides threescore and ten which were taken, and all my. their fouldiers in them. And as for his carriage, his train, his friends, his officers and houshold fervants, his wives, his gold and filver, his armour, engines of battery, and all fuch other warlick furniture and munition as was conveyed aboard his caricts and great ships riding at Anchor: of all these things nothing escaped Demetrius hands, but all was brought into his Camp. Among those spoils things nothing eleaped Demetrius nanos, but all was brought into ins. Callip. Alliong more ipons also was taken that famous Curtizan Lamia, who at the first had her name onely for her passing play—Lamia the famous Curtizan ing upon the flute: but after the fell to Curtizan trade, her countenance and credit encreased the more taken by Deme-So that even then when her beauty through years fell to decay, and that she found Demetrius much trius, upon the younger then her felf, yet she so wan him with her sweet conversation and good grace, that he defeating of onely liked her, and all the other women liked him. After this victory by fea, Menelaus made no more Protony refiftance, but yielded up SALAMINA and his ships unto Demetrius, and put into his hands also salamina yielded up to Demetwelve hundred horsemen, and twelve thousand footmen well armed. This fo famous and trium-trius. phant victory was yet much more beautified by Demerrius great bounty and goodness, which he shewed in giving his enemies slain in battle honourable funerals, setting the prisoners at liberty without ransom paying, and giving moreover twelve hundred compleat armours unto the ATHENIA

DEMETRIUS ANS. After this Demersion fent Areftodemus MILESIAN unto his father Antigonus, totell him by word of mouth the news of this victory. Ariffodemus was the greatest flatterer in all Antigonus Court, nooriousta- who devited then (as it feemeth to me) to add unto this exploit the greatest flattery possible. For when teret in Anihe had taken land after he was was come out of the Isle of CY PRUS, he would in no wife have the ship he came in, to come near the shoar, but commanded them to ride at Anchor, and no man so hardy to leave the ship: but he himself got into a little boat, and went unto Ansigonus, who all this while was in a marvellous fear and perplexity for the fuccels of this battle, as men may eafily judge they are which hope after to great uncertainties. Now when word was brought him that Ariftodemus was coming to him all alone, then was he worfe troubled then afore, infomuch that he could frant keep within doors himself, but sent his servants and friends one after another to meet Aristodemus, to ask him 4 what news, and to bring him word prefently again how the world went. But not one of them could get any thing out of him, for he went on ftill fair and fortly with a fad countenance, and very denurely, speaking never a word. Wherefore Antigonus heart being cold in his belly, he could stay no longer, but would him go and meet with Arifodemus at the gate, who had a marvelous prace of people following of him, befides those of the Court which ran out to hear his answer. At length when he came near unto Antigonus, holding out his right, hand unto him, he cried out aloud: God fave thee, O King Antigonus: we have overcome King Ptolomy in battle by sea, and have won the Realm of Cyprus, with ixteen thousand and eight hundred prisoners. Then answered Anisonus: And God fave the too. Truly Arifodan us thou haft kept us in a trance a good while, but to punish thee for the pain thou haft put us to, thou shalt the later receive the reward of thy good The first time news. Then was the first time that the people with a loud voice called Antigonus and Demetrins Antigonus and Kings. Now for Antigonus, his friends and familiars did at that instant put on the royal band or Dia-Demetrias were dem upon his head: but for Demetrias, his father fent it unto him, and by his Letters called him King. They also that were in ÆGY PT with Prolomy, understanding that, did call and falute him by the name of King : because it should not feem that for one overthrow received, their hearts were dead. Thus this ambition by jealoufie and emulation went from man to man to all Alexanders successors. For Lysimachus then also began to wear the Diadem, and likewise Selencus, as often as he spake with the GRECIANS: for before that time, he dealt in matters with the barbarous people as a King. But Caffander, though others wrote themselves Kings, heonely subscribed after his wonted manner. Now this was not onely an encrease of a new name, or changing of apparell, but it was such an honour, as it lift up their hearts, and made them frand upon themselves : and besides, it so framed their manner Note the force of life and conversation with them, that they grew more proud and stately then ever they were before: like unto common Players of Tragedies, who apparelling themselves to play their partsupon the Stage, do change their gate, their countenance, their voice, their manner of fitting at the tale, of flattery by and their talk also. So that afterwards they grew more cruel in commanding their subjects, when they had once taken away the vizor and diffigulation of their absolute power, which before make Antigons and them far more lowly and gentle in many matters unto them. And all this came through one vile flatterer, that brought such a wonderfull change in the world. Antigonus therefore puffed up with journy against the glory of the victory of his fon Demetrine, for the conquest of Cyprus, he determined forthwith to fet upon Prolomy. Himself led the Army by land, having his son Demetrius still rowing by the Medius dream. Shore side with a great Fleet of ships. But one of his familiars called Medius, being alleep, had a vision one night that told him, what should be the end and success of this journey. He thought he saw Amigonus run with all his Army, who should have the upper hand; and that at the first he ran with great force and fwiftness, but that afterwards his strength and breath failed him so much, that when he should return, he had scant any pulse or breath, and with much ado retired again. And even so it chanced unto him. For Antigonus by land was efficient in great danger: and Demetriat alto by fea was often in hazard to leave the coast, and by storm and weather to be cast into places where was neither Haven, Creeks, nor Harbour for thips. And at length having loft a great number of his ships, he was driven to return without any attempt given. Now Antigonus was at that time little less then fourfcore years old, but yet his fat and corpulent body was more cumberson to him then his years: therefore being grown unmeet for wars, he used his son in his place. Who sor that he was fortunate, as also skillul through the experience he had gotten, did wifely govern the weightieft matters. His father befides did not pals for flis youthfull parts, lavish expences and conmon drunkennels he gave himfelf unto. For in time of peace, he was given over to all these vies: but in time of War, he was as fober and continent as any man fo born by nature. And therefore it is reported, that Lamia being manifestly known to be mistress over him, one day when he was come from hunting, he came (as his manner was) to kils his father: and that Antigonus fmiling upon him, faid: What, how now fon, doest thou think thou are kissing of Lamia? Another time Demefon Demetriat. Trias was many days together drinking and rioting, and faw not his father: and then to excuse himfelf unto him, he told him he had gotten a Rheume that made him keep his chamber, that he could not come to him. So I heard, faid Antigonus, but was it of THASOS or CHIOS that Rheume be Spake of ? because that in either of those two Islands, there were excellent good wines. Another time Demetrias fent his father word, that he was not well : thereupon Antigonus went to fee him, and coming thinher, he met a fair young boy at his door. So he went up to his chamber, and fitting down by his beds fide, he took him by the hand to feel his pulfe. Demetrist told him that his Feaver had left him but a little before. I know it well (faid Antigonus) for I met the young boy c ven at the door as I came in. So Ansigonus did gently bear with his fons faults, in respect of the many other vertues he had. The voice goeth, that the SCYTHIANS, when they are disposed to drink drunk together, do divers times twang the strings of their bows, as though that would serve to A strange cu keep the strength of their courage and hardines, which otherwise the pleasantness of the wine stome of the would take from them. But Demetrius gave himself to one thing onely at one self time: sometime to Sejthians in rake his pleasure, fometime to deal in matters of weight; and in all extremity heever used but one of nels. them, and would never mingle the one with the other: and yet this notwithstanding, he was no less politick and circumspect to prepare all manner of munition for wars. For as he was a wife Captain Demetrius a politick and circumpect to project to project to project to the politic and politic to lead an Army, fo was he also very carefull to provide all things meet for their furniture, and would skilled Captuber have too much then too little. But above all, he exceeded in fumptious building of fhips, and thin, and an army the project of the framing of all forts of engines of battery, and especially for the delight he took to invent and devise wright. them. For he had an excellent naturall wit to devife such works as are made by wit and hand, and did not befrow his wit and invention in handy-crafts, in trifling toys and bables : as many other Kings that have given themselves to play on Flutes, others to paint and draw, and others also to Turners craft. As «Егоры King of Macbon, who delighted to make fine tables and pretty lamps. And Sundrydelights Attalus, firnamed Philometor (to fay, lover of his mother) that would plant and fet Phylicall Herbs, of Pinces. as Helleborum , Lingwort , or Bears-foot , Hoscynamum , Henbane , Cicuta , Hemlock , Aconitum , Libardbain or Wolf-bain, and Dorycnium: for the which we have no English word: all these would he fet himself with his own hands in the Gardens of his own Pallace, and also gather them in time of the year, to know the vertue and power of them. Or as Arfaces the Kings of PARTHIA, that boafted they could themselves make their Arrows heads, and sharpen them. But the Artisicers works which Demetrins practifed, shewed that they came from a King. For his manner of workmanship had a certain greatness in it, the which even with the subtilty and fineness of his Demetrius works, shewed the trim handling of the workman: so that they appeared not onely worthy the works understanding and riches of a King, but also the forging and making by the hands of a great King, For his friends did not onely wonder at their greatness, but his very enemies also were delighted with the beauty of them. And this is more true then meet to be spoken: the enemies could not but marvell when they saw his Galleys rowing along the coast, with fifteen or fixteen banks of Oars: and his Engines of battery which they called Elepolis (as much to say, Engines to take Cities) were a spectacle of great admiration unto those whom he besseged, as the events following did throughly witness. For Lysmachus, who of all other Kings did malice Demetrius most, coming to raife the fiege from the City of SOLLI in CILICIA, the which Demetrius befieged, he fent unto him to pray him to let him fee his Engines of battery, and his Galleys rowing upon the fea. De- Demetrius bemetrius granting him, Lyfimachus returned with wonderfull admiration. The RHODIANS allo fieged Rhodes baving long time defended his fiege, at the laft made peace with him, and prayed him to leave forme one of his Engines with them, for a perpetuall testimony and remembrance both of his power, and also of their courage and valiantness. The cause why Demetrius made war with the RHODI-ANS, was, because they were consederates with King Ptolomy : he brought against their walls the The descriptigreatest Engine he had, the foot whereof was like a tile, more long then broad, and at the base on of Demetrion either fide it was eight and fourty cubits long, and threefcore and fix high, rifing ftill narrow as greatest eneven to the very top : fo that the upper parts were narrower then the nether, and within it were gine of battery many pretty rooms and places conveyed for fouldiers; The forepart of it was open towards the called Elepolis. enemy, and every room or partition had windows, out of which they bestowed all kind of shot, because they were full of armed men fighting with all forts of weapons. But now, because it was so well framed and counterpoited, that it gave no, way, nor reeled on either fide, which way foever the removed it, but that it flood faft and upright upon her foundation, making a terrible noise and found, that made the work as wonderfull to behold, as it was a marvellous pleature for men to fee it. In this war were brought unto Demetrius two notable armors weighing fourty pounds a piece, and made by one Zoilas an armorer, who to thew the hardiness and goodness of the tem-per, infered them to be proved and thot at, at fixfeore paces, with the Engines of their battery: and made of notaalbeit the armours were shot at and hit, yet were they never pierced, and but onely a little race or ble temper by feratch feen, as it were of a bodkin or penknife, and had no more hurt. Demetrius always wore one Zoilus an Ar of them in these wars, and Alcimus Albanian the other, the strongest and valiantest man he morer. had in all his hoaft, and that onely carried a compleat armour weighing fixfcore pounds, where all Alcinus Alother fouldiers wore none above threefcore. This Aleimon was flain at RHODES, valiantly fight-banian, wore at ing by the Theater. In this fiege the RHODIANS did valiantly defend themselves, that Dense-terius could do no act worthy memory. This notwithstanding, although he saw he could not prevail, weight. but lose his time, yet was he the more obstinately bent against them, to be even with them, because The discourtethey had taken a ship of his, in the which his wife Phila had fent unto him certain hangings of Tape- diane ftry , Linnen, Apparell , and Letters , and because they had sent them all unto Prolomy as soon as they The great had taken them. But therein they did not follow the honest courteste of the ATHENIANS, who courteste of the having intercepted certain currers of King Philips that made war against them, they opened all the Athenians unto letters they carried, and read them, faving onely his wife Olympia's letters the fent him, the which King Philip. they fent unto King Philip fealed, as they were when they received them. Now though this part did much grieve him and offend him, yet he could not find in his heart to ferve them in that fort, when he might have done it not long after. For by chance at that time Protogenes an excellent Painter, born in CAUNUS, did pains them the draught of the City of IALYSUS. Demetrins found this table in a house in the suburbs of the City, being almost ended. The RHODIAN'S thereupon fending an Herauld unto

THE NIANS came happily to ferve both their defires , who made peace between their with these conditions: that the RHODIANS should be confederates with Antigonas and Democritus against all men, but Prolomy onely. The ATHENIANS fent for Demetrius, upon Caffanders coming to lay

MOPPLES, and there overthrew him in fet barrell, and received the City of HERACLEA, which willingly yeelded unto him, and fix thou and MACEDONIAN'S that came unto him to take his part, him, to befeech him to spare the defacing of so goodly a work, he returned them answer, that he Protegenchorn would rather fuffer his fathers images to be burne, then so excellent and passing a work as that to in the City of be lost and brought to nothing. For it is reported, that Protogent was seven years drawing of Comme an exthe fame: and it is faid also that expeller bimself when he faw it, did to wonder at it, that his speech cellent painter. failed him, and he ftood mute a long time, and at last faid : Surely this is a wonderfull piece of work, Protogenes and of great labour, yet doth it want those graces and ornaments whereby those that I paint do rach unto heaven. This table afterwards being brought to Rome, and hanged up with others, greatly com- was in the end burnt by fire. Now as the RHODIANS were defirous to be rid of this war, mended by A- and that Demetrize also was willing to take an honest occasion to do it, the Ambassadours of the Apuller himself.

So in his return back, he fer all the GRECIANS at liberty on this fide the ftraight 1 he made a league with the BOROTIANS, and took the City of CENCREES, and the Caffles of PHYLE and PAN-ACTOS, in the frontiers and confines of ATTICA, in the which Caffander had left Garrisons to keep the Countrey in subjection : and after he had driven them out of the Countrey, he rendred the forts again unto the ATHENIANS. Therefore though it feemed the ATHENIANS had before bestowed to their uttermost power all kinds of honours that could be offered him, every man striving for life to prefer the fame, yet they found out new devices to flatter and please him. For they ordained that the place behind the temple of Mineros called Parthenon (as who would say, the temple of the Virgin) should be prepared for his house to lye in : and they said, that the goddes Minerva did lodge him with her. But to say truely, he was too unchast a guest, to think that a maiden goddes would be content he should lye with her. And yet his father: Anzigonsus perceiving that they had lodged his son Philip on a time in a house, where there were three young women, he said nothing to Palip himfelf, but before he fent for the Harbinger; and faid unto him: wilt thou het remove my for out of this straight lodging, and provide him of a better? And Dimetrius, that should have reverenced the goddels Minerous, though for no other respect but because he called her his eldest sister (for Demetriarwan- fo he would fhe should be called) he defiled all the Castle where was the temple of these holy virgins, with horrible and abominable infolencies, both rowards young boys of honeft houses, as also unto young wowen of the City. So that this place feemed to be most pure and holy, at fuch timess he lay with his common Curtifans, Christis, Lamia, Demo, and Anticyra. It shall not be greatly for the honour of the City of ATHERS, to tell particularly all the abominable parts he committed there. But Democles vertue and honefty deserveth worthy and condign remembrance. This De mocles was a young boy that had no hair on his face, of whose beauty Demetrins being informed by the firname he had, as commonly called through the City, Dimedia the fair, he fought direst ways to entice him, both by fair means, large promifes and gifts, and also with threats belides But when he faw no man could bring him to the bent of his bow, and that the young boy in thend feeing him fo importunate upon him, came no more to the common places of exercise, where other children uled to recreate themselver, and that to avoid the common stoves, he went to wash hingel in another fecret flowe: Demetring warthing his tinte and hour of going thither, followed and got in to him being alone. The boy feeing bimilest alone, and that he could not resist Demetri-#3, took off the cover of the Kertle or Cauldron where the water was boiling and leaping into it drowned himself. Truely he was unworthy of fo lamentable attend, but yet shewed a noble heart, worthy of his beauty and Countrey. But he did not as another called Cleanes to, the fon of Cleamedon, who brought letters from Demetrins, directed to the people, whereby through Demetrins intercession and request, his sathers sine of sifty talents in the which he was condemned and for nonpayment remained prisoner) was clearly remitted and forgiven. But by this act , he not onely shamed and dishonoured himself, but also troubled all the City. For the people thereupon released Cleamedon of his fine, but therewith they made a decree that no Citizen should dienceforth bring any more letters from Demetrius. But afterwards understanding that Demetrim was marvelloully of fended with this decree, they did not onely revoke their first decree; but they did also pur fone of them to death, which were the procurers and authors of the decree, and others also they banished. And further they made a law that the people of ATHENS frould account all religious to the gods, and just unto all men, whatsoever it pleased Demetrius to order that appoint. Ar that time there was one of the chiefest men of the City, that said Ny aroth; was a tital man to prefer such matters, indeed quoth Democharer suttained Lucowia to the were a mad man if he were otherwise; and he fpake it because this Stratecter had many great pleisfures at Demertiag! mils for this flattery. Howbeit, Demochares being accused and condemned upon these words, he was bandhed ATHENS. See the ATHENIANS how they used themselves, who Remed to be delivered from the Garriton they had before, and to be reflored with their former liberty and freedom. From thence Dametrius went into PELOPONNESUS, and never an enginy of his durit entry his coming, but all fied before him, and left him their Caftles and Towns. Thus Demetrism wan unto himself all the Country called ACTE, and all ARCHADIA, faving the City of MANTINEA : and for the fum of an hundred talents given amongst them, he delivered the Cities of ARGOS, SICYONE, and of Co-RINTH, from the Garrisons that lay amongst them. About that time fell out the great feast of Juno Demetriusman in ARCOS, called Heras. Therefore Demetrins, to honour this feast with the GRECIANS, married ried Deidamis in Arcos, called Heras. Intercept Dimetrios, wo monotoning and fifter of Pyrrhus and per. King Pyrfwaded the Sictonians, to leave their city, and to come and build in another goodly place near rous fifter, and twaded the SICYONIANS, to the same of the changed the name of the City. For in flead of Sicyon, he made it to be called DEMETRIADE. Then at a generall affem- City of Sycione bly of the flates of GREECE, which waskept in the ftraight of PELOPONNESUS, called ISTHMOS. and called it Demetrisu was chosen Lieutenant Generall of all the GRECIANS, as Philip and Alexander (both Demetriade; Kings of MACEDON) had been before him, unto whom he did not onely compare himfelf, but thought fen Generall of himself greater then they, because fortune smiled on him, and for that he had so good success in all his all Greece. affairs. Whereas Alexander did never take away the title and name of King from any other Kings, neither did ever call himself King of Kings, although he had given unto diverse of them the name and power of a King: and in contrary manner alfo, Demerisas laughed them to fcorn which called any pride, other Princes Kings but his father and himself. Moreover he took great pleasure to hear his flatterers, who being at banquets called for wine to drink to King Demetrism , and to Seleucus mafler of the Elephants, to Ptolomy Admiral, to Lyfmachus keeper of the treasure, and to Agathocles SILICIAN, governour of the Isles. All the Kings, but Lyfimachus, laughed at these toys when they were reported to him : but Lyfimachus was very angry, and thought great from that Demotrius should reckon him a gelding, for that it was an old custom commonly to give an Eustuch the charge of keeping the treasure. So Lysimachus of all other Princes did bear him most malice; and because he would finely taunt him for that he ever kept Lamia his Curtifan with him : Untill this present time, said he, I never saw harlot play in a Tragedy before. Demetrius answered him again. that his harlot was chafter then Penelope his wife. So Demetrine departing for that time out of PELO-PONNESUS, took his journey towards ATHENS, and wrote before to the ATHENIANS, that when he came thither he would be received into the fraternity of the holy mysteries, and that he meant they should shew him at one self time, all that was to be seen, even from the least to the highest secrets of their ceremonies, called Epoptices, because they made the brethren of the fraternity see them long time after that they had been first received into the lesser ceremonies; the which was not lawfull then, neither was ever heard of before. For these smaller mysteries, in old time were celebrated in the moneth of November, and the greater in the moneth of August ; and befides it was not lawfull to celebrate or tale thele ceremonies within the space of a year one of the other. When these letters were openly read, no man durft fpeak against them, but Pythodorus the Priest, who carried the torch lighted when they shewed these mysteries. Howbeit his words prevailed not, for by the device of Stratocles it was enacted at an affembly of the City, that the moneth of March in the which they were at that time . should be called and reputed Wovember. And so as they could best help it, by their ordinances of the City they did receive Demetrins into the fraternity of the mysteries : and afterwards again . this Self moneth of March which they had translated into November, became suddenly August : and in the felf fame year was celebrated the other ceremony of thele great mysteries, whereby Denetrins was admitted to fee the most straight and fecret ceremonies. Therefore Philippides the Poet inveighing against the facriledge and impiety of Religion prophaned by Stratocles, made these verses of

> Into one moneth his coming hither . Hath thrust up all the year together.

And afterwards because Stratecles was the procurer that Demetrius was lodged in the Temple of Mi- Philippides mrya within the Caftle :

Of Chaft Minerva's holy Church be makes a filthy flewes, And in that Virgins very fight his harlots doth abufe.

But yet of all the infolent parts done at that time in ATHENS (although many were committed) none Demetrius proof all the reft grieved the Athenians more, then this did: that Demetrius commanded them dig gift of they should prefently furnish him with two hundred and fifty talents. The taxation of this payment two hundred. was very hard unto them, both for the shortness of the time appointed them, as also for the im-possibility of abatime any part of it. When he had seen all this mass of manus laid on a hearth in-lent to his possibility of abating any part of it. When he had seen all this mass of money laid on a heapbe Confinence forchim he commanded it should be given to Lamia, and among his other Curtifans, to buy them buy them sope Sope. The shame the ATHENIANS received by this gift, grieved them more then the loss of their money; and the words he spake to the great contempt of them and their City did more trouble them then the payment they made. Some fay notwithstanding, that Demetrine did not alone use the ATHEMIAN'S thus shamefully, but the THESSALIANS also in the same manner. But passing this over , Lamis of her felf and through her own countenance did get a great fum of money together of Lamis made diverse persons for one supper, she made umo: Demetrius, the personation whereof was of such exceeding charge, that Lycans born in the sile of Samos, did set down the order thereof in writing. And own coll. therefore a certain Poet no less pleasant, then truely, called this Lamia, Elepolis: to wit, an engine to Lamia Elepolis take Cities. And Demochares also born in the City of SOLI, called Demetrius a fable, because he had Lamia ever with him : as in the fables which old women tell little children , there is ever lightly 18 Lamia, as much to fay, as a witch, or forcerefs. So that the great credit and authority this

Lamia had, and the love which Demetrism bare her, did not onely cause his wives to suspect and envy. hin, but made him hated also of all his friends and familiars. And sherefore certain gentlemen, whom Demerrias fent in Ambassade unto King Lysmachus, he talking samiliarly with them, and patting the time away, shewed them great wounds of the claws of a Lyon upon his Arms and Legs, telling them also how be was forced to fight with a Lyon , when through King Alexanders fory he was thut up in his den with him: they fmiling to hear him, told him that the King their mafter had also certain marks and bitings on his neck, of a wild beaft called Lamia. And to fay truly, it was a wonderfull thing, that marrying (as he did) his wife Phila fo much against his will because the was too old for him, how he was ravified with Lawin, and did fo constantly love her fo long together, considering The trying of allo that the was very old, and part the best. Therefore Dimo, firnamed Manis (as much to fay, the Done a Curil-mad woman) pleasantly answered Demetrins, asking her one night: when Lamia had played on the fan, rouching, flute all supper time, what she thought of Lamis? An old woman, O King, quoth she. Another Lamis and De. time when fruit was ferved in , after the board was taken up : Do you fee, faid Demetrins , hom many prety fine knacks Lemia fendeth me? My mother, answered Demo again, she will fend you more then thefe, if you please to lye with her. It is reported of this Lamia, that she overshrew Boccoon judgement in a matter. In ÆGYPT there was a young man that had a marvellous fancy unto a faupon a lovers mous Curtifan called Thomas: who did ask him such a great sum of money to lyewith her, that it was gream and the unpolitible for him to give it her. At length, this amourous youth being so deep in love with her, judgement repuggement reverifed by Ladreamed one night he lay with her , and enjoyed her : to that for the pleafure he took by his mit the Cur- conceipt and imagination, when he awaked, his earnest love was fatisfied. This Curtifan whom he had cast fancy to, hearing of this his dream, did put him in suit before the Judges, to be payed her hire for the pleasure the young man had taken of her by imagination. Bocchoris hearing the sum of her complaint, commanded the young man to bring before him in some vessell, at a certain day appointed, as much money as fire did ask him for to lye with her. Then he hade him to tofs it too and from his hand before the Curtifan, that the might onely have the thadow and fight of it: for quote he, imagination and opinion is but a shadow of truth. Lamia said, this was no equal judgement, The fabelility of for faid file, the shadow onely or the sight of money, did not faissie the coverousness of the Links, rever Curtifan, 2s the young mans loft, was quenched by his dream. Thus enough spoken of Lamia, But sing Buchnis now the missfortunes and oests of him we presently write of, do transfort the bustory as from a now the misfortunes and gefts of him we prefently write of, do transport the suffery, as from Comicall into a Tragicall Theater, that is to fay, from pleafant and light matter, into lamentable The conspiracy and bitter tears. For all the Princes and Kings conspired generally against Antigonus, and joyned all their force and Armies together. Therefore Demetrius departed forthwish out of GRESCE, and came to joyn with his father, whose courage he found more lively and better given to this war then his years required : befides that Demerrism coming enade him the bolder , and did lift up his heart the more. And yet it feemeth to me, that if Antigonus would but have yacided up a few trifling things, or that either he could or would have bridled his over immoderate coverous define to reign , he had both kept for himself all the time of his life , and also left after his death unto his fon, the supreamest digitity and power, above all other Kings and successors of Alexander. But he was fo cruell and fo rath of nature, and fo infolent and brave in his doings, as in his words: that thereby he firred up and brought upon him as enemies, many great and mighty Princes. For even at that prefent time he faid, that he would as entire, in any great anninging remers. For end at that prefent time he faid, that he would as entired to an advantage and feater alunder that confipiracy against him, as choughs or other little birds coming to peck up the Corn newly down, are easily fixed away with a stone or making any little noise. So he carried to the field with him, above threefcore and ten thousand footmen, ten thousand horsemen, and threefcore and fifteen Eldphants. His enemies had threefcore and four thousand footmen, and five hundred horfemen more then he , with four hundred Elephants , and fixfcore carts of war. When the rate Armies were one near unto the other, meetinks he had form imagination in his head that changed his hope, but not his courage. For in all other battels and conflicts, having commonly used to look big on the matter, to have a loud high voice, and to the brave words, and fometime alforeven in the chiefeft of all the battell to give fome pleasant mock or other, shewing a certain truff he had in himself, and contempt of his enemy: then they faw him oftentimes alone and very pentive, in inhour eiter a word to any man. One day he called all his Army together, and preferred his son arms the fouldiers, recommending him unto them, as his heir and fuccessour, and reliked with him alone in his Tent. Whereat men marvelled the more, because that he never used before to imparatio any sum the fecrets of his counfell and determination; no not to his own fon, but did all ellings of himfelf: and then commanded that thing openly to be done which he had feeretly purposed. For profit hereof it is faid, Demerrius being box a young man, asked him on a time when the Camp should remove: and that Antigonus in anger answered him , art thou afraid thou final not bear the found of the Trumper? Furthermore, there tell our many ill figns and tokens that killed their hearts. For Demerrins dreamed that Aixander the Great appeared Armed uncohimat all pieces; and that he asked him what word or fignal of the bartell they were determined to give at the day of battell : be answered that they were determined to give I upter and Villory. Then said Alexander , I will go to thine enemies that shall receive me' and afterwards at the very day of the owerdards, when all their Army were fet inbattell ray, Antigonus coming out of his Teni; shad fuch a great full, that he is the company of th fell flat on his face to the ground, another himself very forely. So when he was taken up, shen this ingup his hands to heaven, he made his prayer unto the gods, that it would place show to grant him victory, or fudden death without great pairs; before he should see thisself vanquished and him victory.

his Army overthrown. When both Armies came to joyn, and that they fought hand to hand, De-metring that had the most part of the horsemen with him, went and gave charge upon Antiochus the fon of Seleucus, and fought it out fo valiantly on his fide, that he overthrew his enemies, and put them to flight. But too fondly following the chase of them that fled, and out of time, he marred all Demetrius upand was the occasion of the loss of his victory. For when he returned from the chase, he could on the first onand was the occasion of the 1005 of the Elephants were between both. Then Selenem per let, made Annot joyn again with their footmen, because the Elephants were between both. Then Selenem per ticknet the critical and critical selections of the selection of the s one fide as though he would environ them behind, and made them afraid; yet making head as he fiv. would charge them, onely to give them leifure to come on their fide, as they did. For the most part Over rashly would charge them, onely to give that them of the first of them field every man, things the of Antigona; both did for fake him and yeelded unto his enemies; the reft of them field every man, things the of the first of them is the first of the first of the first of them is the first of the fir Antisonus was, one of them that were about him faid unto him : Your grace had need to take heed was overcome. for these men come to charge us. He answered again : but how should they know me? and if they did, my fon Demetrius will come and help me. This was his last hope, and still he looked every way if he could fee his fon coming towards him : till at the length he-was slain with Arrows , Darts , and Pikes. For of all his friends and fouldiers, there tarried not one man by his body, but Thorax of the City of LARISSA in THESSALY. Now the battell having fuch fuccess as you have heard, the The death of Kings and Princes that had won so noble a victory, as if they had cut a great body in sundry pieces, King Antigothey divided Antigonus Kingdom among them, and every man had his part of all the Provinces and Countries which Anigonus kept adding that unto their other dominions which they possessed before. Now Demetrius flying with all possible speed that might be, with five thousand footmen, and Demetrius four thousand horsemen, he got to the City of EPHESUS: where every man mistrusted, that being flight. needy of money as he was, he would not spare the temple of Diana in EPHESUS, but would rifle all the gold and filver in it. And in contrary manner also Demetrius being afraid of his fouldiers left they would spoil it against his will, he suddenly departed thence, and failed towards GREECE. putting his greatest confidence and affiance in the ATHENIANS, because he had left his wife Deidamin at ATHENS, with thips and fome money; fuppofing he could go no whither with better fafery in his adverting, then to ATHENS, of whose good wilk he thought himself afforced. Wherefore when the Ambassadours of the ATHENIANS came unto him, and found him not far from the Isle of CYCLADES, as he failed with great speed towards ATTICA, and that they had declared unto him, he should forbear to come unto their City, because the people had made an ordinance to suffer The unfaithfulno mockings to come into ATHENS, and that they had fent Deidamia his wife honourably accompanied unto the City of MEGARA: then was Demetrias for very anger and pattion of mind, clean ward Demeout of countenance, although untill that time he had patiently born his adverfity, and his heart had trius. never failed him. But this nipped him to the heart; when he faw (that contrary to expectation) the Athenians had deceived and failed him in his great need, and that in his adverfity he found their former friendship counterfeit, and altogether dissembled. Whereby most plainly appeareth, that the most uncertain and deceivable proof of the peoples good wills and Cities toward Kings Over great hoand Princes, are the immeasurable and extream honours they do unto them. For fith it is fo that nours are fight the truth and certainty of honour proceedeth from the good will of those that give it, the fear which of unconflance the common people commonly fland in of the power of Kings, is sufficient cause for them to militrust trienaship. that the people do it not with good will and from their hearts, confidering that for fear they do the felf fame things, which they will also do for love. Therefore grave and wife Princes should not pais to much for the images and flames they fet up for them, or the tables or divine honours they do decree unto them, as to regard their own works and deeds, and weighing them truely, fo to believe and receive their honours for true, or otherwise to reject and mistrust them, as things done by compulsion. For commonly it is that which maketh the people to hate Kings the more, when they do accept these immeasurable and extream honours done unto them : but those forts chiefly hate them most, that against their wills are forced to do them those honours, Demetrius seeing then how injuriously the ATHENTANS had used him, and at that time not knowing how to be revenged of them, he modeftly fent unto them onely to make his complaints, and to demand his ships, among the which was that Galley of fixteen banks of Oars. The which when he had received, he hoifed fail immediatly towards the ftraight of PELOPONNESUS , and there found all things to go against him. For in every place where he had lest any Garrison, the Captains that had the charge of them, either yeelded them up, or else revolted, and kept them against him. Therefore leaving Pyrrhus his Lieutenant in GREECE, he took sea again, and failed towards CHERRONESUS, and there with the mischiefs he did, and with the spoils he got in King Life-afraid of him. Shortly after , Selenem fent unto Demetrim , to require his daughter Stratonice selenens rein marriage, notwithstanding that he had a fon already called Antiockins, by his wife Apama quiteth Strato-B PRASTAN. Howher he thought that his affairs and greamers of his eftate and Kingdom, was nice (Dema-able enough to maintain many fuccessours after him. And furthermore, he considered with himself marine, good fortune offered him beyond all hope, prefently took his daughter with him, and failed with all his ships directly towards SYRIA. In the which voyage he was constrained of necessity to land sometimes, and specially in CILICIA, the which Plistarchus the brother of Cassander kept at that time, Plifterchut, the being given him by the other kings for his part and portion of the fool of Antigona, after he was brother of Galbrother of Cajoverthrown. This Plistarchus thinking that Demosrius landed not to refresh himself, but to forrage time Governor and spoil, because he would complain of Selencin for the alliance he made with their common enemy, without the confent and privity of all the other Kings and Princes confederates, he went purpofely unto his brother Cassander. Demetrius having intelligence thereof, he fuddenly invaded the land, and spoiled as far as the City of CYNDES, and carried away (which he had leavied) twelve hundred talents, which he found yet left of his fathers treasure : and then with all the speed he could possible he returned to his ships, and hoised fail. Shortly after, his wife Phile also came unto him. So Seleuens received them all near unto the City of Orossus, and there their meeting was Princely, without forrow or suspicion one of the other. First of all Seleneus did feast Demetrius in his tent, in the middeft of his Camp: and afterwards Demetrius feafted him again in his Galley, with thirteen banks of Oars. Thus they passed many dayes together, feating and rejoycing each with other, being unarmed, and having no fouldiers to wait upon them: untill at length Selences with his wife Stratestice departed, and took his way with great pomp towards the City of ANTI-OCH. Now for Demetries, he kept the province of CILICIA, and fent his wife Phila unto her brother Cassander, to answer the complaints and acculations of Plistarehus against him. In the mean time Deidamia his wife departed out of GREECE to come unto him : who after she had remained with him a few days, died of a ficknefs. Afterwards Demetrins coming again in favour with Prolomy, by Selencus his fon in laws means, he married his daughter Prolomeide. Hitherunto Selencus ufed Demetrias wite.

Demetrissionar-metrias very courteoully, but afterwards he prayed him to deliver him CILICIA again, for a fum premerinants of money that he offered him : but Demetrius plainly denied him. Then did Scheneus thew a cruell and tyrannicall covetoufnefs: for in anger, and with fierce threats and countenance he asked him the Cities of Tyre, and Sidon. But therin meethinks he lacked honefty and civility: as though he that had under his obedience and subjection all that which lay betwirt the INDIES, and the sea of wine Demetrius and Seleucus.

Lyria, was in such need and poverty; that for two Cities onely, he should drive his father in law from him, who had sustained so hard and bitter change. But thereby he rightly confirmed Plate's faying : that he that will be rich indeed, must indeavour himself not to increase his riches, but rather to diminish his covetousnets. For he shall never be but a begger and needy, whose covetous desire hath no end. This notwithstanding, Demetring yeelded not for fear, but provided to replenish the Cities with good Garrisonsto keep thein against him : faying , that though he had been owercome to thousand times more in battell, yet it should never fink into his head that he should be contented, and think himfelf happy to buy Selencin alliance fo dear. On the other fide, being advertised that one Lachares having spied opportunity when the ATHENIANS were in civil wars one against the other, and that he had overcome them, and did tyramically usure the government, he then perfwaded himfelf that he might eafily win it again, if he came thither upon the fuddain, Thereupon he croffed the feas with a great fleet of thips, without any danger : but he had such a great florm and tempest upon the coast of ATTICA, that he lost the most part of his ships, and a great number of his men besides. But for himself he scaped , and began to make a little war with the ATHENIANS. Yet perceiving that he did no good there, but left his time, he lem flome of his men to gather a number of his ships again together, and he himitelf in the mean time went into PELOPONNESUS, tolay flege to the City of MESSINA, where his perfort was in great danger. For fighting hard by the wall, he had such a blow with a dare, that it his full in the mouth, and ran through his cheek, Notwithflanding this, after he was healed of that wound, he brought into his subjection again certain Towns that had rebelled against him. After that he returned again into ATTICA, and took the Cities of ELEUSIN , and of RHAMNUS : and then spoiled all the Country, and mok a ship fraught with corn, and hung up the Merchant, that ought it, and the mafter of the ship that brought it : thereby to terrific all other Metchants, that they should be afraidno bring any more com the ther, and to to family the City, by keeping them from all things necessary for their sufferance, and * Four crowns. fo it happened. For a buffell of falt was fold at ATHENS for * fourty filver Brachma's, and buthell of wheat for three * hundred Drachma's. In this extream necessity, the ATRENIANS has but a short joy for the hundred and hity Galleys they faw near unto A GINA, the which Prolony fent to aid them : for when the fouldiers that were in them faw that they brought santo Demotrius great number of thips out of PELOPONNESUS, out of CYPRUS, and diverse others parts, which mounted in the whole to the number of three hundred fail, they weighed their. Anchors, and fighther the Athenians prefently. Then Lucharer forfook the City, and fecretly faved himself. Now the ATHENIANS, who before had commanded upon pain of death, that no man should make any motion to the council, to treat of any peace with Demetring, they did then upon Luchener flying , prefently open the Gates next unto Demerrine Camp, and fent Ambaliadours unto him, not booking for any grage or peace but because necessity drave him to it. During this so hard and straight siege, there sail out many of Epicons, at wonderfull and firings things; but among others, 'this one is of specials note. At is reposted that the father and fon fitting in their house, voide of all hope of life, there fell ardead Run terfore them from the top of the house, and that the father and the fon fought who should have it to sat. Morsoyer, that at the felf fame fiege the Philosopher Epicores; mammained himfelf and this Scholars, by giving them a portion of Beans every day , by the which they lived. This take, City of ATHANS being brought unto this extremity, Demetrius made his entry into it, and gave commandment to all the Citizens, that they should affemble every man within the Theater: where he made them to be compaffed in with armed Souldiers, and then placed all his guard armed about the stage. Afterwards he came down himself into the Theater, through high Galleries and entries by the which the common players used to come to play their parts in Tragedies , insomuch as the ATHENIANS were then worse afraid then before : howbeit Demetrius presently pacified their fear, as soon as he began to speak unto them. For he did not fashion his Oration with a hasty angry voice, neither did he use any sharp or bitter words: but onely after he had courteoully told them their faults and discourtefie towards Demetrius clea him he faid he forgave them, and that he would be their friend again : and furthermore, he caused ten mency unto millions of bushels of wheat to be given unto them, and stablished such governours there, as the peo- the Athenians, ple milliked not of. Then Democles the Orator, seeing that the people gave out great shouts of joy in the praise of Demetrius, and that the Orators daily contented in the pulpit for Orations, who should exceed other in preferring new honours for Demetrine, he caused an order to be made, that the havens of PIRAUS and MUNYCHIA should be put out into Demetrius hands, to use at his pleasure. This being established by voices of the people, Dimetrius of his own private authority did place a great Garrison within the fort called Mus, Eum, because the people should rebell no more against him, nor divert him from his other enterprises. Thus when he had taken ATHENS, he went to fet upon the LACEDEMONIANS. But Archidamus King of LACEDEMON, came against him with a puissant Demetrius Army, whom he discomfited in battell, and put to flight, by the City of MANTINEA. After that the Lacedame. he invaded LACONIA with all his Army, and made an inrode to the City of SPARTA, where he moniant, Once again overthrew the LACEDAMONIANS in fet battell, took five hundred of them prisoners. and flew two hundred : in fo much as every man thought he might even then go to Spart a without any danger to take it, the which had never yet been taken afore by any. But there was never King that had so often and suddain changes of fortune as Demetrius , nor that in other affairs was ever so Demetrius vaoften little, and then great: fo fuddenly down, and up again: fo weak, and ftraight fo ftrong. And riable fortune. therefore it is reported that in his great advertities when fortune turned to contrary against him, he was wont to cry out upon fortune, that which Afchylus speaketh in a place:

Thou feemest to have begotten me, of purpose for to show Thy force in lifting of me up, me down again to throw.

Now again when his affairs prospered so well, and that he was likely to recover a good force and Demetrias mil-Kingdom, newswere brought him, first that Lysimachus had taken all his Towns from him, which forunes. he held in ASIA : and on the other fide, that Prolomy had won from him all the Realm of Cyprus, the City of SALAMINA onely excepted, in the which he kept his mother and children very straightbelieged. This notwithstanding fortune played with him, as the wicked woman Archilogus speaketh of, who Did in the one hand water show, And in the other fire bestow.

For taking him away, and (as it were) the City of SPARTA also out of his hands by these dreadfull news, even when he was certain to have won it, the prefently offered him hopes of other great and new things by this occasion following. After the death of Cassander, Philip who was the eldest of all his other fors, and left his heir and fucceffor in the Kingdom of MACEDON, reigned no long time over the MACEDONIANS, but deceased foon after his father was dead. The two other brethren also fell at great variance, and wars together; so that the one called Anipater, flew his own mother Great differni The falonicist and the other named Alexander , called in to aid him Demetrins and Pyrrhus, the one on and firife out of the Realm of EPIRUS, and the other out of PELOPONNESUS. Pyrrhus came first before of Maccdon as Demetriar , and kept a great part of MACEDON for recompence of his pains , coming to aid him terthe death arthis defire : forthat he became a dreadfull neighbour unto Alexander himlelf, that had fent for him of Callander. into his Countrey. Furthermore, when he was advertised that Demetrins did presently upon the re- Antipater an eript of his letters, fer forward withall his Army to come to aid him, the young Prince Alexander was Alexander, the twice as much more amazed and afraid; for the great estate and estimation of Dimetrius. So he went der. to him not with franding, and received him at a place called DEION, and there imbraced and welcom- Demetrius inwithin. But immediatly after , he told them that his affairs were now in fo good effate, that praifed raded Macedon. bethe godshe should not now need his presence to aid him. After these words the one began to Wilesberwitt mifruit the other. So it chanced oneday, that as Demetrins went to Alexanders lodging where Demetring. The least was prepared, there came one to him to tell him of an ambush that was laid for him and they had determined to kill him when he should think to be merry at the Banket. But Demetrins was nothing abalfied at the news, and onely went a little forther, not making fuch haft cas he did before, and in the mean time fent to command his Captains to arm their men, and to have them in readiness: and willed his gendemen and all the rest of his officers that were about him Corbich were greater number by many then those of Alexanders side) every man of them to go in with them into the hall, and to tarry there till he arose from the table. By this means the men whom Alexander hild appointed to affault him durft not, being afraid of the great train he had brought with him. Furthernione, Demerging faining that he was not well at ease at that time to make merry, he went immediatly out of the hall, and the next morning determined to depart, making him believe that he had certain news brought him of great importance : and prayed Alexander to pardon him, that he could no longer keep him company, for that he was driven of necessity to depart from him: and that another time they would meet together, with better leilure and liberty. Alexander was very glad to fee that Demetrius went his way out of MACEDON not offended, but of his own good will: whereupon he brought him into THESSALIB, and when they were come to the City of La-RISSA, they began again to feaft one another, to intrap each other: the which offered Demerine occasion to have Alexander in his hand as he would with himself. For Alexander of purpose would not have his guard about him , fearing left thereby he should teach Demerries also to stand upon his guard. Thus Alexander turned his practife for another, upon himfelf: and he was determined not to fuffer Demetrius to scape his hands, if he once again came within danger. So Alexander being bidden to supper to Demetrius, he came accordingly. Demetrius rifing from the board in the middeft of supper, Alexander role also, being alraid of that ftrange manner, and followed Demetrius kill him foot by toot to the very door. Then Demetrius faid but to his Warders at the gate Kill eth Alexander him that followeth me. With those words he went out of the doors, and Alexander that followed him was flain in the place, and certain of his gentlemen with him which came to refcue him; of the which, one of them as they killed him faid, that Demetrius had prevented them but one day. All that night (as it is no other likely) was full of uproar and tumult. Howbeit, the next morning the Ma-CEDONIANS being marvelloufly troubled and afraid of Demetrins great power, when they faw that no man came to affail them, but that Demetrius in contrary manner fent unto them to tell them that he would fpeak with them, and deliver them reason for that he had done: then they all began to be bold again, and willingly gave him audience. Now Demerrius needed not to use many words, nor to make any long Orations, to win them unto him: for, because they hated Anispate, as a horrible manqueller and murtherer of his mother, and because they had no better man to prefer, they eafily choic Demetrins King of MACEDON, and thereupon brought him back into Mace-Demenius poo- DON , to take possession of the Kingdom. This change was not milliked of the other MACEDO-NIANS that remained at home in their Countrey, for that they yet remembred the traiterous and wicked fact of Caffander against Alexander the Great: for which cause they utterly hated and detefted all his iffue and posterity. And furthermore, if there were any spark of remembrance in their hearts, of the bounty and goodness of their grandfather Antipater, Demetrius received the fruit and benefit, for his wife Phila's fake; by whom he had a fon that should succeed him in the Kingdom, and was a proper youth, in Camp with his father. Demerius having this great good hap and fortune come unto him, he received news also that Ptolomy had not onely raised his stege from the City of Salamina where he kept his mother and children straightly besieged: but surther, that he had done them great honour, and bestowed great gifts upon them. On the other side also hews Antischus the advertised, that his daughter Stratonice, who had before beed married unto Sciences, was now married ion of selection again unto Antiochus, the fon of the faid Selenens, and how that the was crowned Queen of all the barbarous Nations inhabiting in the high Provinces of Asia: and that it came to pass in tha manner. It chanced that this young Prince Antiochus (as love overcometh all men) became in loss with his fathers with his mother in law Stratonice, who already had a fon by Selences his father. She being young and passing fair, he was so ravished with her, that though he proved all the ways possible to make his fury and passion that way, yet he was still the weaker. So that in the end, condemning himself to death because he found his defire abominable, his pallion incurable, and his reason unterly over-come, he resolved to kill himself by little and little, with abstinence from meat and drink; and made no other reckoning to remedy his grief, faining to have fome fecret inward difeafe in his body. Yet could he not fo finely cloak it , but that Erafifratus the Physitian easily found his grief , that love, not fickness, was his infirmitie: howbeit it was hard for him to inagine with whom he was in love. Erafifratus being earnestly bent to find out the parry he loved, he sare by this young Prince all day long in his chamber ; and when any fair young boy or wife came to fee him, he earnefly remee an way rong in in channer; and which any looked Antiochus in the face, and carefully observed all the parts of the body, and outward movings, which do commonly betray the fecret palitons and affections of the mind. So having marked him divers times, that when others came to fee him, whatfoever they were, he ftill remained in one felf flate, and that when Stratonice his mother in law came alone or in company of her husband Experiments Selencus to wifit him , he commonly perceived those figns in him , which Sappho written to be Physicians care in lovers (to wir, that his words and speech did fail him, his colour became red, his eyes full to find out the rolled to and fro, and then a fuddain fweat would take him, his pulfe would beat faff and rise high; woung Prince young Prince and in the end, that after the force and power of his heart had failed him, and shewed all thele signs, suppos describ- he became like a man in an extastie and trance, and white as a kercher) he then gathering a true conjecture by these so manifest signs and declarations, that it was onely Stratonice whom this young Prince fancied and the which he forced himfelf to keep fecret to the death, though that to bewrey it to the King it would offend him much , but yet trufting to his great affection and fatherly lovebe bare to his fon, he ventured one day to tell him, that his fons fickness was no other but love, and withall, that his love was impossible to be enjoyed, and therefore that he must of necessity die, for it was incurable. Selenens was cold at the heart to hear these news: so he asked him, What is he incurable? Yea, Sir, answered the Physitian, because he is in love with my wife. Then replied Silenens again: Alas Erafiftrains, I have always loved thee as one of my dearest friends, and wouldest thou not now do me this pleasure, to let my son marry thy wife, sith thou knowes it well that I have no mo fons but be; and that I fee he is but caft away, if thoubelp me not? But your grace would not do it your felf, faid Eraffrains, if he were in love with Stratonics. O, faid Sciences to him again, that it were the will of the gods fome god or man could turn his love that way : for mine own part , I would not onely leave him the thing he loved, but I would give my Kingdom allo to fave his life. Then Erafifratus feeing that the King fpake the word from his heart, and with abundance of tears, he took him by the right hand, and sold him plainly, your grace needeth not Erafiftratus help in this. For being father, husband, and King, your felf also may onely be the Phylician, to cure your sons disease. When Selenem heard that, he called an affembly of the people, and declared before them all, that he was determined to Crown his fon Antiochus King of the high Provinces of Asia, and Stratonice Queen, to marry them together: and that he was perswaded, that his son (who had always shewed himself obedient to his fathers will) would not scleucus love disobey him in this marriage. And as for Stratonice, if the milliked this marriage, and would not unto his son confent unto it because it was no common matter, then he prayed that his friends would perswade Antiochus, her , the should think all good and comely that should please the King : and withall that concerned the generall benefit of the Realm and Common-wealth. Hereupon Antioches and Stratonice were married together. But now to return again to the history of Demetrius. Demetrius came by the Kingdom of MACEDON and THESSALY by this means as you have heard, and did moreover poffels the best part of PELOPONNESUS, and on this fide the streight, the Cities of MEGARA and ATHENS. Furthermore he led his Army against the BOEOTIANS, who were at the first willing to make peace with him. But after that Cleonymus King of Sparta was come into the City of THEBES with his Army, the BOEOTIANS encouraged by the fair words and allurement of one Pifis, born in the City of THESPIS (who at that time bare all the fway and chief authority amongst them) they gave up their treaty of peace they had begun with Demetrins, and determined to make war. Thereupon Demetrius went to beliege the City of THERES, and laid his engines of bettery unto it : in fo much as Cleonymus for fear , stole secretly out of the City. Thereupon the The City of THEBANS being also afraid, yeelded themselves unto Demetrius mercy: who putting great Gar- Thebes yeelded trifons into the Cities, and having leavied a great fum of money of the Province, left them Hiero-Hieronymus the wimmi the Historiographer, his Lieutenant and governour there. So it appeared that he used them Historiographer very courteoully, and did them many pleasures, and specially unto Pifis. For when he had taken pher, Demetrihim prisoner, he did him no hurt but received him very courteously, and used him well: and fur- as Lieutenane, thermore, he made him Polemarchus (to wit, Camp-mafter) in the City of THES PIS. Shortly after these things were thus brought to pass, King Lysimachus by chance was taken by another barbarous Prince, called Dromichetes. Thereupon Demetrins, to take such a noble occasion offered him. went with a great Army to invade the Country of THRACIA, supposing he should find no man to withstand him , but that he might conquer it at his pleasure. Howbeit, so soon as Demetrius back was turned, the BOEOTIANS revolted again from him, and therewithall news was brought him. that Lysimachus was delivered out of prilon. Then he returned back with all speed, marvellously offended with the BOEOTIANS, whom he found already discomfitted in battell by his son Antigonal and went again to lay fiege to the City of THEBES, being the chief City of all that Province of BOEOTIA. But at that prefent time, Pyrrhus came and forraged all THESSALY, and entred even to the ftraight of THERMOPILES. Therefore Demetrius was conftrained to leave his fon to continue the fiege at THEBES, whilft he himself went against Pyrrhus, who suddenly returned again ento his Realm. So Demerrius left ten thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemen in THESSALY to defend the Country, and returned with the rest of his Army to win THEBES. Thereupon he brought his great Engine of battery called Elepolis, against the wall, as you have heard before, the which was thrust forward by little and little, with great labour, by reason of the weight and heavinels of it : fo that it could scant be driven forward two furlongs in two moneths. But the BOEO-TIANS and the THEBANS did valiantly defend themselves; and Demetrius of a malicious mind and defire of revenge (more oftner then needfull, or to any purpose) compelled his men to go to the affault, and to hazard themselves : so that there were daily a great number of them slain. Antigonus his fon perceiving it: Alas, faid he, why do we thus fuffer our men to be flain and caft away to no purpole? Wherefore Demetrius angrily answered him again: What needeft thou to care? Is there may come to be diffributed to those that are dead? But notwithstanding, because men should not *Com "Think he fill meant to put others in danger, and durft not venure himself, he fought with them, till monthly diffinith he fill meant to put others in danger, and durft not venure himself, he fought with them, till monthly diffinite her was four as him from the burse to the at length he was shot through the neck with a sharp Arrow-head, that was shot at him from the buted to the wall. Wherewithall he fell very fick , but yet raised not his fiege , nor removed his Camp, but took fouldiers as the City of THERES again by affault : the which being not long before again replenished with people, was in ten years space twice won and taken. Now he put the THEBANS in a marvellous fear, by his cruel threats he gave them at his coming into THEES: to that they looked to have received the extreamed: punishment the vanquished could have, through the just wrath and anger of the conquerour. Howbeit after Demetrius had put thirteen of them to death, and banished some, he pardoned all the rest. About that time fell out the celebration of the feast called Pythia: in the honour of Apollo: and because the RTOLIANS kept all the high-ways to bring them unto the City of DELDHOS, in the which of old time they did use to celebrate those spores aforesaid, he caused them to be kept and solemnized at AT HENS, as in a place where this god in reason should be best honoured and reverenced, because he was patron of the City, and for that the ATHENIA NS maintained that he was their progenitor. From thence he returned into MACHOON, and knowing that it was against his nature to live idly, and in peace, and being on the other fide allo that the MACEDON IANS did him more service, and were more obsolicit to him in wars, and that in time of peace they grow sedicious, full of vanity and quarrels, he went to make war with the ETOLIANS: and after he had spoiled and destroyed their Countrey, heleft Pantanebus his Liemenant there, with a great part of his Army. Demetrius himfelf went in the mean time with the reft of his Army against Pyrrhow, and Pyrrhow also against him; but they missed of meeting each with other. Whereupon Demetrius passed surther into the Realm of journey against Epinus, the which he spoiled and forraged. Pyrrbus on the other side went on so far that he met with Pantanchus, Demetrius Lintenant, with whom he fought a battell, and came to the fword with him: so that he did both hurt him, and was also hurt by him. But in the end Pyrthue had the upper hand, put Pantauchus to flight, and flew a great number of his men, and took five thousand prisoners; the which was the chief overthrow of Demetrius. For Pyrrhus wan not the MACEDONIAN'S ill will fo much for the mischiess and hurts he had done unto them, as he got himself great fame and renown with them, because himself alone had with his own hands done all the noble exploits of war in that journey: for the which he was afterwards had in great estimation among the MACEDONIANS. Now many of them began to fay, that he was the onely King of all others, in whom the lively image of the hardinels and valiantnels of Alexander the Great was to be feen : and that all the reft (but specially Demetrism) did but counterfeit his gravity and Princely countenance; like players upon a Stage, that would counterfeit his countenance and gefture. And to fay truly, there was much fineness and curiofity about Demetries, to make him a playing stock in common playes. For some say, that he did not

onely wear a great hat with his Diadem upon his head, and was apparelled in purple Gowns imbroidered with gold : but also that he did use to wear certain woollen shoes on his seet died in purple colour, not woven, but falhioned together like a felt, and guilt upon it. And furthermore, he had long before caused a cloak to be made of a marvellous rich and sumptuous piece of work. For upon it was drawn the figure of the world, with frars and circles of heaven, the which was not throughly finished, by the change of his fortune. But there was never King of MACEDON after him that durft wear it: albeit there were many proud and arrogant Kings that succeeded him. Now the MACEDONIANS were not onely forry, and offended to fee fuch things as they were not wont to be acquainted withal; but they much more milliked his curious manner of life, and specially because he was ill to come to, and worfe to be spoken with. For he gave no audience, or if he did , he was very rough, and would sharpely take them up that had to do with him. As, he kept the Ambassadours of the ATHENIANS two years, and would give them no answer: and yet made as though he loved them better then any other people of GREECE. Another time also he was offended, because the LACEDAMONIANS had fent but one man onely Ambassadour unto him, taking it that they had done it in despite of him, And so did the Ambassadour of the LACEDAMONIANS answer him very gallantly, after the LACG-NIAN manner. For when Dometrins asked him, how chanceth it that the LACED & MONIANS do fend but one man unto me? No more but one, said he, O King, unto one. On a time he came abroad more plainly and popular like, then he was wont to do : whereby he put the people in good hope that they might the easilier speak with him, and that he would more courteously hear their complaints, Thereupon many came, and put up their humble supplications and bills of petition unto him. He received them, and put them up in the lap of his cloak. The poor fuiters were glad of that and waited upon him at his heels, hoping they should quickly be dispatched but when he was upon the bridge of the River of Axiss, he opened his cloak, and cast them all into the River. This went to the hearts of the MACEDONIANS, who then thought, they were no more governed by a King, but oppressed by a tyrant : and it grieved them so much the more, because they did yet remember (elther for that they had feen themselves, or otherwise heard their forefathers say) how courteous king Philip was in all fuch matters, and how that one day as he paffed through the fireet, a poor old woman pluckt him by the Gown, and eitfoons humbly befought him to hear her, but he answered her he was not then at leifure. Whereupon the poor woman plainly cried out to him, Leave then to be King. This word so netled him, and be took such a conceit of it, that he returned himself to his pallace, and fetting all other matters apart, did nothing elfe many days but gave himfelf to hear all fuits, and began with this poor old woman. For truly nothing becometh a Prince better, then to minister justice: for Mars (as Timorbeas faith) fignifieth force, and is a tyrant : but justice and law, according to Pisdarus, is Queen of all the world. Moreover the wife Poet Homer faith not that Princes and Kings have received the cuftody of Engines, and of munition, neither also firong and mighty thips of The piter, to keep them to deftroy Towns withall : but with them to maintain law and juffice. And therefore he calleth not the cruel and bloody King, but the just and mercifull Prince, Jupiters friend and Scholar. And Demetrius boasted that he had a name and title contrary to Jupiter, whom they called Pelieus, or Polienchus, fignifying Protector and preferver of Cities: and that he was called Polioreeres, a Fort-gainer. Thus the ill was taken for the good, and vice preferred for vertue : because he could not discern the truth from falshood, which turned his injustice to glory, and iniquity to honour. But now to return where we left : Demetrins fell into a great and dangerous ficknels in the City of Pella, during which time he almost lost all MACEDON, by a sudden invasion Pyrrhus made, who in manner rode it all over, and came as far as the City of EDESSA, Howbeit fo foon as he Demetriar Ar- recovered health again, he easily drave him out, and afterwards made peace with him, because he my and prepa- would not fighting with him (whom he should have daily at his doors still skirmishing sometimes here, ration for the sometimes there) lose the opportunity and weaken himself to bring that to pass which he had deter-recovering of mined. For he had no small matters in his head, but thought to recover all the Realms his father his Realm a Shad : and befides , the preparation be made was no lefs fufficient then the purpose of such an imaginasion required. For he had leavied and affembled an Army of fourfcore and eighteen thouland footmen: and unto them he had also well near twelve thousand horsemen, and had besides gotten above five hundred fhips together , which were built part in the haven of PIREUS , part at CORINTH, part in the City of CHALCIS, and part about PELLA. He himself in person went through their workhouses, and shewed the Artificers how they should make them, and did help to devise them: so that every man wondered not onely at his infinite preparation, but at the greatness and sumptuousness of his works. For at that time there was no man living that ever faw a Galley of diffeen or fixteen or ms works. Tot as an attempt in the hanks of Oars. But this is true, that afterwards Ptolomy, furnamed Philopater, built a Galley of fourty banks of Oars, the which was two hundred and eighty cubits long, and from the Keel in height to Ptolomy's wonthe top of the Poop, fourty eight cubits; and to look to the tackle and guide, her, did require four hunderfull Galley the top of the Pour, tout yet carry a of fourty dred Marine's, and four thousand watermen to row her; and believes all that, the could yet carry a of Ours. bove the hatches, well near three thouland fighting men. Howbeit this Galley never ferved to other purpose but for shew, and was like to a house that never stirred : and it was never removed out of the place where it was built but with marvellous ado, and great dangers, more to make men wonder as then for any fervice or commodity it could be imployed unto. But now the beauty of Dimetrial ships did nothing hinder their fwiftness and goodness for fight, neither did the hugeness of their building.

take away the nie of them , but their initines and nimbleness deserved more commendation , then their sumptuousness and stateliness. Thus as this great power and preparation was in hand, being fuch as never King before (fince the time of Alexander the Great) had affembled a greater to invade and Pyrrhus upon the borders of Epirus , confining with the Realm of MACEDON, they entred with a great Army, and spoiled and sacked all as they went, Thereupon Demetrius leaving his son Antigonus in GREECE, he returned with all possible speed into MACEDON, to go first against Lysimathus. But as he was preparing to go against him, news were brought him that Pyrrhus had already taken the City of BERRHOEA. This news being blown abroad amongst the MACEDONIANS, all Demetrins doings were turned topfie turvy. For all his Camp was straight full of tears and complaints.

and his men began openly to shew their anger against him, speaking all the ill they could of him, so that they would tarry no longer, but every one prayed leave to depart, pretending to look to their bufines at home, but in truth to go and yeeld themselves unto Lysimachus. Wherefore Demetrius thought it best for him to get him as far from Lysimachus as he could, and to bend all his Army against Pyryhas: because the other was their Countreyman, and familiarly known among the most of them, for that they had ferved together under Alexander the Great, and that as he thought, the MACEDO-NIANS would not prefer Pyrrhus a stranger before him, But there his judgement failed him: for as foon as Pyrrhus had pitched his Camp hard by him, the MACEDONIANS that had ever loved va-liantness, and had of ancient time efteemed him worthier to be King that was the best fouldier and va-afterwards there rose such a general tumult against him throughout all the Camp, that some of them

When this was known in the Camp, many of his fouldiers ran to his tent to rifle it, and every man took fuch hold of it to have his part; that they tare it in pieces, and drew their, swords to fight for it. But Pyrrhus coming in the middest of the tumult, pacified this stir, and presently without blow given, wan all Demetrius Camp : and afterwards he divided the Realm of MACEDON with Loftmachus, in the which Demetrius had quietly reigned the space of seven years. Now Demetrius being thus miferably overthrown, and turned out of his Realm, he fled unto the City of CASSAN-DRIA. There he found his wife Phila, who took it marvellous heavily, and could not abide to

This comparison might (1 say) much better be applied unto Demetrism fortune, to his rising and falling, and to his overthrow and relief again. For when every man thought his force and power utterly-overthrown, then began he to rife again by repair of fouldiers, which by little and little came unto him, and straight revived him with good hope. This was the first time that he was ever feen meanly apparelled, like a private man up and down the Countrey, without some shew or tokens of a King. And there was one that feeing him in this eftate at Thebes, pleasantly applied these verses of Euripydes unto him : Of Godimmortal, now become a mortal Wight:

Now when he began to have hope again, and was (as it were) entred into the great high way of Kings, and had gotten fouldiers about him, which made a body and shew of royall power, here-Rored the THEBANS their liberty and government again. But the ATHENIANS once more revolted from him , and did revoke the dignity and Priefthood of Diphilm , who had been that year created Priest of the saviours, instead of the Governour, which they called in old time Eponymos, as we have told you before: and made a law, that from thenceforth the ancient and common Governours of their City should be reftored again to their ancient manner : and they sent also into Ma-CEDON unto King Pyrrhus, rather to terrific Demetrius (whom they faw begin to rife again) then for any hope they had he would come and help them. Howbeit Demetrius came against them with great tury, and did ftraightly beliege the City of ATHENS. Then the ATHENIANS fent Crases the Philosopher to him (a man of great estimation and authority) who so handled him, partly by in-locopher dell-treaty, and partly also through his wife perswasions and counsels he gave him for his profit, that veretn America Demetrius prefently raifed his siege. Wherefore, after he had gathered together so many ships as were left him, and had imbarked twelve thouland footmen, and a small number of horsemen, he prefently took fea, and Tailed towards As 1 A , meaning to take the Provinces of CARIA and LYDIA from Lyfmachus, and to make them to rebell against him. There Euridice, fifter to Phila, received him by the City of MILETUM, having with her one of Ptolomies daughters and hers, called Pto-Demetrisumar-lemaide; the which had been afore affianced to him by Selencius means. So he married Prolomaide tied Protomaide there, with the good will and confent of her mother Euridice. After his marriage he prefently went into the field again, and did fet forwards to win some Cities, whereof many willingly received him, and others he took by force. Amongst them he took the City of SARDIS, whither came diverse Captains unto him of King Lysimachus, who yeelded themselves, and brought him a great number of men and much money bendes. But Demetrius receiving advertisement that, Agashocks, Lysimachus fon, followed him with a great Army, he went thence into PHRYGIA, making account, and also hoping, that if he could win ARMENIA, hemight easily make MEDIA rebel; and then that he would fee if he could conquer the high Provinces of ASIA, where he might have many places of refuge, if fortune turned against him. Agashocles followed him very near, and yet skirmishing divers times with him, Demerries alway had the better: howbeit Agathorles did cut off his victuals from him every way, and kept him at fuch a straight, that his men durst no more stray from the Camp to forrage: wherefore they fuftained great want of victuals, and then began his men to beafraid, and to miftrust that he would make them follow him into ARMENIA and MEDIA. The famine daily increased more and more in his Army, and it chanced besides, that missing his way, and failing to gage the foord well as he passed over the River of Lyem, the fury and force of the River carried his men down the stream, and drowned a great number of them: and yet notwithstanding thefe great troubles, they mocked him besides. For one wrote at the entry and coming in to his tent, the first verie of the Tragedy of Oedipus COLONIAN, written by Sophoelis, changing onely fome word:

Thou imp of old and blind Antigonus ; To what a point half thou now carried m? But in the end, the plague began also in the middest of this famine (a common thing, and almost a matter of necessity it should be so) because that men being driven to need and necessity, do frame themselves to eat all that comes to hand: whereupon he was driven to bring back those few men that remained, having loft of all forts (good and bad) not fo few as eight thouland fully told. When he came into the Province of TARSUS, he commanded his men in no case to meddle with any thing, because the Country was subject unto King Stlenens, whom he would in no wife displease. But when he faw it was impossible to stay his men being now brought to such extremity and need, and that Agathocies had bard up the streights and passages of mount Taurus against him, he wrote a letter unto Seleucus, first declaring his miferable state and hard fortune : and then presenting his humble petition and request unto him, prayed him to take pity upon his friend, whom spiteful fortune had thrown into such mitery and calamity, that could not but move his greatest enemies to have compassion of him. These Letters somewhat softned Selencus heart, insomuch that he wrote to his Governours and Lieutenants of those parts, to furnish Demetrius person with all things needfull for a Princes house and Victuals sufficient to maintain his men. But one Patrocles, a grave wife Patrocles stirman counted, and Seleucus faithfull friend alfo, came to tell him, that the charge to enterrain Demetrius ethup Seleucus Souldiers, was not the greatest fault he made therein, and most to be accounted of: but that he did against Demenot wisely look into his Affairs, to suffer Demetrius to remain in his Countrey, considering that hehad alway been a more fierce and venturous Prince then any other, to enterprise any matters of great importance; and now he was brought to fuch despair and extremity, that he had framed his men which were but rank cowards, (contrary to their nature) to be most desperate and hardy in greatest dangers. Seleucus being moved with these perswasions, presently took his journey into CILICIA with a great Army. Demetrias being aftonished with this sudden change, and dreading fo great an Army, got him to the ftrongest places of Mount Taurus. Then he sent unto Seleucus. first of all to pray him to suffer him to conquer certain barbarous Feople thereabouts, who lived according to their own Laws, and never had King: to the end that he might yet there with fafety according to their own Lawry, and exile, fraying at length in some place where he might be fafe. Secondly, if that liked him not, then that it would yet please him to Victuall his men for the Wimer time onely, in the fame place where they were, and not to be fo hard-hearted unto him as to drive him thence. lacking all needfull things, and so to put him into the mouth of his most cruell and mortall Enemies. But Seleucus miftrufting his demand, fent unto him that he should Winter if he thought good. two Moneths, but no more, in the Countrey of CATONIA, so he gave him the chiefest of his friends for Hostages: howbeit in the mean time he stopped up all the ways and passages going from thence into Syria. Demetrius now feeing himfelf kept in of all fides, like a Beaft to be taken in the toyl, he was driven to trust to his own strength. Thereupon he over-ran the Countrey thereabouts, and so often as it was his chance to have any Skirmish or Conflict with Selencus, he had ever the better of him; and fometime also when they drave the armed Carts with Sithes against him, he overcame them, and put the reft to flight. Then he drave them away that kept the top of the Mountains, and had barred the passages to keep him that he should not go into Syria, and so kept them himself. In fine, finding his mens hearts lift up again, and prettily encouraged, his heart alfo grew so big, that he determined to fight a Battle with Seleucus, and to set all at fix and seven. So that Selencus was at a straight with himself, and wish not what to do. For he returned back the aid which Lysimachus sent unto him, because he was afraid of him, and mistrusted him. On the Desperate men other fide also he durst not fight with Demetrins alone, being afraid to venture himself with a desperate are not to be man : and also mistrusting much his unconstant fortune, the which having brought him to great ex- sought with. treamity, raifed him up again to great prosperity. But in the mean space Demetrius fell into a great fickness, the which brought his body very weak and low, and had almost utterly overthrown his Affairs. For his Souldiers, fome of them yielded themselves to his Enemies, and others stole away without leave, and went where they lifted. Afterwards when he had hardly recovered his health, and within forty days space was prettily grown to strength again, with those few Souldiers that remained with him, he feemed to his Enemies, that he would go and invade CILICIA: but then fuddenly in the night without founding any Trumpet, he removed his Camp, and went another way; and having passed over Mount Amanus, he spoiled the Countrey under it, as far as the Region of CYRRESTACA. But Selencus followed him, and camped hard by him. Thereupon Demetrius suddenly armed his men, and went out by night to affault Selencus, and to take Demetrius deupon Demetrial numerity attended nothing. So that Selencus knew nothing of his fealing on him, but spating of his late enough, until that certain Traitors of Demetrial Camp that sled before, went quickly to sood faces, advertise him, finding him askeep, and brought him news of the danger he was in: Then Selencus affault Selections in a maze and fear withall got up, and founded the Alarm: and as he was putting on his hofe and cus by nighe; making him ready, he cried out (speaking to his friends and familiars about him) We have now a cruell and dangerous beaft to deal with. Demetrius on the other fide perceiving by the great stir and noile be heard in the Enemies Camp, that his enterprise was discovered, he retired again with speed, and the next morning by break of day, Selencus went and offered him Battle. Demetrius prepared himself to joyn with him, and having given one of his faithfull friends the leading of one of the Wings of his Army, himself led the other, and overthrew some of his Enemies on his side. But Selencus in the midft of the Battle lighted from his Horfe, and taking his Helmet from his head, he took a Target on his arm, and went to the first Ranks of his Army, to make himself known unto Demetrius men : periwading them to yield themselves unto him, and to acknowledge in the end. that he had so long time deferred to give them Battle, rather to fave them, then to spare Demetrius. Demetrius Souldiers hearing him fay so, they did him humble reverence, and acknowledging him for their King, they all yielded unto him. But when it was told him, he had no Victoria nor Provision left but leaves. onely to serve him that day, he began then to devise some other way. So hoping that with the fame Money he might fly to the Sea, they took their way by night directly to the top of the Mountain. But when they perceived that the Enemies kept Warch there, and that there were great flore of fires hard by them, they then despaired to pass any further; left they should be feen. So they turned to the felf fame place from whence they came, not all of them, for fome of them fled: neither had they that remained also any life in them, as before. So one amongst the reft took upon him to fay, that there was no other way to escape, but to put Demetrius into Selenens hands. Demetrine therewithall drew our his Sword, and would have flain himself: but his friends about him would not fuffer him, but perswaded him to yield himself unto Seleneus. Thereupon he fent unto Selucus, to tell him that he yielded himfelf unto him. Thereupon immediately he called for the Officers of his houfhold, and commanded them to fet up his richeft Pavillion, and to prepare all things meet to receive him honourably. There was one Apollonides a Gentleman in Seleucus Court, who sometime had been very familiar with Demessius: him Seleucus sent immediately unto Demessius. to will him to be of good cheer, and not to be afraid to come unto the King his Mafter, for he should find him his very good friend. So foon as the Kings pleasure was known, a few of his Courtiers went at the first to meet him : but afterwards, every man strived who should go meet him first, because they were all in hope that he should presently be much made of, and grow in credit with Seleucus. But hereby they turned Seleucus pitry incoenvy, and gave occasion also to Demetrius Enemies and fpightfull men, to turn the Kings bountifull good nature from him. For they put into his head many doubts and dangers, faying, that certainly fo foon as the Souldiers faw him there would grow great stir and change in their Camp. And therefore shortly after that Apollonides was come unto Demetriat, being glad to bring him thefe good news, and as others also followed him one after another, bringing him some good news from Selenens: and that Demetrius himself after so great an overthrow (although that before he thought it a shamefull part of him to have yielded his body into his Enemies hands) changed his mind at that time, and began then to grow bold, and to have good hope to recover his state again: behold there came one of Selencus Captains called Paulanias, accompanied with a thousand Footmen and Horsemen in all, who compassed in Demerrius with Demetrias kept them, and made the rest depart that were come unto him before; having charge given him not to bring asprisoner in him to the Court, but to convey him into CHERRONESUS of SYRIA, whither he was brought Spriaby Stew and ever after had a strong Garrison about him to keep him. But otherwise, Seleucus sent him Officers, Money, and all things elle meet for a Princes house : and his ordinary Pare was to delicate, that he could with for no more then he had. And furthermore, he had places of liberty and pleasure appointed him, both to ride his Horfe in, and also pleasant Walks, and goodly Arbours to walk or fir in, and fine Parks full of Beafts where he might bunt : moreover, the King fuftered his own houfhold Servants that followed him when he fled, to remain with him if they would. And furthermore, there daily came some one or other unto him from Seleucus, to comfort him, and to put him in hope, that as foon as Antiochus and Stratonice were come, they would make fome good agreement and peace between them. Demetrins remaining in this state, wrote unto his Son Antigonus, and to his friends and Lieutenants which he had at CORINTH and ATHENS, that they should give no credit to any Letters written in his Name, though his Seal were to them : but that shey (hould keep the Towns they had in charge for his, and likewife all the reft of his Forces, as if himfelf were dead. When Antigonus heard the pitifull captivity of his Father the marvellous gricevoully took his love of Anti-bard fortune, wearing blacks for forrow, and wrote unto all the other Kings, but unto Sciences specially, befeeching him to take him as a pledge for his Father, and that he was ready to yield up all that he kept, to have his Fathers liberty. The like request did many Cities make unto him, and in manner all Princes, but Lyfinachus: who promited Selencus a great film of Moneyto pur Demerius to death. But Selencus, who of long time had no great fancy to Lyfimachus, but rather unterly de-fpifed him, did then think him the more cruell and barbarous, for this vile and wacked request he made unto him. Wherefore he still delayed time, because he would have Demetriate delivered by his Son Antiochus and Stratonices means, for that Demerius should be bound to them for his delivery, and for ever should acknowledge it to them. Now for Demetrius, as he from the beginning patiently took his hard fortune, so did he daily more and more forger the misery he was in. For first of all, he gave himself to riding and hunting, as far as the place gave him liberty. Then by Denutriss little and little he grew to be very groß, and to give over fuch passimes, and therewithall he fell turned history into drunkenness and dicing: so that in that fort he passed away the most part of his time (as it tivity into should seem either to avoid the grievous thoughts of his hard fortune, which came into his mind when he was fober; or elfe under colour of drunkenness and eating, thadow the thoughts he had or elfe finding in himself that it was that manner of life he had long defired, and that through his vain ambition and folly till that time he could never attain unto; greatly surmoyling and troubling himself and others, supposing to find in Wars, by Sea and Land, the selicity and delight which he had found in ease and idleness, when he neither thought of it, nor looked for it. For what better end can evil and unadvised Kings and Princes look for, of all their troubles, dangers, and Wars? who indeed decrive themselves greatly, not onely for that they follow their pleasure and delights as their chiefest selicity, instead of vertue and bonest life; but allo, breause that in teach they cannot be merry and take their pleasure as they would. So Demerries after he had been shut up in CHERRONESUS three years together, by ease, groffness, and drunkennefs, fell fick of a disease whereof he died, when he was four and fifty years old. Therefore was Se- The death of Lucus greatly blamed, and he himself also did much repenthim that he so suspected him ashe did, and Demetrius in that he followed not Dromichetes courtesie, a barbarous man born in THRACIA, who had so royally Cherronesia: and courteoully intreated Lysimachus, whom he had taken prisoner in the Wars: But yet there was fome Tragical Pomp in the order of his Funeral. For his Son Antigonus understanding that they brought him the ashes of his Body, he took Sea with all his Ships, and went to meet them, to receive them in the Isles: and when he had received them, he fet up the Funeral Pot of Gold (in the which were his embers) upon the poop of his Admiral Galley. So all the Cities and Towns whereby they paffed or harboured, some of them did put Garlands of Flowers about the Pot, others also sent a number of men thither in mourning Apparel, to accompany and honour the convoy, to the very Solemnity of his Funerals. In this fort failed all the whole Fleet towards the City of CORINTH, the Pot being plainly The Funerals feen far off, standing on the top of the Admiral Galley: all the place about it being hanged with Pur- of Demetries, ple : and over it, the Diadem or Royal Band; and about it, also were goodly young men armed, which ple; and over it, the Diaucia or royal paint; amanous aparts and spoul; young in that time, were as Pentioners to Demetrius. Furthermore, Xenophantus the famouted Multicain in that time, Xenophantus a being fet hard by it, played a sweet and lamentable Song on the Flute, wherewith all the Oars keep- famous Musiciing troke and measure, the found did meet with a gallant grace, as in a convoy where the Mourners and do knock their breafts at the foot of every Verse. But that which most made the People of CORINTH to weep and lament, which ran to the Pier, and all alongst the shore side to see it, was Antigonus. whom they faw all beblubbered with tears, apparelled as a Mourner in Blacks. Now after they had brought a wonderfull number of Garlands and Nofegays, and cast them upon the Funeral Pot, and had Solemnized all the honours possible for the Funerals at Coninth, Antigonus carried away the Por to bury it in the City of DEMETRIADE, the which bare the Name of Demetrius that was dead, and was a new City, that had been replenished with People, and built of little Towns which are about IO Lco's. Demetrius left two Children by his first Wife Phila, to wit, Antigonus and Stratonice: and Demetrius potwo other Sons, both of them named Demetrius, the one firnamed the lean, of a Woman of ILLY- flerity, RIA, and the other, King of the CYRENIANS, of his Wife Ptolemaide: and another by Deidamia called Alexander, who lived in ÆGYPT. And it is reported also, that he had another Son called Corrhabus, by his Wife Euridice, and that his Posterity reigned by Succession from the Father to the Son, untill the time of Perfeus: who was the laft King of MACEDON, whom the ROMANS overcameby Perfeus, the Paulus Amylius, and wan all the Realm of MACEDO N unto the Empire of Rome. and therefore his Wife would not let him use his liberality and frank nature. One day a friend of his coming to him to pray him to help him to some Money, having great need, Antonius by chance had no Money to give him, but he commanded one of his men to bring him some water in a Silver Bason; and after he had brought it him, he washed his beard as though he meant to have shaven it, and then found an errand for his man to fend him out, and gave his friend the Silver Bason, and bad him get him Money with that. Shortly after, there was a great stir in the house among the Servants, feeking out of this Silver Bason. Insomuch as Antonius feeing his Wife marvelloully offended for it, and that the would examine all her Servants, one after another about it, to know what was become of it, at length he confessed he had given it away, and prayed her to be contented. His Wife was Julia, of the noble house and Family of Julius Cesar: who for her vertue and chastity, was to be compared with the noblest Lady of her time. Marcus Antonius was brought up under her, being married after her first Husbands death, unto Cornelius Lennulus, whom Cicero put to death with Cethegus and others, for that he was of Catilines conspiracy against the Commonwealth. And this feemeth to be the Original cause and beginning of the cruel and mortal hate Antonius bareunto Cicero. For Antonius self faith, that he would never give him the Body of his Father-in-law to bury him, before his Mother went first to entreat Cicero's Wife: the which undoubtedly was a flat lie. For Cicero denied burial to none of them whom he executed by law. Now Antonius being a fair young man, and in the prime of his youth, he fell acquainted with Curio, whose friendship and acquaintance (as it is reported) was a plague unto him. For he was a dissolute man, given over to all lust and infolency, who to have Antonius the better at his commandment, trained him on into great follies, and vain expences upon Women, in rioting and banqueting : fo that in short time, he brought Antonius into a marvellous great debt, and too great

Thereupon he left ITALY, and went into GREECE, and there bestowed the most part of his time, fometime in Wars, and other while in the fludy of Eloquence. He used a manner of phrase in his speech, called Asiatick, which carried Antonias used the best grace and estimation at that time, and was much like to his manners and life: for it was full of in his pleading oftentation, foolish bravery, and vain ambition. After he had remained there some time, Gabinius Pro-Conful going into Syria, perswaded him to go with him; Amonius told him he would not go as a private man : wherefore Gabinius gave him charge of his Horfemen , and fo took him Antonius had with him. so, first of all he tent him against Aristobulus, who had made the Jevvs to rebel, and charge of with him. But Antonius that fought but for opportunity and good octafion to attempt great enterprises, and that defired also to gratifie Ptolomies request, he went about to perswade Gabinius to go this Voyage. Now they were more afraid of the way they should go, to come to the City of PELUSIUM, then they feared any danger of the War besides : because they were to pass through deep fands and defert places, where was no fresh water to be had all the Marishes through, which are called the Marishes Serbonides, which the ÆGYPTIANS call the Exhalations or Fume, by the which the Giant Typhon breathed. But in truth it appeareth to be the overflowing of the red Sea, which breaketh out under the ground in that place where it is divided in the narroweft place from the Sea on this fide. Antonius was fent before into ÆGYPT with his Horlemen, who did not onely Antonius acts win that passage, but also took the City of Perusium (which is a great City) with all the Souldiers in Expre unin it: and thereby he cleared the way, and made it fafe for all the reft of the Army, and the hope of det Gabinius. the Victory also certain for his Captain. Now did the Enemies themselves feel the fruits of Antonius courtese, and the desire he had to win honour : for when Ptolomy (after he had entered into the City of PELUSIUM) for the malice he bare unto the City, would have put all the ÆGYP-TIANS in it to the Sword, Antonius withftood him, and by no means would fuffer him to do it. And in all other great Battels and skirmishes which they fought, being many in number, Antonius did many noble Acts of a valiant and wife Captain : but specially in one Battel, where he compassed in the Enemies behind, giving them the Victory that fought in front, whereby he afterwards had fuch honourable reward, as his valiantness deserved. So was his great courtesse also much commended of all, the which he shewed unto Archelans : for having been his very friend, he made War Antonius courwith him against his will while he lived, but after his death he fought for his Body, and gave it honourable buriall. For these respects he wan himself great same of them of ALEXANDRIA, and dead, he was also thought a worthy man of all the Souldiers in the ROMANS Camp. But besides all this, he had a noble prefence, and shewed a countenance of one of a noble house; he had a goodly thick beard, a broad forehead, crooked nofed, and there appeared fuch a manly look in his countenance, as is commonly feen in Hercules Pictures, stamped or graved in Mettall. Now it had been a speech of old time, that the Family of the Antonij were descended from one Anton the Son of and presence. Hercules, whereof the Family took Name. This Opinion did Antonius feek to confirme in all his doings : not onely relembling him in the likenels of his Body , as we have faid before, but also in The house of the wearing of his Garments. For when he would openly shew himself abroad before many Peo- the Antonis deple, he would alwaies wear his Caffock girt down low upon his hippes, with a great Sword hanging by his fide, and upon that, fome ill-favoured Cloak. Furthermore, things that feem intollerable in other men, as to boaft commonly, to jeft with one or other, to drink like a good fel- rality. low with every body, to fit with the Souldiers when they dine, and to eat and drink with them fouldier-like, it is incredible what wonderfull love it wan him amongst them. And furthermore, being given to love, that made him the more defired, and by that means he brought many to love him. For he would further every mans love, and also would not be angry that men should merrily tell him of those he loved. But besides all this, that which most procured his rifing and advancement, was his liberality, who gave all to the Souldiers, and kept nothing for himself : and when he was grown to great credit, then was his Authority and Power also very great, the which notwithstanding himself did overthrow by a thousand other faults he had. In this place I will shew you one example onely of his wonderfull liberality. He commanded one day his Cofferer that kept his Money, to give a friend of his five and twenty Myriades, which the Ro-MANS call in their Tongue, Decies. His Cofferer marvelling at it, and being angry withal in his mind, brought him all this Money in a heap together, to thew him what a marvellous Mass of Money it was. Amonius feeing it as he went by, asked what it was : the Cofferer antwered him, It was the Money he willed him to give unto his friend. Then Antonius perceiving the spite of his man, I thought (faid he) that Decies had been a greater Sum of Money then it is, for this is but a trifle: and therefore he gave his friend as much more another time, but that was afterwards.

Now the ROMANS maintaining two factions at ROME at that time, one against the other, of the which, they that took part with the Senate did joyn with Pempey being then in ROME: and the contrary fide taking part with the People, fent for Cafar to aid them, who made Wars in Gau: then Curio, Antonius friend, that had changed his Garments, and at that time took part with Cafar, whose Enemy he had been before, he wan Amonius; and so handled the matter, partly through the great tredit and iway he bare amongst the People, by reason of his Eloquent Tongue, and partly allo by his exceeding expence of Money he made which Cefar gave him: that Amonus was cholen Tribune, and afterwards made Augure. But this was a great help and furtherance to Cefar's practiles. For lo foon as Amonius became Tribune, he did oppose himself against those things which the Confull Marcellus preferred (who ordained that certain Legions which had been already levied and billed, should be given unto Chens Pompey, with further Commission and authority to lesy others unto them) and fee down an Order, that the fouldiers which were already levied and affembled, should be fent into Syria for a new supply unto Marcus Bibulus, who made War at that time against the PARTHIANS. And further, gave a prohibition that Pompey should ley no more men, and allo that the Souldiers should not obey him. Secondly, where Pompey's friends and followers would not fuffer Cafar's Letters to be received, and openly read in the Senate, Antonius having power and warrant by his Person, through the holiness of his Tribuneship, did read them openly, and made divers men change their minds : for it appeared to them that Cefar by his Letters required no unreasonable matters. At length, when they preferred two matters of confideration unto the Senate, whether they thought good that Pompey or Cefar should leave their Army, there were few of the Senators that thought it meet Pompey should leave his Army, but they all in manner commanded Cefar todo it. Then Antonius rifing up, asked whether they thought it good that Pompey and Cefar both, should leave their Armies. Thereupon all the Senators joyntly together gave their whole confent, and with a great cry commending Amonius, they prayed him to refer it to the judgement of the Senate. But the Confuls would not allow of that: Therefore Cefar's friends preferred other reasonable demands and requests again, but Cato spake against them; and Lemulus, one of the Consuls drave Antonius by force out of the Asterius flicth Senate, who at his going out made grievous curies against him. After that, he took a Slaves from Rome un-Gown, and speedily fled to Cefar, with Quintus Cassium, in a hired Coach. When they came to Cefar, they cried out with open mouth, that all went hand over head at ROME: for the Tribunes of the People might not speak their minds; and were driven away in great danger of their lives, as many as flood with Law and Juftice. Hereupon Cefar went incontinently into ITALY with his Army, which made Cicero say in his Philippides: That as Hellen was cause of the War of Troy, fo was Antonius the Author of the Civil Wars; which indeed was a stark lie. For Cefar was not fo fickle headed, nor fo eafily carried away with anger, that he would fo fuddenly have gone and made War with his Countrey, upon the fight onely of Antonius and Cassius, being fled to him in miserable Apparell, and in a hired Coach, had he not long before determined it with himfelf. But fith indeed Cefar looked of long time but for fome colour, this came as he withed, and gave him just occasion of War. But to fay truly, nothing else moved him to make War with all the World as he did, but one felf caufe, which first procured Alexander and Cyrus allo Alexander, C)all contended in the World; the which he could not come unto, before he had put down Pompey, and utterly overthrown him. Now after that Cofer had gotten Rome at his commandment, and had driven vertification of ITALY, he purposed first to go into Spain against the Legions Pompey had there:

Pompey out of ITALY, he purposed first to go into Spain against the Legions Pompey had there and the onely and in the mean time to make provision for Ships and marine preparation, to follow Pompey. In his ablence, he left Lepidus that was Prætor Governour of Rome: and Antonius that was Tribune, Cafe gave the he gave him charge of all the Souldiers, and of ITALY. Then was Amonian straight marvellously charge of Italy commended and beloved of the Souldiers, because he commonly exercised himlest among them, unto Antonias, and would oftentimes eat and drink with them, and also be liberall unto them, according to his ability. But then in contrary manner, he purchased divers other mens evil wills, because that through negligence he would not do them justice that were injured, and dealt very churlishly with them that had any fuit unto him: and befides all this, he had an ill name to entice mens Wives. To conclude, Cafar's friends that governed under him, were cause why they hated Cafar's Government (which indeed in respect of himself was no less then a tyranny) by reason of the great insoloneis and outragious parts that were committed: amongst whom Antonius that was of greatest power, and that allo committed greatest faults, deserved most blame. But Cafar notwithstanding, when he returned from the Wars of Spain, made no reckoning of the complaints that were put up against him: but contrarily, because he found him a hardy man, and a valiant Captain, he employed him in his chiefest affairs, and was no whit deceived in his opinion of him. So he passed over the IONI-AN Sea unto Brundusium, being but slenderly accompanied, and sent unto Antonius and Gabinim, that they should imbark their men as soon as they could, and pass them over into MACE-DON. Gabinium was afraid to take the Sea, because it was very rough, and in the Winter-time : and therefore fetched a great compass about by Land. But Antonius staring some danger might come unto Cafar, because he was compassed in with a great number of Enemies, first of all he drave away Libo, who rode at Anchor with a great Army before the Haven of BRUNDUS tum. For he manned out such a number of Pinnaces, Barks, and other small Boats about every one of his Galleys, that he drave him thence. After that, he imbarked into Ships twenty thouland Footmen, and eight hundred Horsemen, and with this Army he hoised fail. When the Enemies saw him, they made out to follow him: but the Sea role fo high, that the billows put back their Galleys that they could keth Sea wift not come near him, and so he scaped that danger. But withall he fell upon the Rocks with his whole his Army at Fleet, where the Sea wrought very high, so that he was out of all hope to fave himself. Yet by Branduffum, good fortune, suddenly the Wind turned South west, and blew from the gulf, driving the waves and goeth unto of the River into the main Sea. Thus Antonius loofing from the Land, and failing with fafety at Cafar. his pleasure, soon after he saw all the Coasts full of Shipwracks. For the force and boisterousness of the wind did cast away the Galleys that followed him: of the which, many of them were broken and splitted, and divers also cast away : and Antonins took a grear number of them Prisoners, with a great fum of Money also. Besides all these, he took the City of Lysus, and brought Casar Antonias mana great supply of men, and made him couragious, coming at a pinch with so great a power to him. hood in War. Now there were divers hot Skirmishes and Encounters, in the which Antonius fought fo valiantly, that he carried the praise from them all: but specially at two several times, when Cafar's men airsted their backs, and fled for life. For he flepped before them, and compelled them to return again to fight: fo that the Victory fellon Cafar's fide. For this cause he had the second place in the Camp among the Souldiers, and they spake of no other man unto Cofar, but of him: who shewed plainly what opinion he had of him, when at the last Battle of PHARSALIA (which indeed was the last triall of all, to give the Conqueror the whole Empire of the World) he himself did lead the right Wing of his Army, and gave Antonius the leading of the left Wing, as the valiantest Antonius led man and skillfulleft Souldier of all those he had about him. After Cafar had won the Victory, and the left Wing man and skillfulleft Souldare of altitude nemad about nim. After Lajar nau won the victory, and that he was created Dictator, he followed *Pompey step by step: howbeir, before he named Anto dea *Phulitis, dea *Phul mins Generall of the Horsemen, and sent him to Rome. The Generall of the Horsemen is the se-where Postgrid rond Office of Dignity, when the Dictator is in the City : but when he is abroad, he is the chiefest lost the Field, man, and almost the onely man that remaineth, and all the other Officers and Magistrates are put The Dignity down, after there is a Dictator cholen. Notwithstanding, Dolabella being at that time Tribune, and of the General a young man desirous of change and innovation, he preferred a Law which the ROMANS call No- men, was Tabulas (as much to fay, as a cutting off and cancelling of all Obligations and Specialties; and were called New tables, because they were driven then to make Books of daily receit and expence) and perswaded Anonius his friend (who also gaped for a good occasion to please and gratifie the common People) to aid him to pass this Law. But Trebelliur and Assimus disswaded from it all they could possible. So by good hap it chanced that Antonius mistrusted Dolabella for keeping of Diffention behis Wife, and took such a conceit of it, that he thrust his Wife out of his house, being his Cousin twixt Antonius German, and the Daughter of C. Annonius who was Conful with Cicero; and joyning with Ali- and Dolabella. nim, he resisted Dolabella, and fought with him. Dolabella had gotten the Market-place, where the People do affemble in Council, and had filled it full of armed men, intending to have this Law of the New tables to pass by force. Antonius by commandment of the Senate, who had given him authority to levy men, and to ule force against Dolabella, went against him, and fought so valiantly, that men were slain on both sides. But by this means he got the ill will of the common People; and on the other side, the Noble men (as Cicero faith) did not onely mislike him, but also hate him for his naughty life: for they did abhor his banquets and drunken Feafts he made at unfeafonable times, and his extream waltfull expences upon vain light houswives; and then in the day time he would fleep or walk out his drunkenness, thinking to wear away the fume of the abundance of Wine which he had taken over-night. In his house they did nothing but feast, dance, and mask: and himself passed away the time in hearing of soolish Plays, and marrying these Players, Tumblers, lefters, and furth fort of People. As for proof hereof it is reported, that at Hippins matriage, minule life. one of his Jesters, he drank Wine so lustily all night, that the next morning when he came to plead before the People affembled in Council, who had fent for him, he being queafie fromacked with his Surfeit he had taken, was compelled to lay up all before them, and one of his friends held him his Antonius laid Gown instead of a Bason. He had another pleasant Player called Sergins, that was one of the chiefest up his stomack men about him, and a Woman also called Cytheride, of the same profession, whom he loved dearly: before the he carried her up and down in a Litter unto all the Towns he went, and had as many men waiting biy. apon her Litter (fine being but a Player) as were attending upon his own Mother. It grieved ho- Antonias infometh men also very much, to see that when he went into the Countrey he carried with him a great lency. trumber of Cup-boards full of Silver and Gold Plate openly in the face of the World, as it had been the pomp or shew of some Triumph : and that effsoons in the middest of his journey he would Let up his Halls and Tents hard by some green Grove or pleasant River, and there his Cooks should prepare him a sumptuous Dinner. And surthermore, Lions were harnessed in Traces to draw his Carts: and befides also, in honest mens houses in the Cities where he came, he would have common Harlots, Curtizans, and these tumbling gillots lodged. Now it grieved men much, to see that Cafar should be out of ITALY following of his Enemies, to end this great War with such great peril and danger, and that others in the mean time abusing his name and authority, should commit such infolent and outragious parts upon their Citizens. This methinks was the cause that made the conspiracy against Cafar increase more and more, and laid the reines of the bridle upon the Souldiers necks, whereby they durft more boldly commit many extortions, cruelties and robberies. he made it very ftrange, and was offended with them; and writeth himfelf that he would not go with Cefar into the Wars of Africk, because he was not well recompensed for the service he had done him before. Yet Cafer did fomewhat bridle his madness and infolency, not fuffering him to pass his faults so lightly away, making as though he saw them not. And therefore he leit Antonias mar his diffolute manner of life, and married Fulvia that was Clodias Widow, a Woman not so basely minded to spend her time in spinning and houswivery; and was not contented to master her Husband at home, but would also rule him in his Office abroad, and commanded him that commanded Legions and great Armies: fo that Cleopatra was to give Fulvia thanks for that she had taught Antonius this obedience to Women, that learned so well to be at their commandment. Now, because Fulvia was somewhat sowre and crooked of condition, Antonius devised to make her pleafanter, and somewhat better disposed: and therefore he would play her many pretty youthfull parts to make her merry. As he did once, when Casar returned the last time of all Conquerour out of SPAIN, every man went out to meet him, and so did Antonisus with the rest. But on the fudden there ran a rumour through ITALY, that Cafar was dead, and that his Enemies came again with a great Army. Thereupon he returned with speed to ROME, and took one of his mens Gowns, and so apparelled came home to his house in a dark night, saying, that he had brought Fulvia Letters from Amonius. So he was let in, and brought to her muffled as he was, for being known : but she taking the matter heavily, asked him if Antonisa were well. Antonias gave her the Letters, and faid never a word. So when she had opened the Letters, and began to read them, Antonius ramped on her neck, and kissed her. We have told you this tale for examples sake onely, and so could we also tell you of many such like as these. Now when Casar was returned from his last War in SPAIN, all the chiefest Nobility of the City rode many days journey from Roms to meet him, where Cafar made marvellous much of Antonius above all the men that came unto him. For he always took him into his Coach with him throughout all ITALY, and behind him Brutus Albinus and Oftavius the Son of his Neece, who afterwards was called Cafar and Cafar and As- became Emperor of ROME long time after. So Cafar being afterwards cholen Conful the fifth time, tonius Confuls. he immediately chose Antonius his Colleague and Companion: and defired by deposing himself of his Consulship, to make Dolabella Consul in his room, and had already moved it to the Senate. But Antonius did stoutly withstand it, and openly reviled Dolabella in the Senate, and Dolabella also spared him as little. Thereupon Cefar being ashamed of the matter, he let it alone. Another time also when Casar attempted again to substitute Dolabella Consul in his place, Antonius cryed out, that the figns of the Birds were against it: so that at length Cafar was compelled to give him place, and to let Dolabella alone, who was marvelloully offended with him. Now in truth, Cafar made no great reckoning of either of them both. For it is reported that Cafar answered one that did accufe Antonius and Dolabella unto him for fome matter of conspiracy : Tush said he, they be not those fat fellows and fine combed men that I fear, but I mistrust rather these pale and lean men, meaning by Brut us and Cassius, who afterwards conspired his death and slew him. Antonius unawares wittingly gave afterwards gave Cafar's Enemies just occasion and colour to do as they did : as you shall hear. The ROMANS by chance celebrated the Feaft called Lupercalia, and Cafar being apparelled in his triumphing Robe, was fet in the Tribune where they use to make their Orations to the People, and from thence did behold the sport of the Runners. The manner of this running was thus: On that day there are many young men of noble house, and those specially that be chief Officers for that year, who running naked up and down the City, anointed with the Oyl of Olive, for pleasure to strike them they meet in their way, with white Leather Thongs they have in their hands. Anonius being one among the rest that was to run, leaving the ancient Ceremonies and old Customs of that Solemnity, he ran to the Tribune where Cafar was fet, and carried a Lawrell Crown in his hand, having a Royal Band or Diadem wreathed about it, which in old time was the ancient mark and token of a King. When he was come to Cefar, he made his fellow Runners with him lift him up, and Antonius Lu- fo he did put his Lawrell Crown upon his head, fignifying thereby that he had deferved to be King. persin puttern But Cafar making as though he refuted it, turned away his head. The People were so rejoiced at it, that they all clapped their hands for joy. Antonius again did put it on his head : Cafar again refuled it; and thus they were firwing off and on a great while together. As oft as Antonius did put this Lawrell Crown unto him, a few of his followers rejoyced at it : and as oft also as Cefer refuled it, all the People together clapped their hands. And this was a wonderfull thing, that they furfered all things, subjects should do by commandment of their King: and yet they could not abide the Name of a King, detefting it as the uter deftruction of their Liberty. Lefar in a rage arose out of his Sea, and plucking down the choller of his Gown from his neck, he shewed it naked, bidding any man ftrike off his head that would. This Lawrell Crown was afterwards put upon the head of one of Cafor's Statues or Images, the which one of the Tribunes pluckt off. The People liked his doing therein fo well, that they waited on him home to his house, with great clapping of hands. Howbeit Cafar did turn them out of their Offices for it. This was a good encouragement for Brutus and Caffin to Bruin and conspire his death, who sell into a consort with their trustiest friends, to execute their enterprise, but Cefor's death, yet flood doubtfull whether they should make Ansonius privy to it or not. All the rest liked of it, is-ving Treboniss onely. He told them, that when they rode to meet Cafar at his return out of SPAIN, Antonim and he always keeping company, and lying together by the way, he felt his mind afar off; but Amonius finding his meaning, would hearken no more unto it, and yet not with flanding never made Cesar acquainted with this talk, but had faithfully kept it to himself. After that they consulted whether they should kill Antonius with Cafar. But Brutus would in no wife Consultation confent to it, faying, that venturing on fuch an enterprise as that, for the maintenance of Law and about the murinflice, it ought to be clear from all villany. Yet they fearing Antonins power, and the Authority theref Antoniof his Office, appointed certain of the conspiracy, that when Cafar was gone into the Senate, as with Cafar. and while others should execuse their enterprise, they should keep Antonius in a talk out of the Senate-house. Even as they had devised these matters, so were they executed : and Cofar was flainin the middeft of the Senate. Antonius being put in a fear withall, cast a Slaves Gown upon him. and hid himfelf. Bur afterwards when it was told him that the Murtherers flew no man elfe, and that they went onely into the Capitol, he fent his Son unto them, for a pledge, and had them holdly come down upon his word. The felf fame day he did bid Caffins to Supper, and Lepidus also bad-Brutus. The next morning the Senate was affembled, and Antonius himself preferred a Law, that all things past should be forgotten, and that they should appoint Provinces unto Cassius and Brutus : the which the Senate confirmed, and further ordained, that they should cancel one of Calar's Laws, This went Antonius out of the Senate more praifed and better efteemed then ever man was, because reemed to every man that he had cut off all occasion of Civil Wars, and that he had shewed himself a marvellous wile Governour of the Commonwealth, for the appealing of these matters of to great weight and importance. But now, the opinion he conceived of himfelf after he had a little felt the good will of the People towards him, hoping thereby to make himself the chiefest man if he might overcome Brutus, did eafily make him alter his first mind. And therefore when Cafor's body was brought to the place where it should be buried, he made a Funeral Oration in commendation of Cafar, according to the ancient cultom of praifing noble men at their Funerals. When he saw that the People were very glad and desirous also to hear Casar spoken of, and his praises uttered, he mingled his Oration with lamentable words; and by amplifying of matters did greatly move their hearts and affections unto pitty and compassion. In fine to conclude his Oration, he unfolded before the whole Affembly the bloody Garments of the dead, thrust through in many places with their Swords, and called the Malefactors, cruel and curied Murtherers. With these words he Antonius maput the People into fuch a fury, that they prefently took Cufar's Body, and burnt it in the Market- keth uproof aplace, with such Tables and Forms as they could get together. Then when the fire was kind-mong the Peoled, they took fire-brands, and ran to the Murtherers houses to set them on fire, and to make them ple tor the murther of Casar. come out to fight. Bruins therefore and his accomplices, for fafety of their persons were driven to By the City. Then came all Cefars friends unto Antonius, and specially his Wife Calpurnia putting Calpurnia, Caher trust in him, the brought the most part of her Money into his house, which amounted to the sur's Wife. Sum of four thousand Talents; and furthermore brought him all Cafar's Books and Writings, in the which were his Memorials of all that he had done and ordained. Antonius did daily mingle with them such as he thought good, and by that means he created new Officers, made new Senators, calledhome some that were banished, and delivered those that were Prisoners: and then he said, that all those things were fo appointed and ordained by Cafer. Therefore the ROMANS mocking them that were fo moved, they called them CHARONITES, because that when they were overcome, they had no other help but to fay, that thus they were found in Cafar's Memorials, who had failed fo called. in Charen's Boat, and was departed. Thus Antonius ruled absolutely also in all other matters, be- M. Antonius cause he was Consul, and Cains one of his Brethren Prator, and Lucius the other Tribune. Antonius at the first made no reckoning of him, because he was very young, and faid, he lacked wit, and good friends to advise him, if he looked to take fuch a charge in hand, as to undertake to be Cefar's Heir. But when Antonius faw Variance hethat he could not shake him off with those words, and that he was ftill in hand with him for his Fa- twist Antonias thers Goods, but specially for the ready Money, then he spake and did what he could against him, and Offavius And first of all, it was he that did keep him from being Tribune of the People; and also when Otta unto Julius evius Cafan began to meddle with the dedicating of the Chair of Gold, which was prepared by Cafar. the Senate to honour Cafar with, he threatned to fend him to Prison, and moreover defifted not to put the People in an uproar. This young Cafar feeing his doings, went unto Cicero and others, which were Antonius Enemies, and by them crept into favour with the Senate: and he himfelf fought the Peoples good will every manner of way, gathering together the old Souldiers of the late Odlavies Cafar deceased Cefer, which were dispersed in divers Ciries and Colonies. Antonius being afraid of it, trienship with talked with Officias in the Capitol, and became his friend. But the very fame night Antonius had Ciccro. a ftrange Dream, who thought that lightning fell upon him, and burnt his right hand. Shortly Antonius and after word was brought him, that Cafar lay in wait to kill him. Cafar cleared himself unto him Offavins beand rold him there was no fuch matter; but he could not make Antonius believe the contrary. Whereupon they became further Enemies then ever they were: infomuch that both of them Dream, made friends of either fide to gather together all the Souldiers through ITALY, that were dispersed in divers Towns ; and made them large promises, and sought also to win the Legions on their fide, which were already in arms. Cicero on the other fide being at that time the chiefest man of authority and estimation in the City, he stirred up all men against Antonius: so that in the Antonia judg end he made the Senate pronounce him an Enemy to his Countrey, and appointed young Cafar's Sergeams to carry Axes before him, and such other signs as were incident to the Dignity of a Conby the Senate. ful or Prator : and moreover fent Hircim and Panfa, then Confuls, to drive Antonius out of Hirats and Panis Out of Panis Onfuls. IT ALY. Their two Confuls together with Cafar, who also had an Army, went against Amoniss that befieged the City of MODENA, and there overthrew him in Battle: but both the Confuls Antonius over- were flain there. Antonius flying upon this overthrow, fell into great mifery all at once : but the thrown in Bat- chiefest want of all other, and that pinched him most, was samine. Howbeit he was of such a strong the by the City nature, that by patience he would overcome any advertity, and the heavier fortune lay upon him, of Modera.

Antonias parithe more confrant shewed be himself. Every man that seeleth want or adversity, knoweth by Verent in adverti- tue and discretion what he should do: when indeed they are overlaid, with extremity, and be fore oppressed, sew have the hearts to follow that which they praise and commend, and much less to avoid that they reprove and millike : but rather to the contrary, they yield to their accustomed eafie life, and through faint-heart, and lack of courage, do change their first mind and purpose. And therefore it was a wonderfull example to the Souldiers, to fee Antonius that was brought up in Antonias hard- all finencis and superfluity, so easily to drink puddle water, and to eat wild Fruits and Roots: and ness in adverti- moreover it is reported, that even as they passed the Alpes, they did eat the barks of Trees, and fuch Beafts as never man tafted of their flesh before. Now their intent was to joyn with the Legions that were on the other fide of the Mountains, under Lepidus charge: whom Antonius took to be his friend, because he had holpen him to many things at Casar's hand, through his means. When he was come to the place where Lepidus was, he camped hard by him: and when he faw that no man came to him to put him in any hope, he determined to venture himself, and to go unto Lepidus. Since the overthrow he had at MODENA, he fuffered his beard to grow at length and never clipt it, that it was marvellous long, and the hair of his head also without combing: and besides all this, he went in a mourning Gown, and after this fort came hard to the Trenches of Lepidus Camp.
Then he began to fpeak unto the Souldiers, and many of them their hearts yearned for pitty to fee him so poorly arrayed, and some also through his words began to pitty him : insomuch that Lepidus began to be afraid, and therefore commanded all the Trumpets to found together to ftop the Souldiers ears, that they should not hearken to Antonius. This notwithstanding, the Souldiers took the more pitty of him, and spake secretly with him by Clodius and Lalius means, whom they fent unto him disguised in Womans apparell, and gave him counsell that he should not be afraid to enter into their Camp, for there were a great number of Souldiers that would receive him, and kill Lepidus, if he would lay the word. Antonius would not fuffer them to hurt him, but the next moming he went with his Army to wade a foord, at a little River that ran between them: and himself was the foremost man that took the River to get over, seeing a number of Lepidus Camp that gave him their hands, plucked up the stakes, and layed flat the bank of their Trench to let him into their Camp. When he was come into their Camp, and that he had all the Army at his commandment, he used Lepidus very courteously, embraced him, and called him Father: and though indeed Amoni-Antonia; wan ses did all, and ruled the whole Army, yet he alway gave Lepidus the Name and Honour of the Capall Lepidus At- tain. Munacius Plancus, lying also in Camp hard by with an Army, understanding the report my from him. of Antonius courtefie, he also came and joyned with him. Thus Antonius being a foot again, and grown of great power, repalfed over the Alpes, leading into ITALE with him feventeen Legions, and ten thousand Horsemen, besides six Legions he left in Garrison among the Gauls, under the charge of one Varius, a Companion of his that would drink luftily with him, and therefore in mockery was surnamed Corylon, to wit, a bibber. So Octavius Cafar would not lean to Cicero, when he faw that his whole travell and endeavour was onely to reftore the Commonwealth to her former liberty. Therefore he fent certain of his friends to Antonius, to make them friends again: The configurey and thereupon all three met together (to wit, Cefar, Antonius and Lepidus) in an Island environed and meeting of a comparation, which a livel R liver and there remained three days together. Now as touching all other Gejar, Anno round about with a little River, and there remained three days together. Now as touching all other nius, and Lepi- matters, they were eafily agreed, and did divide all the Empire of ROME between them, as if it had been their own Inheritance. But yet they could hardly agree whom they would put to death: for every one of them would kill their Enemies, and fave their Kinfmen and friends. Yet at length, giving place to their greedy defire to be revenged of their Enemies, they spurned all reverence of Blood, and holiness of friendship at their feet. For Cafar left Cicero to Antonius will, Antonius alfo forfook Lucius Cafar, who was his Uncle by his Mother : and both of them together fuffered Lepidus to kill his own Brother Panlus. Yet fome Writers affirm, that Cafar and Amonius requested Paulus might be slain, and that Lepidus was contented with it. In my Opinion there was never a more horrible, unnatural, and crueller change then this was. For thus changing murther for murther, they did aswell kill those whom they did forsake and leave unto others, as those also which others left unto them to kill; but so much more was their wickedness and cruelty great unto their friends, for that they put them to death being innocents, and having no cause to hate them. After there plot was agreed upon between them, the Souldiers that were thereabouts, would have this friendship and league betwirt them confirmed by marriage, and that Cafar should marry Chaia, the Daughter of Fulvia Antonius Wife. This marriage also being agreed upon, they condemned three hundred of the chiefest Citizens of Rome, to be put to death by proscription. And Antonine alfo commanded them to whom he had given Commission to kill Cicero, that they should strike off his head and right hand, with the which he had written the invective Orations (called Philippides) against Antonius. So when the Murtherers brought him Geero's head and hand cut off, he beheld Antonius cruel them a long time with great joy, and laughed heartily, and that oftentimes for the great joy he felt, ty unto Citerio. Then when he had taken his pleasure of the fight of them, he caused them to be fet up in an open place, over the Pulpit for Orations (where when he was alive, he had often spoken to the People.) as if he had done the dead man hurt, and not blemished his own fortune, shewing himself (to his great shame and infamy) a cruell man, and unworthy the Office and authority he bare. His Uncle Lucisu Cafar alfo, as they fought for him to kill him, and followed him hard, fled unto his Sifter The murderers coming thither, forcing to break into her Chamber, the flood at her Chamber door with her arms abroad, crying out still : You shall not kill Lucius Cafar, before you first kill Lucius Cafar's me, that bare your Captain in my Womb. By this means the faved her Brothers life. Now the life faved, by Government of these Triumviri grew odious and hatefull to the ROMANS, for divers respects; his Sister. but they most blamed Antonius, because he being elder then Cafar, and of more power and force in his Trium then Lepidus, gave himself again to his former riot and excess, when he lest to deal in the Affairs virate. of the Commonwealth. But fetting aside the ill Name he had for his insolency, he was yet much The praise of more hated in respect of the house he dwelt in, the which was the house of Pompey the Great : a Pompey the man as famous for his temperance, modefty, and civill life, as for his three Triumphs. For it grieved them to fee the gates commonly thut against the Captains, Magistrates of the City, and also Ambassadors of strange Nations which were sometimes thrust from the gate with violence; and that the house within was full of Tumblers, Antick Dancers, Juglers, Players, Jesters, and Drunkards quaffing and guzling; and that on them he bestowed the most part of his Money he got by all kind of possible extortions, bribery and policy. For they did not onely fell by the Cryer the goods of those whom they had out-lawed and appointed to murder, flanderoully deceiving the poor Widows and young Orphans, and also raised all kinds of Imposts, Subsidies and Taxes: but notwithstanding also that the holy Vestall Nuns had certain goods and money put in their custody to keep, both of mens in the City, and those also that were abroad, they went thither, and took them away by force. Ottavim Cesar perceiving that no Money would serve Amonius turn, he prayed that they might divide the Money between them, and to did they also divide the Army, for them both to go into MACEDON to make War against Brutus and Cassims: and in the mean time they left the Government of the City of Rome unto Lepidus. When they had paffed over the Seas, and that they began to make War, they being both camped by their Enemies, to wit, Antonius against Cassiss, and Cafar against Brutus, Cafar did no great matter, but Antonius had alway the upper Theyalianthand, and did all. For at the first Battle Cefar was overthrown by Brutus, and lost his Camp, nels of Antoniand very hardly faved himfelf by flying from them that followed him. Howbeit he writeth him- # against Brufelf in his Commentaries, that he fled before the Charge was given, because of a Dream one of his trafriends had. Antonius on the other fide overthrew Caffin in Battle, though fome write that he was not there himself at the Battle, but that he came after the overthrow, whilst his men had the Enemies in chase. So Cassius at his earnest request was slain by a faithfull servant of his own called Pin- The death of darus, whom he had infranchifed : because he knew not in time that Brutus had overcome Cafar. Cassius. Shortly after they fought another Battle again, in the which Brutus was overthrown, who afterwards also slew himself. Thus Amonius had the chiefest glory of this Victory, specially because Cefar Brutus slew was fick at that time. Antonius having found Brutus body after this Battle, blaming him much for himfelf. the murther of his Brother Caine, whom he had put to death in MACEDON for revenge of Citero's erwell death, and yet laying the fault more in Hortenfius then in him, he made Hortenfius to be flain on his Brothers Tomb. Furthermore he cast his Coat-armour (which was wonderfull rich and Sumptuous) upon Brutus Body, and gave commandment to one of his Slaves infranchifed, to de- Antonius gave fray the charge of his buriall. But afterwards Antonius hearing that his infranchifed bondmen had honourable not burnt his Coat-armour with his body, because it was very rich, and worth a great fum of rial unto Bru-Money, and that he had also kept back much of the ready Money appointed for his Funeral and this. Tomb, he also put him to death. After that, Cefar was conveyed to Rome, and it was thought he would not live long, nor escape the fickness he had.

Amonius on the other fide went towards the East Provinces and Regions to leavy money : and first of all he went into GREECE, and carried an infinite number of Souldiers with him. Now, because every Souldier was promised five thoufand Silver Drachmaes, he was driven of necessity to impose extream Tallages and Taxations. At his first coming into GREECE, he was not hard nor bitter unto the GRECIANS, but gave him- Antonius great felf onely to hear wife men dispute, to fee Plays, and also to note the Ceremonies and facrifices of courte fie in GREECE, ministring justice to every man: and it pleased him marvellously to hear them call him Greece. Philelien, (as much to fay, A lover of the GRECIANS) and specially the ATHENIANS, to whom he did many great pleasures. Wherefore the MEGARIANS, to exceed the ATHENIANS, thinking to flew Antonius a goodly fight, they prayed him to come and fee their Senate-house, and Council-hall. Amonius went thither to fee it. So when he had feen it at his pleasure, they asked him: My Lord, how like you our Hall? Methinks (quoth he) it is little, old, and ready to fall down. Furthermore he took measure of the Temple of Apollo Pythias, and promifed the Senate to finish it. But when he was once come into ASIA, having left Lucius Cersoninus Governour in GREECE, and that he had felt the riches and pleasures of the East parts, and that Princes, great Lords, and Kings, came to wait at his gate for his coming out : and that Queens and Princeffes to excell one another, gave him very rich Presents, and came to see him, curiously setting forth themselves, and using all Art that might be to shew their beauty, to win his favour the more: (Cafor in the mean space turmoiling his wite and body in Civil Wars at home, Antonius living merrily and quietly abroad) he casily fell again to his old licentious life. For straight one Anaxemer a Player of the Cithern, Xouius a Player of the Flute, Metrodorus a Tumbler, and fuch a rabble of Minstrels The plagues of and fit Ministers for the pleasures of ASIA, (who in fineness and flattery passed all the other plagues he Italy, in tion brought with him out of ITALY) all these slocked in his Court, and bare the whole sway : and after that, all went awry. For every one of them gave themselves to riot and excess, when they saw he delighted in it : and all ASIA was like to the City Sophocles speaketh of in one of his Tragedies :

ANTONIUS.

Was full of sweet Perfumes, and pleasant Songs, With wofull weeping mingled there amongs.

Antonius fimplicity.

For in the City of EPHESUS, Women attired as they go in the Feaths and Sacrifice of Bacchus, came out to meet him with fuch Solemnities and Ceremonies, as are then used : with men and Children difguifed like Fauns and Saryrs. Moreover, the City was full of Ivy, and Darts wreathed about with 1vy, Pfalterions, Flutes and Howboys; and in their Songs they called him Bacchus, Father of mirth, courteons and gentle : and fo was he unto fome, but to the most part of men, cruell and extream, For he robbed Noblemen and Gentlemen of their goods, to give it unto vile flatterers: who oftentimes begged living mens goods, as though they had been dead, and would enter their houses by force. As he gave a Citizens house of MACKESIA unto a Cook, because (as it is reported) he dressed him a fine Supper. In the end he doubled the Taxation, and imposed a second upon Asia. But then Hybraas the Orator fent from the Estates of Assa to tell him the state of their Countrey, boildly faid unto him: If thou wilt have power to lay two Tributes in, one year upon us, thou shouldest allo have the property power to give us two Summers, two Antumus, and two Harvests. This was gallantly and pleasantly unto Antania unto Anonius power to give us two outsitutes, two outsitudes, and it pleased him well to hear it: but afterwards amplylying reaching their poken unto Antonius by the Orator, and it pleased him well to hear it: but afterwards amplylying touching their his speech, he spake more boldly, and to better purpose: As 1A hath payed thee two hundred thousand of Money anto Talents. If all this Money be not come to thy Costers, then ask account of them that levied it: but if thou have received it, and nothing be left of it, then are we utterly undone. Hybraa words netted Antonius roundly: For he understood not of the thesis and robberies his Officers committed by his Authority, in his Treasure and Affairs: not so much because he was careles, as for that he over-simply trufted his men in all things. For he was a plain man, without fubrilty, and therefore over-late found out the foul faults they committed against him: but when he heard of them, he was much offended, and would plainly confels it unto them whom his Officers had done injury unto by countenance of lis authority. He had a noble mind, as well to punish offenders, as to reward well doers: and yet he Associas mandid exceed more in giving, then in punishing. Now for his outragious manner of railing he commonly ufed, mocking and flouring of every man, that was remedied by it felf: for a man might as boldly exchange a mock with him, and he was well contented to be mocked as to mock others: but yet it oftentimes marred all. For he thought that those which told him so plainly and truly in mirth, would never flatter him in good earnest in any matters of weight. But thus he was callly abused by the praises they gave him, not finding how these flatterers mingled their flattery under this familiar and plain manner of speech unto him, as a fine device to make difference of Meas with tharp and tart Sauce; and also to keep him by this frantick jefting and boarding with him at the Table, that their common flattery should not be troublesome unto him, as men do easily miflike to have too much of one thing; and that they handled him finely thereby, when they would give him place in any matter of weight, and follow his counfell, that it might not appear to him they did it fo much to please him, but because they were ignorant, and understood not so much as he did. Antonisa being thus inclined, the last and extreament milchief of all other (to wit, the love of Cleoparra) lighted on him, who did waken and ftir up many Vices yet hidden in him, and were never feen to any, and if any spark of goodness or hope of rising were left him, Clas-Patra quenched it straight, and made it worse then before. The manner how he fell in love with Antonius love her was this. Antonius going to make War with the PARTHIANS, fent to command Cleopatra to Cleaning to appear performly before him when he came into CILICIA, to answer unto such Acculations as were laid against her, being this: that she had aided Cassius and Brutus in their War against him. The Melfenger fent unto Cleopatra to make this fummons unto her, was called Dellius , who when he had throughly confidered her Beauty, the excellent grace and sweetness of her Tongue, he nothing miftrufted that Antonius would do any hurt to fo noble a Lady, but rather affored himfelf, that within few days fhe should be in great favour with him. Thereupon he did her greathohour, and perswaded her to come into Cilicia, as honourably furnished as the could possible; and bad her not to be afraid at all of Amonius, for he was a more courteous Lord, then any that the had ever feen. Cleopatra on the other fide believing Dellisse words, and gueffing by the former access and credit she had with Julius Cefar, and C. Pompey (the Son of Pompey the Great) only for her beauty, the began to have good hope that the might more easily win Antonius. For Cefar and Pempey knew her when the was but a young thing, and knew not then what the World meant; but now the went to Antonism at the age when a Womans Beauty is at the prime, and she also of best judgment. So the furnished her felf with a world of Gifts, store of Gold and Silver, and of Riches and other fumpruous Ornaments, as is credible enough the might bring from so great a house, and from to wealthy and rich a Realm as ÆGYPT was, but yet the carried nothing with her wherein the trufted more then in her felf, and in the charms and inchantment of her paffing beauty and grace; Therefore when she was sent unto by divers Letters, both from Antonius himself, and also from The wonderhis friends, the made to light of it, and mocked Antonius to much, that the diffained to fet forward full fumptuous otherwise, but to take her Barge in the River of Cydnus; the Poop whereof was of Gold, the tra Queen of Sails of Purple, and the Oars of Silver, which kept stroke in rowing after the sound of the Mu- Egypt, going fick of Flutes, Howboys, Citherns, Viols, and fuch other Instruments as they played upon in the unto Antonius. Tiffue, apparelled and attired like the goddess Venus, commonly drawn in Picture : and hard by her, on either hand of her, pretty fair Boys apparelled as Painters do fet forth god Cupid, with little Fans in their hands, with the which they fanned wind upon her. Her Ladies and Gentlewomen also, the fairest of them were apparelled like the Nymphs Nereides (which are the Myrmaids of the Waters) and like the Graces; fome steering the Helm, others tending the Tackle and Ropes of the Barge, out of the which there came a wonderfull passing sweet savour of Personnes, that perfumed the Wharfs fide, peftered with innumerable multitudes of People. Some of them followed the Barge all along the River fide : others also ran out of the City to see her coming in. So that in the end, there ran fuch multitudes of People one after another to fee her, that Antonius was left post alone in the Market-place, in his Imperial Seat to give audience : and there went a rumour in the Peoples mouths, that the goddels Venus was come to play with the god Bacthus for the generall good of all Asia. When Cleopatra landed, Antonius fent to invite her to supper to him. But the fent him word again, he should do better rather to come and sup with her. Antonius therefore to shew himself courteous unto her ather arrivall, was contented to obey her, and went to supper to her: where he found such passing sumptuous fare, that no tongue can express it. But amongst The sumptuous all other things, he most wondered at the infinite number of lights and torches hanged on the top of the supers of the supers of the supers of the sum the house, giving light in every place, so artificially set and ordered by devices, some round, some Gleopatra and square : that it was the rarest thing to behold that eye could discern, or that ever Books could men- Antonius. tion. The next night, Antoniss fealting her, contended to passher in magnificence and fineness: but she overcame him in both. So that he himself began to scorn the gross service of his House, in respect of Cleopatra's sumptuousness and fineness. And when Cleopatra found Antonius jests and slents to be but gross, and Souldier-like, in plain manner, she gave it him finely, and without fear taunted him throughly. Now her beauty (as it is reported) was not so passing, as unmatch- Cleopatra's able of other women, nor yet fuch, as upon present view did enamour men with her : but fo sweet beauty was her company and conversation, that a man could not possibly but be taken. And besides her beauty, the good grace she had to talk and discourse, her courteous nature that tempered her words and deeds, was a four that pricked to the quick. Furthermore, besides all these, her voice and words were marvellous pleafant: for her tongue was an Instrument of Musick to divers Sports and Pastimes, the which she easily turned into any Languagethat pleased her. She spake unto few barbarous People by Interpreters, but made them answer her felf, or at the least the most part of them : as the ETHIOPIANS, the ARABIANS, the TROGLODYTES, the HEBREVYS, the Syrians, the Medes, and the Parthians, and to many others also, whose Languages the had learned. Whereas divers of her Progenitors, the Kings of EGYPT, could fearce learn the a EGYPTIAN Tongue onely, and many of them forgot to speak the MACEDONIAN. Now Ansonius was so ravished with the love of Chopatra, that though his Wife Fulvia had great Wars, and much ado with Cafar for his affairs, and that the Army of the PARTHIANS (the which the Kings Lieutenants had given to the onely leading of Labienus) was now affembled in MESOPOTAMIA, ready to invade SYRIA, yet (as though all this had nothing touched him) he yielded himself to go with Cleopatra unto Alexandria, where he spent and lost in childish sports (as a man might say) with Citopatria unito Alexandria, which is spend (as Antiphon faith) and that is, Time, and idle Paftimes, the most precious thing a man can spend (as Antiphon faith) and that is, Time, and idle Paftimes, the most precious thing a man can spend (as Antiphon faith) and that is, Time, For they made an Order between them, which they called Amimetobion (as much to fay, No life an Order ter up by Antonius comparable and matchable with it) one feafting each other by turns, and in coft, exceeding all mea- and Cleopatra. fure and reason. And for proof hereof, I have heard my Grandsather Lampryas report, that ofe Antonius and Philosas a Physician, born in the City of Amphissa, told him, that he was at that present time Cleopatra in in ALEXANDRIA, and studied Physick: and that having acquaintance with one of Antonius Cooks, Agypt. he took him with him to Antonius house (being a young man destrous to see things) to shew him the wonderfull fumptuous charge and preparation of one onely Supper. When he was in the Kitchin, and faw a world of diversities of Meats, and amongst others, eight wild Bores rosted whole, he be- Eight wild gan to wonder at it, and faid: Sure you have a great number of Guefts to supper. The Cook fell a Boars tofted laughing, and answered him: No (quoth he) not many Guefts, nor above twelve in all: but yet all whole. that is boiled or rosted must be served in whole, or else it would be marred straight: for Antonius peradventure will sup presently, or it may be a pretty while hence, or likely enough he will defer it Philososa Phylonger, for that he hath drunk well to day, or elfe hath had some other great matters in hand! and scian born in therefore we do not drefs one Supper onely, but many Suppers, because we are uncertain of the porter of this trues his dupin. Philora the Phylician told my Grandfather this tale, and faid moreover, that Fees it was his dreft of the porter of this trues his dreft of the porter of this trues his dreft of the porter of the po it was his chance shortly after to serve the eldest Son of the faid Antonius, whom he had by his Philotas, Phy-Wife Fulvia: and that he fate commonly at his Table with his other friends, when he did not dine fician to the nor sup with his Father. It chanced one day there came a Physician that was so still of words, younger Antothat he made every man weary of him at the Board : but Philoson to ftop his mouth, put out this Philoson tubele fubile Proposition to him : It is good in some fort to let a man drink cold water that hath an Ague : Proposition.

But every man that bath an Ague, hath it in some fort: Ergo, it is good for every man that hath an Ague to drink cold water. The Physician was so gravelled and amazed withall, that he had not a word more to fay. Young Ansonism burft out into luch a laughing at him, and was fo glad of it, that he faid unto him; Philoson, take all that, I give it thee: shewing him his Cupboard full of Plare, with great Pots of Gold and Silver. Philotau thanked him, and told him he thought himself greatly bound to him for his liberality, but he would never have thought that he had had power to have given to many things, and of fo great value. But much more he marvelled, when shortly after one of young Antonius men brought him home all the Pots in a Basket, bidding him fet his mark and stamp upon them, and to lock them up. Philotas returned the bringer of them, fearing to be reproved if he took them. Then the young Gentleman Antonius faid unto him: Alas poor man, why doft thou make it nice to take them? knowest thou not that it is the Son of Antonius that gives them thee, and is able to do it? if thou wilt not believe me, take rather the ready Money they come to : because my Father peradyenture may ask for some of the Plate, for the antick and excellent workmanship of them. This il have heard my Grandfather tell oftentimes. But now again to Cleopatra. Plate writeth that there are four kinds of flatery: but Cleopatra divided it into many kinds. For she (were it in sport, or in matters of earnest) still devised fundry new delights to have Antonius at commandment, never leaving him night nor day, nor once letting him go out of her fight. For the would play at Dice with him, drink with him, and hunt commonly with him, and allo be with him when he went to any exercise or activity of body. And sometime also, when he would go up and down the City, difguifed like a Slave in the night, and would peep into poor mens windows and their Shops, and foold and brawl with them within the House, Cleopatra would be also in a Chamber-maids array, and amble up and down the fireets with him, so that oftentimes Antonius bare away both mocks and blows. Now though most men milliked this manner, yet the ALEXAN-DRIANS were commonly glad of this joility, and liked it well, faying very gallantly and wifely: that Antanine thewed them a Comical face, to wit, a merry countenance: and the ROMANS a Tragicall face, to fay, a grim look. But to reckon up all the foolish sports they made, revelling in this fort, it were too fond a part of me, and therefore I will onely tell you one among the reft. Astoniss fifth On a time he went to angle for Fifth, and when he could take none, he was as angry as he could, being in Agyr: cause Cleopatra stood by. Wherefore he secretly commanded the Fishermen, that when he cast in his Line, they should straight diveunder the water, and put a Fish on his Hook which they had taken before : and to fracthed up his Angling-rod, and brought up a Fish twice or thrice. Cleopara found it fraight, yet the teemed not to fee it, but wondered at his excellent fifthing: but when the was alone by her, felf among her own People, the told them how it was, and bad them the next morning to be on the water to fee the filhing. A number of People came to the Haven, and got into the Filher posts to fee the filhing. Antonius then threw in his Line, and Cleopara ftraight commanded one of her men to dive under water before Antonius men, and to put fome old Salt-fifth upon his bait, like unto those that are brought out of the Countrey of PONT. When he had hung the Fifth on his Hook, Antonius thinking he had taken a Fifth indeed, fnatched up his Line pretently. Then they all fell a laughing : Cleopatra also laughing, faid unto him : Leave us (my Lord) & CYP-TIANS (which dwell in the Countrey of PHARUS and CANOBUS) your Angling-rod: this is not thy Profession, thou must hunt after conquering of Realms and Countreys. Now Antenius delighting in these fond and childilh Pastimes, very ill news were brought him from two places. The The Warnof first from Rome, that his Brother Lucius and Fulvia his Wife, sell our first between themselves, Lucine Antoni and afterwards fell to open War with Cefar, and had brought all to naught, that they were both su, and Fattis, driven to fly out of ITALY. The fecond news, as bad as the first: that Labienus conquered all against Office. ASIA with the Army of the PARTHIANS, from the River of Euphrates, and from Syria, unto the Country of Lypia and Ionia. Then began Antonius with much ado, a little to rouse himfelf, as if he had been wakened out of a deep fleep, and as a man may fay, coming out of a great drunkennels. So first of all be bent himself against the PARTHIANS, and went as far as the Countrey of PHOENICIA: but then he received lamentable Letters from his Wife Fulvia. Whereupon he straight resurred towards I TALY, with two hundred Sail : and as he went, took up his friends by the way, that fled out of ITALY to come to him. By them he was informed, that his Wife Fulvia was the onely cause of this War: who being of a pervish, crooked, and troublesome nature, had purposely raised this uprore in IT ALY, in hope thereby to withdraw him from Chopatra. But by good fortune his Wife Fulvia going to meet with Antonius, fickned by the way, and died in the City of Sicrons: and therefore Otherins Cafar and he were the eaflier made friends again. For when 100 cents of Antonius landed in ITALY, and that men faw Cefer asked nothing of him, and that Antonius on the other fide laid all the fault and burden on his Wife Fulvis : the friends of both parties would not fuf-All the Empire Ser them to unitip any old matters, and to prove or defend who had the wrong or right, and who was the first procurer of this War, searing to make matters worse between them; but they made them ded between friends together, and divided the Empire of Rous between them, making the Sea Ionium the bounds of their division. For they gave all the Provinces Eastward unso Amonius, and the Counhalf Sifter of treys Westward uno Cafar, and left AFRICK unso Lepidus; and made a Law, that they three, Official of the state of the st and Daughter formed to be a found counfell, but yet it was to be confirmed with a ftraighter bond, which or summer. fortune offered thus. There was Offeria the sides Sifter of Cefar, not by one Mother, for the Cofar Mather, came of Aucharia, and Cofor himself afterwards of Accis. At is reported, that he dearly loved his Sifter Octavia, for indeed the was a noble Lady, and left the Widow of her first Husband Cains Marcellus, who died not long before: and it feemed also that Antonius had been Widower ever fince the death of his Wife Fulvia. For he denied not that he kept Cleopatra, neither did he confess that he had her as his Wife: and so with reason he did defend the love he bare unto this ÆGYPTIAN Gleopatra. Thereupon every man did fet forward this Marriage, hoping thereby that this Lady Octavia, having an excellent grace, wildom and honefty, joyned unto fo rare a beauty, when the were with Antonius (he loving her as fo worthy a Lady deserveth) she should be a good mean to keep good love and amity betwixt her Brother and him. So when Cafar and he had made the match be- A Law at Route tween them, they both went to Rome about this Marriage, although it was against the Law, that for marrying of a Widow should be married within ten Moneths after her Husbands death. Furthermore, Sextus Pompeius had dealt very friendly with Antonius, for he had courteoufly received his Mother when the fled out of ITALY with Fulvia; and therefore they thought good to make Peace with him. So Antoniys and they met all three together by the Mount of MISENA, upon a Hill that runneth far into the Sea : Offavius Cafir Pompey having his Ships riding hard by at Anchor, and Antonius and Cafar their Armies upon the domake peace thore fide, directly over against him. Now, after they had agreed that Sextus Pompeius should Pompeius. have SICILE and SARDINIA, with this condition, that he should rid the Sea of all Thieves and Pirates, and make it fafe for Paffengers; and withall, that he should fend a certain quantity of Wheat to Rome; one of them did feaft another, and drew cuts who should begin. It was Pompeius chance to invite them first. Whereupon Antonius asked him: And where shall we sup? There, faid Pompey; and shewed him his Admiral-Galley, which had fix Banks of Oars: that (faid he) is my Fathers House they have left me. He spake it to taunt Antonius, because he had his Fathers House. Sexias Pompeithat was Pompey the Great. So he cast Anchors enough into the Sea, to make his Galley fast, and astaunt to Anthen built a Bridge of Wood to convey them to his Galley, from the head of Mount Mifena : and tonius. there he welcomed them, and made them great chear. Now in the midft of the Feaft, when they fell to be merry with Antonius love unto Cleopatra, Menas the Pirate came to Pompey, and whileper-Sexual Pombeiing in his ear, faid unto him: Shall I cut the Cables of the Anchors, and make thee Lord not onely as being offerof SICILE and SARDINIA, but of the whole Empire of ROME besides ? Pompey having paused ed wonderfull a while upon it, at length answered him: Thou shouldest have done it, and never have told it me; great fortune, for his honesty but now we must content us with that we have: as for my self, I was never taught to break my and faith sake faith. nor to be counted a Traytor. The other two also did likewise feast him in their Camp, and refused it. then he returned into Sicile. Antonius after this agreement made, fent Ventidius before him into ASIA to flay the PARTHIANS, and to keep them they should come no further: and he himself in the mean time, to gratifie Cafar, was contented to be chosen fulius Cafar's Priest and Sacrificer, and so they joyntly together dispatched great matters concerning the state of the Empire. But in all other manner of Sports and Exercises, wherein they passed the time away the one with the other, Anzonius was ever inferiour unto Cafar, and alway loft, which grieved him much. With Antonius there was a Soothfayer or Aftronomer of ÆGYPT, that could caft a Figure, and judge of mens Nativities. to tell them what should happen to them. He either to please Cleopatra, or else for that he found it so Antonius told by his art, told Antonius plainly, that his fortune (which of it felf was excellent good, and very great) by a Soothfaywas altogether blemished and obscured by Casar's fortune: and therefore he counselled him utterly to er, that his forleave his company, and to get him as far from him as he could. For thy Demon, faid he, (that is to fay, riour unto Octhe good Angel and Spirit that keepeth thee) is afraid of his: and being couragious and high when he trouis Cafars. is alone, becometh fearfull and timorous when he cometh near unto the other. Howfoever it was, the events enfuing proved the ÆGYPTIAN'S words true; for it is faid, that as often as they two drew cuts for pastime, who should have any thing, or whether they played at dice, Antonius alway lost. Oftentimes when they were disposed to see Cock-fight, or Quails that were taught to fight one with Antonius unanother, Galar's Cocks or Quails did ever overcome. The which spighted Antonins in his mind, al- fortunate in though he made no outward shew of it : and therefore he believed the EGYPTIAN the better. In sport and carfine, he recommended the affairs of his house unto Cafar, and went out of ITALY with Offavia his neft, against Wife, whom he carried into Greece after he had had a Daughter by her. So Antonius lying all the Orthographic Oracle King of Winter at ATHENS, news came unto him of the Victories of Ventidius, who had overcome the PAR- Partition THIANS in Battle, in the which also were flain Labienus and Pharnabates, the chiefest Captains King Orodes had. For these good news he seasted all ATHENS, and kept open house for all the GRECI-ANS, and many Games of price were plaid at ATHENS, of the which he himfelf would be Judge. Wherefore leaving his Guard, his Axes, and tokens of his Empire at his house, he came into the Shewplace or Lifts (wherethese Games were plaid) in a long Gown and Slippers after the GRECIAN fathion, and they carried tipftaves before him, as Marthals men do carry before the Judges, to make place: Ventidius notaand he himself in person was a stickler to part the young men, when they had fought enough. After ble victory of that, preparing to go to the wars, he made him a garland of the holy olive, and carried a veffel with him the Parthians. of the water of the fountain Clepfydra, because of an Oracle he had received, that so commanded him. The death of In the mean time, Ventidius again overcame Pacorus (Orodes Son, King of PARTHIA) in a Battle King of Parfought in the Country of CYRRESTICA, he being come again with a great Army to invade SYRIA : this's Son. at which Battle was flain a great number of the PARTHIANS, and among them Pacorus the Kings own Son. This noble exploit as famous as ever any was, was a full revenge to the ROMANS of the shame and loss they had received before the death of Marcus Crassus: and he made the PARTHIANS fly, and glad to keep themselves within the Confines and Territories of MESOPO-TAMIA and MEDIA, after they had thrice together been overcome in several Battles. Howbeit, Ventidius durst not undertake to follow them any farther, fearing left he should have gotten Antonisu displeasure by it. Notwithstanding, he led his Army against them that had rebelled, and conquered them again : amongst whom he besieged Antiochus King of COMMAGENA, who offered him to give a thousand Talents to be pardoned his rebellion, and promifed ever after to be at Antoniu commandment. But Vemidius madehim answer, that he should fend unto Antonius; who was not far off, and would not fuffer Ventidius to make peace with Antiochus, to the end that yet this little exploit should pass in his name, and that they should not think he did any thing but by Lieutenant Ventidius. The Siege grew very long, because they that were in the Town, seeing they could not be received upon any reasonable compassition, determined valiantly to defend themselves to the last man. Thus Antonius did nothing, and yet received great shame, repenting him much that he took not their first offer. And yet at the last he was glad to make Truce with Ansiochus, and to take three hundred Talenis for composition. Thus after he had set order for the State and Affairs of SYRIA, he returned again to ATHENS: and having given Ventidius such honours as he deserved, he fent him to ROME, to triumph for the PARTHIANS. Ventidius was the onely man that ever triumphed of the PARTHIANS untill this present day, a mean man born, and of no noble House the Roman, or Family: who onely came to that he attained unto, through Antonius friendship, the which delithat triumphed vered him happy occasion to atchieve great matters; and yet to fay truly, he did fo well quit himfelf in all his Enterprise that he confirmed that which was spoken of Antonius and Cafar, to wit, that they were alway more fortunate when they made War by their Lieutenants, then by themselves. For Soffins one of Antonius Lieutenants in Syria, did notable good fervice: and Canidius whom he had also left his Lieutenant in the borders of Armenia, did conquer it all. So did he also overcome the Kings of the IBERIANS and ALBANIANS, and went on with his Conquefts unto Mount Canidius Con- Caucalus. By these Conquests, the same of Antonius Power increased more and more, and grew dreadfull unto all the barbarous Nations. But Antonius notwithstanding, grew to be marvellously offended with Cafar, upon certain reports that had been brought unto him: and so took Sea to go towards ITALY with three hundred Sail. And because those of BRUNDUSIUM would not receive his Army into their Haven, he went farther unto TARENTUM. There his Wife Othavia that Official cafer came out of GREECE with him, belought him to fend her unto her Brother, the which he did. Official via at that time was great with child, and moreover had a fecond Daughter by him, and yet she per her felf in journey, and mer with her Brother Octavius Cafar by the way, who brought his two chief friends, Macenas and Agrippa withhim. She took them aside, and with all the instance she could possible, intreated them they would not fuster her that was the happiest Woman of the World, to become now the most wretched and unfortunatest creature of all other. For now, faid she, every mans eyes do gaze on me, that am the Sifter of one of the Emperors, and Wife of the other. And if the worst counsell take place (which the gods forbid) and that they grow to Wars: for your felves, it is uncertain to which of them two the gods have affigned the victory or overthrow. But for me, on which side soever the victory fall, my state can be but most miserable still. These words Official pact- of Officialo formed Cafer's heart, that he went quickly unto Tarentum. But it was a noble fieth the quar- fight for them that were prefent, to fee fo great an Army by Land not to ftir; and fo many Ships arei betwirtt ditterinis and float in the Road, quietly and fafe; and furthermore, the meeting and kindness of friends, lovingly embracing one another. First, Antonius feasted Cafar, which he granted unto for his Sisters Oftavius Cafir fake. Afterwards they agreed together, that Cafar thould give Antonius two Legionsto go against the PARTHIANS: and that Antonius should let Cafar have an hundred Galleys armed with brazen Spurs at the Prows. Befides all this, Octavia obtained of her Husband twenty Brigantines for her Brother: and of her Brother for her Husband, a thouland armed men. After they had taken leave of each other, Cafar went immediately to make War with Sextus Pompeius, to get SICILIA into his hands. Amonius alfo leaving his Wife Ottavia and little Children begotten of her, with Cefar, and his other Children which he had by Fulvia, went directly into Asia. Then began this peftilent plague and milchief of Cleopatra's love (which had slept a long time, and seemed to have been utterly forgotten, and that Antonius had given place to better counfell) again to kindle, and to be in force, fo foon as Antonius came near unto SYRIA. And in the end, the horse of the mind as Plato termeth it, that is so hard of rein (I mean the unreined lust of concupiscense) did put out of Antonius head all honest and commendable thoughts : for he sent Fonteins Capito to bring Chepatra into Syria: unto whom, to welcome her, he gave no trifling things; but unto that she had already, he added the Provinces of PHENICIA, those of the neithermost Syria, the Isle of Cyprus, and a great part of CILICIA, and that Countrey of Juny where the true Balm is, and that part Antonius gave of ARABIA where the NABATHEIANS do dwell, which stretcheth out toward the Ocean. These great Provinces unto Cite. great gifts much misliked the ROMANS. But now, though Amonism did eafily give away great Seigniories, Realms, and mighty Nations unto some private men, and that also he took from other Kings their lawfull Realms (as from Aneigonus King of the JEVVS, whom he openly beheaded, where King of Jury, never King before had fuffered the like death:) yet all this did not fo much offend the Romans, as the unmeasurable honours which he did unto Cleopatra. But yet he did much more aggravate their malice and ill will towards him, because that Cleopatra having brought his two Twins, a a Son and a Daughter, he named his Son Alexander, and his Daughter Cleopatra; and gave them to their firnames, the Sun to the one, and the Moon to the other. This notwithstanding, he that Antonius twins could finely cloak his shamefull deeds with fine words, said, that the greatness and magnificence of by Guoparra the Empire of ROME appeared most, not where the ROMANS took, but where they gave much : names. and Nobility was multiplyed amongst men by the Posterity of Kings, when they left of their feed in divers places; and that by this means his first Ancestor was begotten of Hercules, who had not left the hope and continuance of his Line and Posteriry in the womb of one onely woman, fearing Solons Laws, or regarding the Ordinances of men touching the procreation of children: but that he gave it unto nature, and established the foundation of many noble Races and Families in divers places. Now Phragres flew when Phraortes had flain his Father Orodes, and possessed the Kingdom, many Gentlemen of PAR- his Father O-THIA forfook him, and fled from him. Amongst them was Moneses a Nobleman, and of great rodes King of Authority among his Countreymen, who came unto Antonius that received him, and compared his Paribia. fortune unto Themistocles, and his own riches and magnificence unto the Kings of Persia. For he gave Monefes three Cities, LARISSA; ARETHUSA, and HIERAPOLIS, which was called before BOMBICE. Howbeit the King of PARTHIA shortly after called him home again, upon his faith and word: Antonius was glad to let him go, hoping thereby to fteal upon Phraortes unprovided. For he fent unto him, and told him that they would remain good friends, and have peace together, to he would but onely redeliver the Standards and Enfigns of the ROMANS (which the PAR-THIANS had won in the Battle where M. Craffin was flain) and the men also that remained yet Prisoners of this overthrow. In the mean time he sent Cleopatra back into EGYPT, and took his way towards ARABIA and ARMENIA, and there took a general muster of all his Army he had together, and of the Kings his Confederates that were come by his commandment to aid him, being a marvellous number : of the which, the chiefest was Artanasdes King of ARMENIA, who did furnish him with six thousand Horsemen, and seven thousand Footmen. There were also of the Ro- Antonius great MANS about threefcore thousand Footmen, and of Horsemen (Spaniards and Gauls rec- and puissant koned for ROMANS) to the number of ten thousand; and of other Nations thirty thousand men. Army. reckoning together the Horsemen and light armed Footmen. This so great and puissant Army (which made the Indians quake for fear, dwelling about the Countrey of the BACTRIANS, and all A. Antoniusdrunk SIA also to tremble) served him to no purpose, and all for the love he bare to Cleopatra. For the ear- of Cleopatra. nest great desire he had to lie all Winter with her, made him begin this War out of due time, and for hafte to put all in hazard : being fo ravished and enchanted with the sweet poison of her love, that he had no other thought but of her, and how he might quickly return again, more then how he might overcome his Enemies. For first of all, where he should have wintered in ARMENIA to refresh his men, wearied with the long journey they had made, having come 8000 furlongs, and then at the beginning of the Spring to go and invade MEDIA before the PARTHIANS should stir out of their Houses and Garisons: he could tarry no longer, but led them forthwith unto the Province of ATRO-PATENE, leaving ARMENIA on the left hand, and foraged all the Countrey. Furthermore, making all the hafte he could, he left behind him Engines of battery which were carried with him in 300 Carts (among the which also there was a Ram fourscore foot long) being things most necessary for him. and the which he could not get again for money, if they were once loft or marred. For the high Provinces of Asia have no trees growing of fuch height and length, neither strong nor streight enough to make such like Engines of battery. This notwithstanding, he left them all behind him, as an hinderance to bring his matters and intent speedily to pass: and left a certain number of men to keep them, and gave them in charge unto one Tatianus. Then he went to beliege the City of PHRAATA, being the chiefest and greatest City the King of MEDIA had, where his wife and children were. Then Autonius be he straight found out his own fault, and the want of his Artillery he lest behind him, by the work fieged the City be had in hand: for he was fain for lack of a breach (where his men might come to the Sword with of Phrasts in their Enemies that defended the wall) to force a mount of earth hard to the walls of the City, the which by little and little with great labour, rose to some height. In the mean time King Phraortes came down with a great Army, who understanding that Antonius had left his Engines of battery behind him, he fent a great number of Horsemen before, which environed Tatianus with all his carriage, and flew him, and ten thousand men he had with him. After this the barbarous People took these Engines The Parthians of battery and burnt them, and got many Prisoners, amongst whom they took also King Polemon, took Antonius This discomfiture marvellously troubled all Antonius Army, to receive so great an overthrow (be- Engines of yond their expectation) at the beginning of their Journey: infomuch that Artabazus King of the Ar-MENIANS, despairing of the good success of the ROMANS, departed with his men, notwithstanding that he was himself the first procurer of this War and Journey. On the other fide, the PARTHIANS came couragiously unto Antonius Camp, who lay at the Siege of their chiefest City, and cruelly reviled and threatned him. Antonius therefore fearing that if he lay still and did nothing, his mens hearts would fail them; he took ten Legions, with three Cohorts or Enfigns of the Prators (which are Companies appointed for the guard of the General) and all his Horfemen, and carried them out to forage, hoping thereby he should easily allure the PARTHIANS to fight a Battle. But when he had marched about a days journey from his Camp, he faw the PARTHIANS wheeling round about him to give him the onfet, and to skirmish with him, when he would think to march his way. Therefore he fet out his fignall of Battle, and yet caused his Tents and Fardels to be truffed up, as though he meant not to fight, but onely to lead his men back again. Then he marched before the Army of the barbarous People, the which was martialled like a Cressant or half Moon:

men fuddenly turned head upon the PARTHIANS, and with great cries gave Charge on them : who at the first received their Charge couragiously, for they were joyned nearer then within an Arrows fhoot. But when the Legions also came to joyn with them, shouting out aloud, and rating of their Armours, the PARTHIANS Horses and themselveswere so assaud and amazed withall, that they all turned tail and fled, before the ROMANS could come to the Sword with them. Then Antonius followed them hard in chase, being in great hope by this conflict to have brought to end all or the most part of this War. But after that his Footmen had chased them fifty furlongs off, and the Horsemen also thrice as far, they found in all but thirty persons taken, and about four core men onely flain : which did much discourage them, when they considered with themselves, that obtaining the victory, they had slain so few of their Enemies: and when they were overcome, they lost so many of their men, as they had done at the overthrow when their carriage was taken. The next morning Antonius Army truffed up their carriage, and marched back towards their Camp: and by the way in their return they met at the first a few of the PARTHIANS; then going on further, they met a few more. So at length when they all came together, they reviled them, and troubled them on every fide, as freshly and couragiously as if they had not been overshrown: so that ROMANS very hardly got to their Camp with safety. The MEDES on the other side, that were besieged in their chief City of PHRAATA, made a falley out upon them that kept the Mount which they had forced and cast against the Wall of the City, and drave them for fear from the Mount Decimation a they kept. Antonius was fo offended withall, that he executed the Decimation. For he divided his Martial punish- men by ten Legions, and then of them he put the tenth Legion to death, on whom the lot fell : and for the other nine, he caufed them to have Barley given them instead of Wheat. Thus this War fell our troublesome unto both parties, and the end thereof much more fearfull: for Antonias could look for no other of his fide but famine, because he could forage no more, nor fetch in any Victuals, without great loss of his men : and on the other fide, Phraertes knew well enough that the PARTHIANS would do any thing rather then lie in Camp abroad in the Winter. Therefore he was afraid, that if the ROMANS continued their Siege all Winter long, and made War with him still, that his men would for sake him, and specially because the time of the year went away apace, and the air waxed cloudy and cold in the Equinoctiall Autumn. Thereupon be called to mind this device : He gave the chiefest of his Gentlemen of the PARTHIANS charge, that when they met the ROMANS out of their Camp, going to forage, or to water their Horse, or for some other Proagainst the Re- vision, that they should not diffres them too much, but should suffer them to carry somewhat man. away, and greatly commend their valiantness and hardiness, for which their King did esteem them the more, and not without cause. After these first allurements, they began by little and little to come nearer unto them, and to talk with them on Horseback, greatly blaming Antonius self-will, that did not give their King Phraertes occasion to make a good Peace, who defired nothing more thento fave the lives of fo goodly a company of valiant men; but that he was too fondly bent to abide two of the greatest and most dreadfull Enemies he could have, to wir, Winter and Famine, the which they could hardly away withall, though the PARTHIANS did the best they could to aid and accompany them. These words being oftentimes brought to Antonius, they made him a little pliant, for the good hope he had of his return : but yet he would not fend unto the King of PARTHIA, before they had first asked these barbarous People that spake so courteously unto his men, whether they fpake of themselves, or that they were their Masters words. When they told them, the King himself faid fo, and did perswade them further not to fear or miftruft them, then Antonius fent fome of his friends unto the King, to make demand for the delivery of the Enfigns and Priloners he had of the ROMANS fince the overthrow of Graffu, to the end it should not appear, that if he asked nothing, they should think he were glad that he might onely cleape with safety out of the danger he was in. The King of PARTHIA answered him, that for the Ensigns and Prisoners be demanded, he should not break his head about it, but if he would depart presently and without delay, he might do it peaceably, and without danger. Wherefore Antonius after he had given his men some time to truss up their carriage, he raised his Camp, and took his way to depart. But though he had an excellent tongue at will, and very proper to entertain his Souldiers and men of War, and that he could passingly well do it, as well or better then any Captain in his time: yet for shame he would not speak unto them at his removing, but gave the charge thereof to Domitins Andrews. Many of them took this in very ill part, and thought that he did it in diffiding of them: but the most part of them prefently understood the truth of it, and were also ashamed. Therefore they thought it their duties to carry the like respect unto their Capeain that their Captain did unto them; and fo they became the more obedient unto him. So Antonius was minded to return the fame way he came, being a plain barren Countrey without Wood. But there came a Souldier to him, born in the Countrey of the MARDIANS, who having been long familiar with the PARTHIANS, knew their fashions very well, and had also shewed himself very true and faithfull to the ROMANS in the Battle where Antonias engines of battery and carriage were taken away. This man came to Antonian, to counsell him to beware how he went that way, and to make his Army a prey (being heavily armed) unto fo great a number of Horfemen, all Archers in the open field, where they should have nothing to let them to compals him round about ; and that this was Phraortes fetch, to offer him to friendly conditions and courteous words, to make him raife his fiege, that he might afterwards meet him as he would in the Plains: howbeit, if he thought good he would guide him another way on the right hand, through woods and mountains, a far nearer way. and where he should find great plenty of all things needfull for his Army. Antonius hearing what he faid, called his Council together to confult upon it. For after he had made peace with the PAR-THIANS, he was loth to give them cause to think he mistrusted them : and on the other fide also. he would gladly shorten his way, and passby places well inhabited, where he might be provided of all things necessary: therefore he asked the MARDIAN what pledge he would put in, to perform that he promifed. The MARDIAN gave himfelf to be bound hand and foot, till he had brought his Army into the Countrey of Armenta. So he guided his Army thus bound, two days together, without any trouble or fight of Enemy. But the third day Antonias thinking the PARTHIANS would no more follow him, and trufting thereto, fuffered his Souldiers to march in diforder as every man lifted. The MARDIAN perceiving that the dams of a River were newly broken up, which they should have paffed over, and that the River had overflown the banks, and drowned all the way they should have gone, he gueffed straight that the PARTHIANS had done it, and had thus broken it open, to stav the ROMANS for getting too far before them. Therefore he bade Antonius look to himself, and told him that his Enemies were not far off. Antonius having fet his men in order, as he was placing of his Archers and Slingmen to refult the Enemies, and to drive them back, they descried the PARTHI- The Parthiant ANS that wheeled round about the Army, to compais them in on every fide, and to break their do fee up ranks, and their light armed men gave charge upon them. So after they had hurt many of the Roa Antonias in his MANS with their Arrows, and that they themselves were also hurt by them with their Darts and return. Plummets of Lead, they retired a little, and then came again and gave charge, untill that the Horsemen of the GAUL sturned their Horfes, and fiercely galloped towards them, that they disperfed them fo, as all that day they gathered no more together. Hereby Antonius knew what to do, and did not onely strengthen the Rereward of his Army, but both the Flanks also with Darts and Sling-men, and made his Army march in a square Battle: commanding the Horsemen, that when the Enemies should come to affail them, they should drive them back, but not follow them too far. Thus the PARTHI-ANS four days after, feeing they did no more hurt to the ROMANS, then they also received of them, they were not so hot upon them as they were accustomed, but excusing themselves by the Winter that troubled them, they determined to return back again. The fifth day Flavins Gallus, a va- The bold aft liant man of his hands, that had charge in the Army, came unto Antonius to pray him to let him have of Flavini Galfome more of his light armed men then were already in the Rereward, and some of the Horsemen that 144. were in the Vaward, hoping thereby to do some notable exploit. Antonius granting them unto him. when the Enemies came according to their manner to fet upon the tail of the Army, and to skirmish with them, Flavine couragiously made them retire, but not as they were wont to do before, to retire and joyn presently with their Army; for he over-rashly thrust in among them to fight it out at the Sword. The Captains that had the leading of the Rereward, feeing Flavius stray too far from the Army, fent unto him to will him to retire, but he would not hearken to it. And it is reported also, that Titisus himself the Treaturer, took the Ensigns, and did what he could to make the Ensignbearers return back, reviling Flavius Gallus, because through his folly and desperateness he caufed many honest and valiant men to be both hurt and slain to no purpose. Gallus also fell out with him, and commanded his men to flay. Wherefore Titim returned again into the Army, and Gallus ftill overthrowing and driving the Enemies back whom he met in the Vaward, he was not aware that he was compassed in : and seeing himself environed on all sides, he sent unto the Army, that of Martiall Discipline, the ancient ROMANS could not have done any more. But divers things were caule thereof, as we have told you before: Antonius Nobility and ancient Houle, his eloquence, his plain nature, his liberality and magnificence, and familiarity to sport and be merry in company: but specially the care he took at that time to help, vifit, and lament those that were fick and wounded, feeing every man to have that which was meet for him, was of fuch force and effect, as it made them that were fick and wounded to love him better, and were more desirous to do him fervice then those that were whole and found. This Victory so encouraged the Enemies (who otherwife were weary to follow Antonius any farther) that all night they kept the Fields, and hovered about the ROMANS Camp, thinking that they would prefently fly, and that then they should take the spoil of their Camp. So the next morning by break of day, there were gathered together a far greater number of the PARTHIANS then they were before. For the rumour was, that there were not much fewer then forty thousand Horse, because their King sent thither even the very Guard about his Person, as unto a most certain and assured Victory, that they might be partners of the spoil and booty they hoped to have had : for as touching the King himself, he was never in any Conflict or Battle. Then Antonius destrous to speak to his Souldiers, called for a black Gown to appear the more pitifull to them: but his friends did diffwade him from it. Therefore he put on his Coat-armour, and being fo apparelled, made an Oration to his Army: in the which he highly commended them that had overcome and driven back their Enemies, and greatly rebuked them that had cowardly turned their backs. So that those which had overcome, prayed him to be of good chear: the other also to clear themselves, willingly offered to take the lot of Decimation if he thought good, or otherwise to receive what kind of punishment should please him to lay upon them, so that he would forget any more to millike, or to be offended with them. Antonius feeing that, did lift up his hands to heaven, and made his Prayer to the gods, that if in exchange of his former Victories, they would now fend him some bitter adversity, then that all might light on himself alone, and that they would give the Victory to the reft of his Army. The next morning, they gave better order on every fide of the Army, and so marched forward: so that when the PARTHIANS thought to return again to affail them, they came far short of the reckoning. For where they thought to come, not to fight, but to spoil and make havock of all, when they came near them, they were fore hurt with their Slings and Darts, and fuch other Javelins as the Romans darted at them, and the Parthi-ANS found them as rough and desperate in fight, as if they had been fresh men they had dealt withall, Whereupon their hearts began again to fail them. But yet when the ROMANS came to go down any steep Hills or Mountains, they would set on them with their Arrows, because the ROMANS could go down but fair and foirly. But then again, the Souldiers of the Legion that carried great Shields, returned back, and inclosed them that were naked or light armed, in the middeft among them, and did kneel on one knee on the ground, and so fet down their Shields before them: and they of the second rank also covered them of the first rank, and the third also covered the second, and fo from rank to rank all were covered. Infomuch that this manner of covering and shading themselves with Shields, was devited after the fathion of laying tiles upon Houses, and to fight was like the degrees of a Theatre, and is a most strong desence and Bulwark against all Arrows and Shor that falleth upon it. When the PARTHIANS faw this countenance of the ROMAN Souldiers of the Legion which kneeled on the ground in that fort upon one knee, supposing that they had been wearied with travell, they layed downtheir Bowes, and took their Spears and Launces, and came to fight with them man for man. Then the ROMANS suddenly rose upon their feer, and with the Daris that they threw from them, they flew the foremost, and put the rest to flight, and so did they the next days that followed. But by means of these dangers and lets, Amonius Army could win no way in a day, by reason whereof they fuffered great famine: for they could have but little Corn, and yet were they driven daily to fight for it, and befides that, they had no inftrument to grind it, to make Bread of it. For the most part of them had been left behind, because the Beafts that carried them were either dead, or elfe employed to carry them that were fore and wounded. For the Grest Famine Famine was fo extream great, that the eighth part of a bushell of Wheat was fold for fifty Drachma's, and they fold Barley-bread by the weight of Silver. In the end they were compelled to live of Herbs and Roots, but they found few of them that men do commonly eat of, and were enforced to taste of them that were never eaten before : among the which, there was one that killed them, and made them out of their wits. For he that had once eaten of it, his memory went from him, and he knew no manner of thing, but onely buffed himfelf in digging and hurling of ftones from one A deadly herb, place to another, as though it had heen a matter of great weight, and to be done with all possible with a supposition of the suppos speed. All the Camp over, men were bushly stooping to the ground, digging and carrying of stones from one place to another : but at the laft, they caft up a great deal of choler, and died fuddenly, because they lacked Wine, which was the onely Soveraign remedy to cure that disease. It is reported that Amonius feeing fuch a number of his men die daily, and that the PARTHIANS left them not, Thevalianmes neither would suffer them to be at rest, he oftentimes cried out fighing, and said : O ten thousand! of ten thousand He had the valiantness of ten thousand GRECIANS in such admiration, whom Xenophos brought away after the overthrow of Gyru: because they had come a farther Journey from Babylon, and had also fought against much more Enemies many times told, then themselves, and yet came home with fafety. The PARTHIANS therefore feeing that they could not break the good order of the Army of the ROMANS, and contrarily, that they themselves were oftentimes put to flight, and welfavouredly beaten, they fell again to their old crafty fubtilities. For when they found any of the

ROMANS scattered from the Army to go forrage, to feek some Corn, or other Victuals, they would come to them as if they had been their friends, and shew them their Bows unbent, faying, The Parthian that themselves also did return home to their Countrey as they did, and that they would follow them very subtle and no farther : howbeit that they should yet have certain MEDES that would follow them a days jour- crafty People. ney or two, to keep them that they should do no hurt to the Villages from the high-ways; and so holding them with this talk, they gently took their leave of them, and bad them farewell, so that the ROMANS began again to think themselves safe. Antonism also understanding this, being very glad of it, determined to take his way through the plain Countrey, because also they should find no water in the Mountains, as it was reported unto him. So as he was determined to take his course, there came into his Host one Mithridates, a Gentleman from the Enemies Camp, who was Cousin Mithridates a unto Moneses that fled unto Antonius, and unto whom he had given three Cities. When he came Parthian, beto Amonius Camp, he prayed them to bring him one that could speak the PARTHIAN or Sy- wrayeth unto RIAN Tongue. So one Alexander ANTIOCHIAN, a familiar of Antonius, was brought unto Antonius the him. Then the Gentleman told him what he was, and faid that Monefes had fent him to Antonius, his own Counto requite the honour and courtefie he had shewed unto him. After he had used this ceremonious treymen aspeech, he asked Alexander if he saw those high Mountains afar off, which he pointed unto with his gaint him, finger. Alexander answered he did. The PARTHIANS (faid he) do lie in ambush at the foot of those Mountains, under the which lieth a goodly plain champion Countrey; and they think that you being deceived with their crafty fubtle words, will leave the way of the Mountains, and turn into the Plain. For the other way, it is very hard and painfull, and you shall abide great thirst, the which you are well acquainted withall : but if Antonius take the lower way, let him affure himself to run the same fortune that Marcus Craffus did. So Mithridates having said, he departed. Antonius was marvelloufly troubled in his mind when he heard thus much, and therefore called for his friends. to hear what they would fay to it. The MARDIAN also that was their guid, being asked his opinion, answered, that he thought as much as the Gentleman Mithridates had faid. For, faid he, admit that there were no Ambulh of Enemies in the Valley, yet it is a long crooked way, and ill to hit: where taking the Mountain way, though it be ftony and painfull, yet there is no other danger, but a whole days travelling without any water. So Antonius changing his first mind and determination. removed that night, and took the Mountain way, commanding every man to provide himself of water. But the most part of them lacking Vessels to carry water in, some were driven to fill their Sallets and Murrians with water, and others also filled Goats skins to carry water in. Now they marching forward, word was brought unto the PARTHIAN'S that they were removed: whereupon, contrary to their manner, they prefently followed them the felf-fame night, fo that by break of day they overtook the Rereward of the ROMANS, who were so lame and wearied with going and lack of fleep, that they were even done. For beyond expectation, they had gone that night, two hundred and forty furlongs, and further, to fee their Enemies fo fuddenly at their backs, that made them utterly despair: but most of all, the fighting with them increased their thirst, because they were forced to fight as they marched, to drive their Enemies back, yet creeping on still. The Vaward of the Army by chance met with a River that was very clear and cold water; but it was falt A falt River, and venemous to drink: for straight it did gnaw the guts of those that had drunk it, and made them marvellous dry, and put them into a terrible ach and pricking. And notwithftanding that the MARDIAN had told them of it before, yet they would not be ruled, but violently thrust them back that would have kept them from drinking, and so drank. But Antonius going up and down amongst them, prayed them to take a little patience for a while, for hard by there was another River that the water was excellent good to drink, and that from thenceforth the way was from and ill for Horsemen, that the Enemies could follow them no further. So he caused the Retreat to be founded to call them back that fought, and commanded the Tents to be fet up, that the Souldiers might yet have shadow to refresh them with. So when the Tents were set up, and the PARTHI-ANS also retired according to their manner, the Gentleman Mithradates before named, returned again as before, and Alexander in like manner again was brought unto him for Interpreter. Then Mithridates advised him, that after the Army had reposed a little, the ROMANS should remove forthwith, and with all possible speed get to the River: because the PARTHIANS would go no further, but yet were cruelly bent to follow them thither. Alexander carried the report thereof un-Antonius great to Antonius, who gave him a great deal of Gold Plate to bestow upon Mithridates. Mithrida- liberality unto tes took as much of him as he could well carry away in his Gown, and so departed with speed, So Mibbridates so Antonius railed his Camp being yet day light, and caufed all his Army to march, and the PARTHI- the care he had ANS never troubled any of them by the gray, the among the perfect is the care had any of them by the gray, the among the perfect is the care had been delicated. ANS never troubled any of them by the way: but amongst themselves it was as ill and dreadfull a The tumult of night as ever they had. For there were villains of their own company, who cut their fellows throats Antonius Soulfor the Money they had; and belides that, robbed the Sumpters and Carriage of fuch Money as diers through they carried, and at length they fet upon Antonius Slaves that drave his own Sumpters and Carri-covetousnels. age, they brake goodly Tables and rich Plate in pieces, and divided it among themfelves. Thereupon all the Camp was straight in tumult and uproar: for the refidue of them were afraid it had been the PARTHIANS that had given them this Alarm, and had put all the Army out of order. Insomuch that Antonius called for one Rhamnus, one of his Slaves enfranchifed that was of his Guard, Antonius defand made him give him his faith that he would thrust his Sword through him when he would bid perate mind. him, and cut off his head, because he might not be taken alive of his Enemies, nor known when he were dead. This grieved his friends to the heart, that they burst out a weeping for forrow.

The MARDIAN also did comfort him, and affured him that the River he sought for was hard by, and that he did guels it by a fweet moift wind that breathed upon them, and by the air which they found fresher then they were wont, and also for that they setched their wind more at liberty; and moreover, because that fince they did fet forward, he thought they were near their journeys end, nor lacking much of day. On the other fide allo Amonius was informed, that this great tumult and trouble came not through the Enemies, but through the vile covetouiness and villany of certain of his Souldiers. Therefore Antonius to fet his Army again in order, and to pacific this uproar, founded the Trumpet that every man should lodge. Now day began to break, and the Army to fall again into good order, and all the hurly burly to cease, when the PARTHIANS drew near, and that their Arrows lighted among them of the Rereward of his Army. Thereupon the fignall of Battle was given to the light armed men, and the Legioners did cover themselves as they had done before with their Shields, with thewhich they received and defended the force of the PARTHIANS Arrows, who never durst any more come to handy strokes with them : and thus they that were in the Vaward, went down by little and little, till at length they efpied the River. There Antonius placed his armed men upon the fands fo receive and drive back the Enemies, and first of all, got over his men that were fick and hurt, and afterwards all the reft. And those also that were left to refift the Enemies, had leifure enough to drink fafely, and at their pleafure. For when the PARTHIANS faw the River, they unbent their Bows, and bad the ROMANS pals over without any fear, and greatly commended their valiantness. When they had all passed over the River at their ease, they took a little breath, and so marched forward again, not greatly trufting the PARTHIANS. The fixth day after this last Battle, they came to the River of Araxes, which divideth the Countrey of Araxes NIA from MEDIA; the which appeared unto them very dangerous to pass, for the depth and fwiftness of the ftream. And furthermore there ran a rumour through the Camp, that the PAR-THIANS lay in ambush thereabouts, and that they would come and set upon them whilest they were troubled in pailing over the River. But now, after they were all come fafely over without any danger, and that they had gotten to the other fide, into the Prayince of Armenia, then they worthipped that Land, as if it had been the first Land they had feen after a long and dangerous voyage by Sea, being now arrived in a fafe and happy Haven: and the tears ran down their cheeks, and every man imbraced each other for the great joy they had. But now, keeping the Fields in this fruitfull Countrey to plentifull of all things, after to great a famine and want of all things, they to crammed themselves with such plemy of victuals, that many of them were cast into Fluxes and Dropsies. There Antonius multring his whole Army, found that he had loft twenty thousand Footmen, and four thousand Horsemen, which had not all been slain by their Enemies: for the most part of them diet of fickness, making seven and twenty days journey, coming from the City of PHRAATA in Ar-Bighteen feve- MENIA, and having overcome the PARTHIANS in eighteen feveral Battles. But these Victories were not throughly performed nor accomplished, because they followed no long chase: and thereby fought with the it easily appeared, that Artabazus King of Armenia had kept Antonius from ending this War. The treathery For if the fixteen thouland Horsemen which he brought with him out of MEDIA, had been at these of Artabagar Battles (confidering that they were armed and apparelled much after the PARTHIANS manner, and King of Arms acquainted also with their fight, when the Romans had put them to flight that had fought a Baule mis unto Anse with them, and that these Armenians had followed the chase of them that fled) they had not ga thered themselves again in force, neither durst they also have returned to fight with them so often after they had been so many times overthrown. Therefore all those that were of any credit and countenance in the Army, did perswade and egg Antonius to be revenged of this ARMENIAN King: but Antonius wifely diffembling his anger, he told him not of his treachery, nor gave him the worfe countenance, nor did him less honour then he did before : because he knew his Army was weak, and lacked things necessary. Howbeit afterwards he returned again into ARMENIA with a great Army, and fo with fair words, and fweet promites of Meffengers, he allured Artabazus to come to him: whom he then kept Prisoner, and led in triumph in the City of ALEXANDRIA. This greatly of umphed of Ar. fended the ROMANS, and made them much to millike it, when they faw that for Cleopatra's fake rabraw King he deprived his Countrey of her due honour and glory, onely to gratific the ÆGYPTIANS. But of Armania, in this was a pretty while after. Howbeit then, the great hafte he made to return unto Cleopatra, caufed him to put his men to fo great pains, forcing them to lie in the field all Winter long when it fiew unreasonably, that by the way he lost eight thousand of his men, and so came down to the Seaside with a small company, unto a certain place called BLANC BOURG: which standeth betwire the Ci-Antonius pined ties of BERYTUS and SIDON, and there tarried for Cleopatra. And because the tarried longer then away looking he would have had her, he pined away for love and forrow: fo that he was at fuch a straight, that he for Cheputer. wift not what to do, and therefore to wear it out, he gavehimfelf to quaffing and feafting. But he Clespara came was fo drowned with the love of her, that he could not abide to fit at the Table till the Featt was endto Biamburg ed: but many times while others banquetted, he ran to the Sea fide to fee if she were coming. At length the came, and brought with her a world of Apparell and Money to give unto the Souldiers. But some tay notwithstanding, that the brought Apparell and no Money, and that she took of Antinins Money, and caused it to be given amongst the Souldiers in her own name, as if the had given it them. In the mean time it chanced that the King of the MEDES, and Phraories King of the PAR-THIANS, fellat great Wars together, the which began (as it is reported) for the spoils of the Ro-MANS: and grew to be so hot between them, that the King of the MEDES was no less arraid, then alfo in danger to lose his whole Realm. Thereupon he sent unto Antonius, to pray him to come and make War with the PARTHIANS, promiting him that he would aid him to his uttermoft power. This put Antonius again in good comfort, confidering that unlooked for, the onely thing Wars betwire he lacked (which made him he could not overcome the PARTHIANS, meaning that he had not the Parthians brought Horsemen, and men with Darts and Slings enough) was offered him in that fort, that it did and Medes. him more pleasure to accept it, then it was pleasure to the other to offer it. Hereupon, after he had fpoken with the King of Menes at the River of Araxes, he prepared himself once more to go through ARMENIA, and to make more cruel War with the PARTHIANS, then he had done before. Now whilest Antonius was busie in this preparation, Octavia his Wife, whom he had left at ROME, would needs take Sea to come unto him. Her Brother Octavius Cafar was willing to it, not for his respect at all (as most Authors do report) as for that he might have an honest colour to make War with Antonius, if he did misuse her, and not esteem her as she ought to be. But Offavia, Antowhen the was come to ATHENS, the received Letters from Antonius, willing her to ftay there untill nius Wife, his coming, and did advertise her of his journey and determination. The which though it grieved her came to Athens much, and that the knew it was but an excuse: yet by her Letters to him of answer, the asked him him. whether he would have those things sent unto him which she had brought him, being great store of Apparell for Souldiers, a great number of Horfe, fums of Money and gifts, to bestow on his friends and Captains he had about him: and besides all those, she had two thousand Souldiers chosen menall well armed like unto the Prætors Bands. When Niger, one of Antonius friends whom he had fent unto ATHENS, had brought these news from his Wife Ottavia, and withall did greatly praise her, as the was worthy, and well deferved : Cleopatra knowing that Octavia would have Antonius from her, and fearing also that if with her vertue and honest behaviour (besides the great power of her Brother Cafar) the did add thereunto her modelt kind love to please her Husband, that the would then be too strong for her, and in the end win him away: she subtilly seemed to languish for the love of Antonius, pining her body for lack of meat. Furthermore, the every way to framed her countenance, that when Antonius came to fee her, the cast her eyes upon him, like a woman ravished for joy, Straight again when he went from her, the fell a weeping and blubbering, looking rufully on the matter, and still found the means that Antonius should oftentimes find her weeping; and then when the came fuddenly upon her, the made as though the dried her eyes, and turned her face away, as if The flickering the were unwilling that he should fee her weep. All these tricks the used, Anonius being in rea-enticements of diness to go into Syria, to speak with the King of Medes. Then the statterers that furthered Cleopara, unto Cleopetra's mind, blamed Antonius, and told him that he was a hard natured man, and that he had Antonius. fmall love in him, that would fee a poor Lady in fuch torment for his fake, whose life depended onely upon him alone. For Oltavia, faid they, that was married unto him as it were of necessity, becaule her Brother Cafar's Affairs fo required it, hath the honour to be called Antonius lawful Spoule and Wife : and Cleopatra, being born a Queen of to many thoulands of men, is onely named Antonius Leman, and yet that the distained not so to be called, if it might please him she might enjoy his company, and live with him; but if he once leave her, that then it is impossible she should live. To be short, by these their flattries and entirements, they so wrought Antonias essential mind, that searing lest she would make her self away, he returned again unto ALEXANDRIA. and referred the King of MEDES to the next year following; although he received news that the PARTHIANS at that time were at civil Wars among themselves. This notwithstanding, he went afterwards and made Peace with him. For he married his Daughter which was very young. unto one of the Sons that Cleopatra had by him e and then returned being fully bent to make War The occasion with Cefar. When Ottovia was returned to Rome from Athens, Cefar commanded her to go of civil War out of Antonius House, and to dwell by her self, because he had abused her. Ottovia answered bestier. Antohim again, that the would not for lake her Husbands House, and that if he had no other occasion to The love of make War with him, the prayed him then to take no thought for her; for faid the, it were too Offavit unto shamefull a thing, that two so famous Captains should bring in Civil Wars among the ROMANS, Antonius her the one for the love of a woman, and the other for the jealousse betwirt one another. Now as she Husband, and fpake the word, so did the also perform the deed ; for the kept still in Antonius House, as if he her wife and had been there, and very honeftly and honourably kept his Children, not onely those the had by haviour, him, but the other which her Husband had by Fulvia. Furthermore, when Antonius fent any of his men to ROME, to fue for any Office in the Commonwealth, the received them very courteoully, and so used her self unto her Brother, that she obtained the things she requested. Howbeit thereby thinking no hurt, the did Antonius great hurt. For her honest love and regard to her Husband, made every man hate him, when they faw he did so unkindly use a noble Lady: but the grea- Antonius arrotest cause of their malice unto him, was for the division of Lands he made among his Children in the gantly divideth City of ALBXANDRIA. And to confess a troth, it was too arrogant and infolent a part, and done divers Provin-(as a man would fay) in derifion and contempt of the ROMANS. For the affembled all the People cesunto his in the Shew-place, where young men do exercise themselves, and there upon a high Tribunall silvered, he fer two Chairs of Gold, the one for himself, and the other for Gleopatra, and lower Chairs Cafarina the for his children, then he openly published before the Assembly, that first of all he did establish Cleopa- supposed Son tra Queen of AGYPT, of CYPRUS, of LYDIA, and of the lower SYRIA; and at that time also of Casar by Cafarian King of the fame Realms. This Cafarian was supposed to be the Son of Julius Cafar, who Cleopatra Cejarion King of the fame Realms. This (ejarion was supposed to be the non of Julius Cejar, who Alexander and had left Chopara great with child. Secondly, he called the Sons he had by her the Kings of Kings, and Pictomy, Antogave Alexander for his portion, ARMENIA, MEDIA, and PARTHIA, when he had conquered the nine Sons by Countrey ; and unto Prolomy for his portion, PHOE NICIA, and SYRIA, and CILICIA. And there- Cleopatra.

withall he brought out Alexander in a long Gown after the fashion of the MEDES, with a high coptunk Har on hishead, narrow in the top, as the Kings of the Medes and Armenians do ule to wear them: and Prolomy apparelled in a Cloak after the MACEDONIAN manner, with Slippers on his feet, and a broad Har, with a Royall Band of Diadem. Such was the Apparel and old Attire of the ancient Kings and Successors of Alexander the Great. So after his Sons had done their humble duties, and kiffed their Father and Mother, prefently a company of ARMENIAN Souldiers, fer there of purpole, compassed the one about, and a like company of MACEDONIANS the other. Now for Cloparra, the did not onely wear at that time (but at all other times elfe when the came abroad) the Apparel of the goddefs Isis, and so gave audience unto all her Subjects, as a new Isis. Oltovim Cafar reporting all these things unto the Senate, and oftentimes accusing him to the whole betwirt Offa- People and Affembly in ROME, he thereby stirred up all the ROMANS against him. Antonius on the visa Gar, and other fide fem to Rome likewife to accuse him, and the chiefest points of his accusations be charged him with, were the c. First, that having spoiled Sextus, Pompeiss in SICILE, he did not give him his part of the Isle. Secondly, that he did detain in his hands the Ships he lent him to make that War, Thirdly, That having put Lepidss their companion and Triumvirate out of his part of the Empire, and having deprived him of all honours, he retained for himfelf the Lands and Revenues thereof, which had been assigned unto him for his part. And last of all, That he had in manner divided all ITALY amongst his own Souldiers, and had left no part of it for his Souldiers. Otherius Cefer answered him again: That for Lepidus, he had indeed deposed him, and taken his part of the Empire from him, because he did over-cruelly use his Authority. And secondly, For the Conquests he had made by force of Arms, he was contented Antonius thould have his part of them, fo that he would like wifelet him have his part of ARMENIA. And thirdly, That for his Souldiers, they should feek for nothing in ITALY, because they possessed MEDIA and PARTHIA, the which Provinces they had added to the Empire of ROME, valiantly fighting with their Emperor and Captain. Amonius hearing these news, being yet in ARMENIA, commanded Canidius to go presently to the Sea side with his fixteen Legions be had : and be himfelf with Cleopatra, went unto the City of EPHESUS, and there gathered together his Galleys and Ships out of all parts, which came to the number of eight hundred, reckoning the great Ships of burthen : and of those Cleopatra furnished him with two hundred and twenty thouland Talents befides, and Provision of Victuals also to maintain all against of a whole Army in this War. So Antonius, through the perswasion of Domitius, commanded as Cosa. Cleopatra to return again into £GYPT, and there to understand the success of this War. But Cleopatra fearing left Antonius should again be made friends with Ottavius Cefar, by the means of his Wife Offavia, the fo plied Canidisa with Money, and filled his purfe, that he became her Spoks-man unto Antonism, and told him, there was no reason to fend her from this War, who defrayed to great a charge: neither that it was for his profit, because thereby the ÆGYPTIANS would then be utterly discouraged, which were the chiefest strength of the Army by Sea: consider. ing that he could fee no King of all the Kingstheir Confederates, that Chopatra was inferious unto, either for wildom or judgement, feeing that long before the had wifely governed to great a Realm 25 ÆGYPT; and besides that, she had been so long acquainted with him, by whom she had lear-Antonius car- ned to manage great Affairs. These fair perswasions wan him : for it was predeftinated that the rieth Cleanurs Government of all the World should fall into Ollavius Cafar's hands. Thus, all their Forces being with him to the joyned together, they holfed Sail towards the Isle of Samos, and there gave themselves to Fealis Wars, against events, against and folace. For as all the Kings, Princes, and Commonalties, People, and Cities from Syria, and kept great unto the Marthes Mzotides, and from the ARMENIANS to the ILLYRIANS were fent unto, to feeling at the fend and bring all Munition and warlike preparation they could : even fo all Players, Minftrels, Tumblers, Fools, and Jefters, were commanded to affemble in the Isle of Samos. So that, where in manner all the World in every place was full of lamentations, fighs and tears, onely in this life of SANOS there was nothing for many days space but finging and piping, and all the Theatrefull of these common Players, Minstrels, and Singing-men. Besides all this, every City sent an Ox shither to facrifice, and Kings did strive one with another who should make the noblest Feasts, and give the richest Gifts. So that every man faid, What can they do more for joy of Victory, if they win the Battle, when they make already such sumptious Feasts at the beginning of the War? When this was done, he gave the whole rabble of these Minstrels, and such kind of People, the City of PRI-ENE to keep them withall, during this War. Then he went unto the City of ATHENS, and there gave himfelf again to fee Plays and Pastimes, and to keep the Theatres. Cleopatra on the other fide, being jealous of the Honours which Ottowia had received in this City, where indeed the

was marvellously honoured and beloved of the ATHENIANS, to win the Peoples good will also at ATHENS, the gave them great Gifts: and they likewife gave her many great Honours, and appointed certain Ambassadors to carry the Decree to her House, among the which Antonius was one, who (as a Citizen of ATHENS) reported the matter unto her, and made an Oration in the full great preparation of Antonism, he was not a little aftonied at it (fearing he should be driven to fight behalf of the City. Afterwards he lent to ROME to put his Wife Offavia out of his House, who Antonise put bis Wife Office (as it is reported) went our of his House with all Antonises Children, faving the eldest of them he via our of his had by Fulvia, who was with his Father: bewailing and lamenting her curfed hap, that had brought Houle at Rome her to this, that the was accounted one of the chifest causes of this Civil War. The ROMANS did pity her, but much more Antonius, and those specially that had seen Cleopatra: who neither excelled Official in beauty, nor yet in young years. Official Cafar understanding the sudden and wonder that Summer) because he wanted many things, and the great and grievous exactions of Money did fore oppreis the People. For all manner of men elle were driven to pay the fourth part of their Goods Odavius Cafar and Revenue, but the Libertines (to wit, those whose Fathers or other Predecessors had sometime exacteth grieheen Bondmen) were selfed to pay the eighth part of all their Goods at one payment. Hereupon there of the Romant arose a wonderfull exclamation and great uproar all LTALY over, so that amongst the greatest faults that ever Antonius committed, they blamed him most for that he delayed to give Cafar Battle. For he gave Cafar leifure to make his preparations, and also to appeale the complaints of the People, When such a great sum of Money was demanded of them, they grudged at it, and grew to mutiny upon it : but when they had once payed it, they remembred it no more. Furthermore, Titius and Plancus (two of Antonius chiefest friends, and that had been both of them Confuls) for the great Titius and injuries Cleopatra did them, because they hindered all they could that she should not come to this War, from Antonius they went and yielded themselves unto Casar, and told him where the Testament was that Antonius and do yield to had made, knowing perfectly what was in it. The Will was in the custody of the Vestall Nuns: of Cast. whom Cafar demanded it. They answered him, that they would not give it him: but if he would go and take it, they would not hinder him. Thereupon Cafar went thither, and having read it first to himself, he noted certain places worthy of reproach : fo affembling all the Senate, he read it before them all. Whereupon divers were marvellously offended, and thought it a strange matter. that he being alive, should be punished for that he had appointed by his Will to be done after his death. Cafar chiefly took hold of this, that he ordained touching his buriall : for he willed that his body, though he died at Rome, should be brought in Funerall pomp through the middest of the Market-place, and that it should be sent into ALEXANDRIA unto Cleopatra. Furthermore, among divers other faults wherewith Antonius was to be charged for Cleopatra's fake, Calvilius one of Calar's friends reproved him, because he had frankly given Cleopatra all the Libraries of the Roy- Asamous Liall City of PERGAMUM, in the which she had above two hundred thousand several Books. Again brary in the alfo, that being on a time fet at the Table, he suddenly role from the Board and trod upon Cleopa- City of Pergatra's foot, which was a fign given between them, that they were agreed of. That he had also mum. suffered the EPHESIANS in his presence to call Cleopatra their Soveraign Lady. That divers times fitting in his Tribunal and Chair of State, giving audience to all Kings and Princes, he had received Love-Letters from Chopatra, written in Tables of Onyx or Christall; and that he had read them, fitting in his Imperiall Seat. That one day when Furnius a man of great account, and the Furnius an ethem, fitting in his Imperial ocat. That one way which a more a man of Cleopatra by chance coming loquent Ora-eloquentest man of all the Romans, pleaded a matter before him. Cleopatra by chance coming loquent Orathrough the Market place in her Litter where Furniss was a pleading, Antonius straight rose out Romans. of his Seat, and left his Audience to follow her Litter. This notwithstanding, it was thought Calvifius devifed the most part of all these Accusations of his own head. Nevertheless they that loved Antonius, were interceffors to the People for him, and amongst them they fent one Geminius unto Geminius sent Antonius, to pray him he would take heed that through his negligence his Empire were not taken from Rome to from him, and that he should be counted an enemy to the People of ROME. This Geminius being Antonius, to arrived in GREECE, made Cleopatra jealous straight of his coming, because she surmised that he came not but to speak for Octavia. Therefore she spared not to taunt him all supper time; and moreover to fpight him the more, the made him to be fet lowest of all the Board; the which he took patiently, expecting occasion to speak with Antonius. Now Antonius commanding him at the Table to tell him what wind brought him thither, he answered, That it was no Table-talk. and that he would tell him to morrow morning fafting; but drunk or fafting, howfoever it were, he was fure of one thing, that all would not go well on his fide, unless Cleopatra were fent back into EGYPT. Antonius took these words in very ill part. Cleopatra on the other fide answered him, Thou doest well Geminius, faid she, to tell the truth before thou be compelled by torments: but within few days after, Geminius stole away, and fled to ROME. The Flatterers also to please Many of An-Chopatra, did make her drive many other of Antonius faithfull fervants and friends from him, who tonius friends could not abide the injuries done unto them: among the which these two were chief, Marcus Syl-Lanus, and Dellius the Hiftoriographer, who wrote that he fled because her Physician Glancus told him, that Cleopatra had fet some secretly to kill him. Furthermore, he had Cleopatra's displeasure, because he said one night at Supper, that they made them drink sowre Wine, where Sarmentus at ROME drank good Wine of FALERNA. This Sarmentus was a pleafant young Boy, fuch as the Lords at ROME are wont to have about them to make them pastime, which they call their joyes, and he was Oftavius Cafar's Boy. Now after that Cafar had made fufficient preparation, he proclaimed open War against Cleopatra, and made the People to abolish the Power and Empire of Antonius, because he had before given it up unto a Woman. And Casar said surthermore, that pinetakensions Antonius was not Master of himself, but that Cleoparra had brought him beside himself by her him. charms and amorous poylons: and that they that should make War with them, should be Signs and won-Mardian the Eunuch, Photinus, and Iras (a Woman of Cleopatra's Bed chamber, that frizeled ders before the her hair, and dreffed her head) and Charmion, the which were those that ruled all the Affairs twite Antonius of editionius Empire. Before this War, as it is reported, many figns and wonders fell out, and offering first of all, the City of Pisaurum which was made a Colony to Rome, and replenished Casar. with People by Amonius, standing upon the Shore fide of the Sea Adriatick, was by a terrible Pifaro, a City Earth-quake funk into the ground. One of the Images of Stone which was fet up in the honour of in Italy, funk into the ground. Amonius in the City of Alba, did sweat many days together: and though some wiped it a- by an Earth-way, yet it left not fweating ftill. In the City of PATRAS whilest Antonine was there, the Temple quake:

of the Giants against the gods is fet out in Imagery, the Statue of Bacchus with a terrible wind was thrown down in the Theatre. It was faid, that Antonius came of the race of Hercules (as you have heard before) and in the manner of his Life he followed Bacchns, and therefore was called the new

Bacchns, Furthermore, the same bluftering from of wind overthrew the great monftrous Images as ATHENS, that were made in the honour of Eumenes and Attalus, the which men had named and intituled, The Antonians : and yer did they hurt none of the other Images, which were many befides. The Admirall Galley of Cleoparra was called Antoniade, in the which there chanced a marvellous ill fign : Swallows had bred under the Poop of her Ship, and there came others after them that drave among which there were many Galleys that had eight and ten banks of Oars, the which were fumptuforelacted by away the first, and plucked down their nests. Now when all things were ready, and that they Swallows bree- drew near to fight, it was found, that Antonius had no less then five hundred good Ships of War, Antonius Pow oully furnished, not so meet for Fight, as for Triumph : an hundred thousand Footmen, and twelve er against OHz. thouland Horsemen; and had with him to aid him these Kings and Subjects following: Bocchus King viss Cafer.

Antonius had of Lybia, Tarcondemus King of high Cilicia, Archelaus King of Cappadocia, Philadel. right Kings phus King of Paphlagonia, Mithridates King of Comagena, and Adalias King of Thra-minions.

and their Pow-CAA. All which were there every man in person. The residue that were absent, sent their Armies: as er, to sid him. Pokemon King of PONT, Manchus King of ARABIA, Herodes King of JURY; and furthermore, A. The Army and myntae King of Lycaonia and of the Galatians: and befides all thefe, he had all the aid the King of Medes sent unto him. Now for Cafar, he had two hundred and fifty Ships of War, eighty gainst Antonis thousand Footmen, and well near as many Horsemen as his Enemy Antonius. Antonius for his part, had all under his dominion from ARMENIA and the River of Euphrates, unto the Sea IONIUM and Anterius Do. ILLYRICUM. Offavius Cefar had also for his part, all that which was in our Hemisphere or half part of the World, from ILLY RIA unto the Ocean Sea upon the West; then all from the Ocean unto Mare Siculum : and from AFRICK, all that which is against ITALY, as GAUL and SPAIN, Furthermore, all from the Province of Cyrenia to Ethiopia, was subject unto Antonias. far's Domini-Now Antonius was made fo subject to a womans will, that though he was a great deal stronger by much ruled by Land, yet for Cleopatra's fake he would needs have this Battle tried by Sea: though he faw before his eyes, that for lack of Water-men, his Captains did press by force all forts of men out of GREECE that they could take up in the Field, as travellers, muletters, reapers, harvest-men, and young boys and yet could not sufficiently furnish his Galleys: so that the most part of them were empty, and could fcant row, because they lacked Water-men enough. But on the contrary fide, Cafar's Ships were not built for pomp, high and great, onely for a fight and bravery, but they were light of yarage, armed and furnished with Water-men as many as they needed, and had them all in readiness in the Havens of TARENTUM and BRUNDUSIUM. So Ottavius Cafar fent unto Antonius, to will him to delay to more time, but to come on with his Army into ITALY; and that for his own part he would give him fafe harbour to land without any trouble; and that he would withdraw his Army from the Sea, as far as one Horfe could run, untill he had put his Army ashore, and had lodged his men. Antonius on the other fide bravely fent him word again, and challenged the combat of him, man for man, Antonius rode though he were the elder : and that if he refuted him to, he would then fight a Battle with him in the Fields of Pharsalla, as Julius Cefar and Pompey had done before. Now whilest Antonius role the head of A at Anchor, lying idly in Harbour in the head of ACTIUM, in the place where the City of NICOPOdism: where LIS standeth at this present, Casar had quickly passed the Sea Ionium, and taken a place called To-the City of Mi. R N R, before Amonius understood that he had taken Ship. Then began his men to be afraid, be-capilly its natural control of the Amonius Indiana Casar Russ Clanaria making light of it. And what danger I near ESPONIUM COLOR CAUSE his Army by Land was lest behind. But Cleopatra making light of it; And what danger I pray this tout can- you, faid the, if Cafar keep at * TORYNE? The next morning by break of day, his Enemis conot properly be ming with full force of Oars in Battle against him, Antonins was afraid that if they came to joyne, expressions they would take and carry away his ships that had no men of War in them. So he armed all his waother longue, other Longue, ter-men, and fet them in order of Battle upon the fore-Castle of their Ships, and then lift up all his equivocation of ranks of Oars towards the Element, as well on the one fide as on the other, with the Prows against this word To-the Enemies, at the entry and mouth of the gulf, which beginneth at the point of ACTIUM: and syst, which fig. fo kept them in order of Battle, as if they had been armed and furnished with Water-men and Soulnifictha City diers. Thus Oftwie Cafar being finely deceived by this Stratagem, retired prefently, and there of Albania, and silo a ladle to withall Antonius very wifely and fuddenly did out him off from fresh water. For understanding that foum the por the places where Ottavius Cafar landed had very little store of water, and yet very bad, he shut them with : as it the in with strong ditches and trencheshe cast, to keep them from failing out at their pleasure, and so to means Cafar go feek water farther off. Furthermore, he dealt very friendly and courteously with Demities, and fitte by the fire against Channel Court of the Cafar against Channel Cha the cumming against Cleopatra's mind. For he being sick of an Ague when he went and took a little Boat to go of the por.

auto Cefer's Camp, Antonius was very forry for it, but yet he sent after him all his carriage, train, Domitius forfa and men : and the same Domitius, as though he gave him to understand that he repented his open treaketh Antonius. fon, died immediately after. There were certain Kings also that for look him, and turned on Cafar's and goeth unto four, and management and Deserans. Furthermore, his Fleet and Navy that was unfortunate in all things Amyntas and and unready for service, compelled him to change his mind, and to hazard Battle by Land. And Deinture, do Canidius alio, who had charge of his Army by Land, when time came to follow Antonius determination, he named him clean contrary, and counfelled him to fend Cleopatra back again, and himfrom Annair, felf to retireinto MACEDON, to fight there on the main Land. And furthermore told him, that Dicomes King of the GETESpromifed to aid him with a great Power: and that it should be no shame nor dishonour to him to let Cefar have the Sea, because himself and his men both had been well practifed and exercised in Battles by Sea, in the War of SICILIA against Sexten Pomprius but rather that he should go against all reason (he having so great skill and experience of Battles by Land as he had) if he should not imploy the force and valiantness of fo many lusty armed Footmen as he had ready, but would weaken his Army by dividing them into Ships. But now, notwithfranding all these good persuasions, Cleopatra forced him to purall to the hazard of Battle by Sea : considering withher self how she might shy and provide for her safety, not to help him to win the Victory, but to fly more easily after the Battle loft. Betwirt Antonius Camp and his Fleet of Ships, there was a great high point of firm Land that ran a good way into the Sea, the which Antoning used often for a walk, without mistrust of fear or danger. One of Cafar's men perceived its and told his Mafter that he would laugh if they could take up Antonim in the middeft of his walk. Thereupon Calar fent some of hismen to lie in ambush for him, and they miffed not much of taking him (for they took him that came before him) because they discovered too soon, and so Antonius nim (for they took than that came octobe man) became they discovered too toon, and to Antonius ger of taking fraped very hardly. So when Antonius had determined to fight by Sea, he fet all the other Ships on at Adium. fire, but threefcore Ships of EGYPT, and referved onely the best and greatest Galleys, from three banks unto ten banks of Oars. Into them he put two and twenty thousand fighting men, with two thousand darters and slingers. Now as he was setting his men in order of battle, there was a Captain, a valiant man, that had ferved Antoniau in many Battles and Conflicts, and had all his body hacked and cut : who, as Antonius paffed by him, cried out unto him, and faid : O noble Emperor, how cometh it to pass that you trust to these vile brittle Ships? What, do you mistrust these Antonius res woulds of mine, and this Sword? let the AGYPTIANS and PHOENICIANS fight by Sea, and gardeth no fet us on the main Land, where we use to conquer, or to be slain on our feet. Antonism passed sel of his by him and faid never a word, but onely beckened to him with his hand and head, as though he wil- fouldiers. led him to be of good courage, although indeed he had no great courage himself. For when the Mafters of the Galleys and Pilots would have let their Sails alone, he made them clap them on ; faying to colour the matter withall, that not one of his Enemies should scape. All that day and the three days following, the Sea role fo high, and was to boilterous, that the Battle was put off. The fifth day the florm ceased, and the Sea calmed again, and then they rowed with force of Oars in Battle one against the other: Anonius leading the right Wing with Publicola, and Calius the left, Battle by Sea and Marcin Octavini, and Marcin Justeins the midft. Oftavins Cafar on the other fide had placed at Actium, be-Agrippa in the left Wing of his Army, and had kept the right Wing for himself. For the Armies twist Antonius by Land, Canidius was General of Antonius fide, and Taurus of Cafar's fide: who kept their men in Battle-ray, the one before the other, upon the Sea fide, without ftirring the one against the other. Further, touching both the Chieftains: Antonisa being in a fwift Pinnace, was carried up and down by force of Oars through his Army, and spake to his People to encourage them to fight valiantly. as if they were on main Land, because of the steadiness and heaviness of their Ships : and commanded the Pilots and Mafters of the Galleys, that they should not ftir, none otherwise then if they were at Anchor, and so to receive the first Change of their Enemies, and that they should not go our of the Streight of the Gulf. Cafar betimes in the morning going out of his Tent, to fee his Ships throughout, met a man by chance that drave an Als before him : Cafar asked the man what his Alucky fign name was. The poor man told him his name was Eutychus, to fay Fortunate: and his Affes name unto Odavins Nicon, to say Conqueror. Therefore Cefar, after he had won the Battle, fetting out the Europhys Nicon. Therefore Cefar, after he had won the Battle, fetting out the Europhys Ni-Market-place with the Spurs of the Galleys he had taken, for a sign of his Victory, he caused con, fortunate also the Man and his Als to be set up in brass. When he had visited the order of his Army Conqueror. throughout, he took a little Pinnace, and went to the right Wing, and wondered when he faw his Enemies lie still in the Streight, and stirred not. For differening them afar off, men would have thought they had been Ships riding at Anchor : and a good while he was fo perswaded. So, he kept his Galleys eight furlongs from his Enemies. About noon there arose a little gale of wind from the Sea, and then Anionium men waxing angry with tarrying fo long, and trufting to the greatness and height of their Ships, as if they had been invincible, they began to march forward with their left Wing. Cafar feeing that, was a glad man, and began a little to give back from the right Wing, to allure them to come farther out of the Streight and Gulf, to the end that he might with his light Ships well manned with Water-men, turn and environ the Galleys of the Enemies, the which were heavy of yarage, both for their bignels, as also for lack of Water-men to row them. When the Skirmish began, and that they came to joyn, there was no great hurt at the first meeting, neither did the Ships vehemently hit one against the other, as they do commonly in fight by Sea. For on the other fide, Antonius Ships for their heaviness could not have the strength and swiftnels to make their blows of any force: and Cafar's Ships on the other fide took great heed not to ruth and thock with the fore-Castles of Antonius Ships, whose Prows were armed with great brazen Spurs. Furthermore, they durft not flank them, because their points were easily broken, which way foever they came to fet upon their Ships, that were made of great main fquare pieces of Timber, bound together with great iron pins: fo that the Battle was much like unto a Battle by Land, or to speak more properly, to the affault of a City. For there were always three or four of Cafar's Ships about one of Antonius Ships, and the Souldiers fought with their Pikes, Halbards and Darts, and threw Halbards and Darts With fire. Amount Ships on the other fide bestowed among them, with their Crofstows and Engines of battery, great flore of thos from their high Tow-ers of wood that were fet upon their Ships. Now Publicela feeing Agrippa put forth his left Wing more room, and to go a little at one fide, to purthole farther off that were afraid, and in the middeft of the Battle : for they were fore diftreffed by Arrunnins. Howben the Battle was yet of even hand, and the Victory doubtfull, being indifferent to both; when fuddenly they faw the threefcore Cleopatra Birth Ships of Cleopatra builty about their Yard-marts, and holding Sail to fly. So they fled through the midden of them that were in fight, for they had been placed behind the great Ships, and did marvelloully disorder the other Ships. For the Enemies themselves wondered much to see them fail in that fort, with full fail towards PELOFOMNESUS. There Anonius shewed plainly, that he had not onely loft the courage and heart of an Emperour, but also of a valiant man; and that he was not his The foul of a own man (proving that true which an old man spake in mirch, That the foul of a lover lived in anolover lived in ther body, and not in his own) he was fo carried away with the vain love of this woman, as if he

For Antonius flicth had occupanted; Ship under Sail, he forgot, forfook, and betrayed them that fought for after Cleopatra. when he law Cleopatra's Ship under Sail, he forgot, forfook, and betrayed them that fought for him, and imbarked upon a Galley with five banks of Oars, to follow her that had already begin. to overthrow him, and would in the end be his destruction. When she knew his Galley afar off, she lift up a fign in the Poop of her Ship , and fo Ansenins coming to it, was pluckt up where Cleaparra was: howbeit he faw her not at his first coming, nor she him, but went and fate down alone in the Prow of his Ship, and faid never a word, clapping his head between both his hands. In the mean time came certain light Brigantines of Cefer's, that followed him hard. So Antonius fraight turned the Prow of his Ship, and prefently put the reft to flight, faving one Entrycles a LACEDE-MONIAN, that followed him near, and preffed upon him with great courage, shaking a Dart in his hand over the Prow, as though he would have thrown it unto Antonius. Antonius feeing him, came to the fore-Caftle of his Ship, and asked him what he was that durft follow Antonism fo near? I am, answered he, Eurycles the Son of Lachares, who through Cafar's good fortune feeken to revenge the death of my Father. This Lachares was condemned of felony, and beheaded by Antonius. But vet Eurycles durft not venture upon Antonius Ship, but fet upon the other Admirall-Galley (for there were two) and fell upon him with fuch a blow of his brazen Spur that was fo heavy and big, that he turned her round, and took her, with another that was loaden with very rich fluff and carriage. After Euryeles land leit Antonius, he turned again to his place, and fate down, speaking never a word, as he did before; and so lived three days alone, without speaking to any man. But when he arrived at the head of Tanarus, there Cleopatra's women first brought Antonia and Cleopatra to speak together, and afterwards to sup and lie together. Then began there again a great number of Merchants Ships to gather about them, and some of their friends that had etcaped from this overthrow, who brought news, that his Army by Sea was overthrown, but that they thought the Army by land was yet whole. Then Antenius fent unto Canidius, to return with his Army into Asia by MacEDON. Now for himself, he determined to cross over

Autonizalicen into AFRICK, and took one of his Carects or Hulks loaden with Gold and Silver, and other rich feth his friends carriage, and gave it unto his friends, commanding them to depart, and feek to fave themselves, to depart, and They answered him weeping, that they would neither do it, nor yet for fake him. Then Amenius given thems. giveth them a very courteoully and lovingly did comfort them, and prayed them to depart; and wrote unto Theo-Ship loaden very courteouny and covering that, that he would fee them fafe, and help to hide them in some secret with Gold and philms Governour of Coring the metastand page with Tester. This Theophilus was the Father of Hibplace, until they had made their way and peace with Gefar. This Theophilas was the Father of Hipparchus, who was had in great estimation about Antonius. He was the first of all his enfranchiled Bondmen that revolted from him, and yielded unto Cafar, and afterwards went and dwelt at Co-RINTH. And thus it flood with Antonius. Now for his Army by Sea, that fought before the head or foreland of Actium, they had held out a long time, and nothing troubled them more then a great boilterous wind that role full in the Prows of their Ships , and yet with much ado his Navy was at Antonian Na- length overthrown, five hours within night. There were not flain above five thousand men: but

And yet his Souldiers still wished for him, and ever hoped that he would come by some means or other unto them. Furthermore, they shewed themselves so valiant and saithfull unto him, that after they certainly knew he was fleth they kept themselves whole together seven days. In the end Canidius, Antonius Lieutenant, flying by night, and forfaking his Camp, when they faw them.

Antonius Legi- felves thus defituue of their Heads and Lenders, they yield themselves unto the stronger. This done, Cafar failed towards ATHENS, and othere made peace with the GRECIANS, and divided the rest of the Corn that was taken up for Antennus Arthy, unto the Towns and Cities of GREECE, the which had been brought to extream milery and powerty, clean without Money, Slaves, Horie, and other Beaths of extraoge. So that my Grandfather Nieuwine told, that all the themselves an-

Citizens of our City of CHERGINER: (not one; exterpsed) were driven themselves to carry a certain measure of Corn on their shouldets tooker Sex side, that, west directly over against the life of ANTI-CYRA, and yes were they driven thinker with which! They carried at this but once: for the fecond time that they were charged again to make the like carriage, all the Corn bring ready to be carried, news came that Amenius had loft the Battle, and in keaped our poor City. For Amenius Souldiers and Deputies fled immediately, and the Citizens divided the Corn amongst them. Antonius being arrived in Lybia, he fent Cleopatra before into EGYPT from the City of PARATONIUM; and he himself remained very solitary, having onely two of his friends with him, with whom he wandred no and down, both of them Orators, the one Aristocrates a GRECIAN, and the other Lucilius a Lucilius fooken

ROMAN: of whom we have written in another place, that at the Battle where Brutus was over- of in Brutus thrown, by the City of PHILIPPES, he came and willingly put himself into the hands of those Life. that followed Brutus, faying that it washe: because Brutus in the mean time might have liberty to fave himself. And afterwards, because Antonins faved his life, he still remained with him, and was The fidelity of very faithfull and friendly unto him till his death. But when Antonius heard, that he whom he had Antonius trufted with the Government of Ly BIA, and unto whom he had given the charge of his Army there, had vielded unto Casar, he was so mad withall, that he would have slain himself for anger, had not his friends about him withstood him, and kept him from it. So he went unto ALEXANDRIA, and there found Cleopatra about a wonderfull enterprize, and of great attempt. Betwixt the red Sea, and the Sea between the Lands that point upon the Coast of ÆGYPT, there is a little piece of Land The wonderfull that divideth both the Seas, and separateth AFRICK from ASIA: the which Streight is so narrow attempt of at the end where the two Seasare narrowest, that it is not above three hundred furlongs over. Cleo-Gleopaira. patra went about to lift her Ships out of the one Sea, and to hale them over the bank into the other Sea: that when her Ships were come into the Gulf of ARABIA, the might then carry all her Gold and Silver away, and so with a great company of men go and dwell in some place about the Ocean

Sea, far from the Sea Mediterraneum, to scape the danger and bondage of this War. But now, because the ARABIANS dwelling about the City of PETRA, did burn the first Ships that were brought to Land, and that Antonius thought, that his Army by Land which he left at ACTIUM was yet whole, the left off her enterprize, and determined to keep all the ports and paffages of her Realm. Antonius, he for fook the City and company of his friends, and built him a house in the Sea, by the Isle of PHAROS, upon certain forced mounts which he caused to be cast into the Sea, and dwelt there, as a man that banished himself from all mens company: saying that he would lead Timons life, because Antonius folhe had the like wrong offered him, that was before offered unto Timon; and that for the unthankful- loweth the life nels of thole he had done good unto, and whom he took to be his friends, he was angry with all and example of men, and would trust no man. This Timon was a Citizen of ATHENS, that lived about the War thropos the Aof Peloponnesus, as appeareth by Plato and Aristophanes Comedies: in the which they moc-thenian.

ked him, calling him a viper and malicious man unto mankind, to flun all other mens companies. Plate and Aribut the company of young Alcibiades, a bold and infolentyouth, whom he would greatly feaft and stophanes tellimake much of, and kiffed him very gladly. Apemantus wondering at it, asked him the cause what Milanthropes, he meant to make so much of that young man alone, and to hate all others: Timon answered him, what he was, I do it, faid he, because I know that one day he shall do great mischief unto the ATHENIANS. This Timon formetimes would have Apemantus in his company, because he was much like of his nature and conditions, and also followed him in manner of life. On a time when they folemnly celebrated the Feaft called Choze at ATHENS (to wit, the Feafts of the dead where they make Sprinklings and Sacrifices for the dead) and that they two then feasted together by themselves, Apemantus faid unto the other: O here is a trim Banquet Timon, Timon answered again: Yea, faid he, so thou wert not here. It is reported of him also, that this Timon on a time (the People being assembled in the Market-place about dispatch of some affairs) got up into the Pulpit for Orations, where the Orators commonly use to speak unto the People: and silence being made, every man listening to hear what he would fay, because it was a wonder to see him in that place, at length he began to speak in this manner: his ofhood

My Lords of ATHENS, I have a little yard at my house where there groweth a Fig-tree, on the which the Athonian many Citizens have hanged themselves: and because I mean to make some building on the place, I thought good to let you all understand it, that before the Fig-tree be cut down, if any of you be defpe-

Now it chanced so, that the Sea getting in, it compassed his Tomb round about, that no man could come to it: and upon the fame was written this Epitaph: Here lies a wretched corfe, of wretched foul bereft :

The Epitaph of Timon Mifanthropes.

Seek not my name : a plague consume you wicked wretches left. It is reported that Timon himself, when he lived, made this Epitaph: for that which is commonly rehearfed, was not this, but made by the Poet Callimachus:

Here lie I Timon, who alive all living men did hate:

Pass by and curse thy sill: but pass, and stay not here thy gate.

Many other things could we tell you of this Timon, but this little shall suffice at this present. But now to return to Antonius again. Canidius himself came to bring him news, that he had lost all his Army by Land at ACTIUM: on the other fide he was advertised also, that Herodes King of Juny, who had also certain Legions and Bands with him, was revolted unto Casar, and all the other Kings in like manner: fo that faving those that were about him, he had none left him. All this notwith- Antonius riorstanding did nothing trouble him: and it seemed that he was contented to forgo all his hope, and so ing in Alexanto be rid of all his cares and troubles. Thereupon he left his folitary house he had built by the Sea driaster his which he called Timoneon, and Chopatra received him into her Royal Palace. He was no fooner great lots and come thither, but he straight set all the City on riotting and banquetting again, and himself to Toga virilis, liberality and Gifts. He caused the Son of Julim Cefar and Cleopatra, to be enrolled (according

For these things, there was kept great feasting, banquetting and dancing in Alexanwife Falvit. DRIA many days together. Indeed they did break their first order they had set down, which they Anodetreefa called Animetobion (asmuch to fay, No life comparable) and did fet up another, which they called eably Anionius Synapothanumenon (fignifying the order and agreement of those that will die together) the which in and cropara, exceeding sumpruousness and cost was not inferior to the first. For their friends made themselves to thanumenon, be enrolled in this order of those that would die together, and so made great Feasts one to another: for every man when it came to his turn, feafted their whole Company and Fraternity. Cleopatra in the mean time was very carefull in gathering all forts of poilons together, to deftroy men. Now to Animerobion. Make proof of those poilons which made men die with least pain, she tried it upon condemned men in prison. For when she saw the poisons that were sudden and vehement, and brought speedy death ving the force with grievous torments: and in contrary manner, that fuch as were more mild and gentle, had not that quick speed and force to make one die suddenly: she afterwards went about to prove the stinging of Snakes and Adders, and made some to be applied unto men in her fight, some in one sort, some The property of the biting of proved fo fit as the biting of an Alpick. : the which cauleth onely a heaviness of the head, without fwouning or complaining, and bringeth a great defire also to sleep, with a little sweat in the face. and so by little and little taketh away the senses and vitall powers, no living creature perceiving that the Patients feel any pain. For they are so forry when any body awaketh them, and taketh them up, as those that be taken out of a found sleep, are very heavy and desirous to sleep. This notwith-Antonies and flanding, they fent Ambassadors unto Octavine Cafar in Asia, Cleopatra requesting the Realm of Ambassadors EGYPT for her children, and Antonius praying that he might be suffered to live at ATHENS like a private man, if Cafar would not let him remain in ÆGYPT. And because they had no other men of estimation about them, for that some were fled, and those that remained, they did not greatly trust. they were enforced to fend Euphronius the Schoolmafter of their children. For Alexas LAODICI-AN, who was brought into Antonius House and favour by means of Timagenes, and afterwards was in greater credit with him, then any other GRECIAN (for that he had ever been one of Cleopatra's Ministers to win Antonius, and to overthrow all his good determinations to use his Wife Offavia well :) him Antonius had fent unto Herodes King of Juny, hoping still to keep him his friend, that he should not revolt from him. But he remained there, and betrayed Antonius. For where he should have kept Herodes from revolting from him, he perswaded him to turn to Cafar: and trusting King Herodes, he prelumed to come in Cefar's prelence. Howbeit Herodes did him no pleasure, for he was presently taken Prisoner, and sent in chains to his own Countrey, and there by Casar's commandment put to death. Thus was Alexas in Antonius life time put to death, for betraying of him. Furthermore, Cafar would not grant unto Antonius requests : but for Cleopatra, he made her answer, that he would deny her nothing reasonable, so that she would either put Antonius to death, or drive him out of her Countrey. Therewithall he fent Thyreus one of his men unto her, a very wife and discreet man : who bringing Letters of credit from a young Lord unto a noble Lady, and that besides greatly liked her beauty, might easily by his eloquence have perswaded her. He was longer in talk with her then any man else was, and the Queen her felf also did him great honour: insomuch as he made Antonius jealous of him. Whereupon Antonius caused him to be taken and well-favouredly whipped, and so sent him unto Casar: and bade him tell him, that he made him angry with him, because he shewed himself proud and disdainfull towards him; and new specially, when he was easie to be angred, by reason of his present misery. To be short, if this mislike thee (faid he) thou haft Hipparchus one of my enfranchifed Bondmen with thee : hang him if thou wilt, or whip him at thy pleasure, that we may cry quittance. From henceforth Cleopatra, to clear her felf of the sufpition he had of her, made more of him then ever she did. For first of all, where she did solemnize the day of her birth very meanly and sparingly, fit for her present missortune, she now in contrary manner did keep it with fuch folemnity, that the exceeded all measure of sumpruousness and magnificence: fo that the Guests that were bidden to the Feasts, and came poor, went away rich. Now things passing thus, Agrippa by divers Letters sent one after another unto Casar, prayed him to return to Rome, because the Affairs there did of neceffity require his person and presence. There-Peteufium was upon he did defer the War till the next year following: but when Winter was done, he returned ielded up to again through Syria by the Coast of Africk, to make Wars against Antonius, and his other Offavim Cafar Captains. When the City of PELEUSIUM was taken, there ran a rumour in the City, that Selencus (by (leopatra's consent) had surrendred the same. But to clear her self that she did not, Cleopatra brought Seleucus Wife and Children unto Antonius, to be revenged of them at his pleasure. Furthermore, Cleopatra had long before made many fumptuous Tombs and Monuments, as well for Monuments for excellency of workmanship, as for height and greatness of building, joyning hard to the Temple of up by the Temple of Ifit. Ifit. Thinther the caufed to be brought all the Treasure and precious things the had of the ancient Kings her Predecessors: as Gold, Silver, Emeralds, Pearls, Ebony, Ivory, and Cynamon, and besides all that, a marvellous number of Torches, Fagots, and Flax. So Ottavius Cafar being afraid to lose such a Treasure and masse of Riches, and that this woman for spight would set it on fire and burn it every whit, he always sent some one or other unto her from him, to put her in good comfort, whilest he in the mean time drew near the City with his Army. So Cafar came and pitched his Camp hard by the City, in the place where they run and manage their Horses. Antonius made a falley upon him, and fought very valiantly, so that he drave Cafar's Horsemen back, fighting with his men even into their Camp. Then he came again to the Palace, greatly boafting of this Victory, and sweetly kissed Cleo-Datra. armed as he was when he came from the Fight, recommending one of his men of Arms unto her. that had valiantly fought in this Skirmilh. Cleopatra to reward his manliness, gave him an Armour and Head-piece of clean Gold: howbeit the man at Arms when he had received this rich gift. stole away by night, and went to Cafar. Antonius fent again to challenge Cafar, to fight with him hand to hand. Cafar answered him, That he had many other ways to die then fo. Then Antonius feeing there was no way more honourable for him to die, then fighting valiantly, he determined to fet up his rest. both by Sea and Land. So being at Supper (as it is reported) he commanded his Officers and Houshold Servants that waited on himat his Board, that they should fill his Cups full, and make as much of him as they could: for faid he, you know not whether you shall do so much for me to morrow or not, or whether you shall serve another Master : and it may be you shall see me no more, but a dead body. This notwithstanding, perceiving that his friends and men fell a weeping to hear him fay so: to salve that he had spoken, he added this more unto it; that he would not lead them to Battle, where he thought not rather fafely to return with Victory, then valiantly to die with honour. Furthermore, the self-same night within a little of midnight, when all the City was quiet, full of fear and forrow, thinking what would be the iffue and end of this War, it is faid, that quiet, full of fear and forrow, thinking what would be the mue and that of this twar, it is raid, that fuddenly they heard a marvellous fweet harmony of fundry forts of Infruments of Mufick, with the Strange noise heard, and no ery of a multitude of People, as they had been dancing, and had fung as they use in Bacchus Feasts, thing seen. with movings and turnings after the manner of the Satyrs: and it feemed, that this Dance went through the City unto the Gate that opened to the Enemies, and that all the troop that made all this noise they heard, went out of the City at that Gate. Now, such as in reason sought the depth of the interpretation of this wonder, thought that it was the god unto whom Antonius bare fingular devotion. to counterfeit and refemble him, that did forfake them. The next morning by break of day, he went to fet those few Footmen he had in order upon the hills adjoyning unto the City: and there he flood to behold his Galleys which departed from the Haven, and rowed against the Galleys of the Enemies, and fo stood still, looking what exploits his Souldiers in them would do. But when by force of rowing they were come near unto them, they first faluted Cafar's men; and then Cafar's men re-faluted them also, and of two Armies made but one: and then did all together row toward the City. When Antonius Na-Antonius faw that his men did for lake him, and yielded unto Cafar, and that his Footmen were brothemselves unken and overthrown, he then fled into the City, crying out that Cleopatra had betrayed him unto them to Cefar, with whom he had made War for her take. Then fie being airaid of his fury, fled into the Tom the Combins orest. which he had caused to be made, and there she locked the doors unto her, and shut all the springs of thrown by Octhe locks with great bolts, and in the mean time fent unto Antonius to tell him, that she was dead. tavius Cafar. Antonius believing it, faid unto himfelf: What doeft thou look for further, Antonius, fith fpightinto her Tomb full fortune hath taken from thee the onely joy thou hadft, for whom thou yet referveft thy life? or Monument. When he had faid these words, he went into a Chamber and unarmed himself, and being naked, faid thus : O Cleopatra, it grieveth me not that I have loft thy company, for I will not be long from thee: but I am forry, that having been so great a Captain and Emperour, I am indeed condemned to be judged of less courage and noble mind then a woman. Now he had a man of his called Eros, whom he loved and trusted much, and whom he had long before caused to swear unto him, that he should kill him when he did command him : and then he willed him to keep his promife. His man drawing his Sword, lift it up as though he had meant to have ftricken his Mafter: but turning his head on one fide, he thrust his Sword into himself, and fell down dead at his Masters foot. Then faid Antonius: Eros, Antonius O noble Eros, I thank thee for this, and it is valiantly done of thee, to shew me what I should do to Servant, slew my felf, which thou couldest not do for me. Therewithall he took his Sword, and thrust it into his himself. belly, and so fell down upon a little bed. The wound he had, killed him not presently, for the blood through his flinted a little when he was laid: and when he came formewhat to himself again, he prayed them that Sword into were about him, to dispatch him. But they all fled out of the chamber, and left him crying out tor- himfelf, but menting himself: untill at the last there came a Secretary unto him (called Diomedes) who was com- died not premanded to bring him into the Tomb or Monument where Cleopatra was. When he heard that the Amonius carriwas alive, he very earnestly prayed his men to carry his body thither, and so he was carried in his ed unto Cleomens arms into the entry of the Monument. Notwithstanding, Chopatra would not open the Gates, parater Tomb, but came to the high windows, and cast out certain chains and ropes, in the which Antonius was truly fed : and Cleopatra her own felf, with two women onely, which the had fuffered to come with her into these Monuments, trifed Antonius up. They that were present to behold it, faid they never faw A lamentable to pitiful a fight. For they plucked up poor Antonius all bloody as he was, and drawing on with fight to fee pangs of death; who holding up his hands to Cleopatra, raifed up himself as well as he could. It was Antonius and a hard thing for these women to do, to lift him up: but Cleopatra Rooping down with her head, put-Cleopatra ting too all her frength to her uttermost power, did lift him up with much ado, and never let go her hold, with the help of the women beneath that bade her be of good courage, and were as forry to fee her labour fo, as the her felf. So when the had gotten him in after that fort, and laid him on a bed, the rent her Garmen's upon him, clapping her breaft, and scratching her face and stomach. Then she dried up his blood that had bewrayed his face, and called him her Lord, her Husband, and Emperor, forgetting her own milery and calamity, for the pitty and compassion she took of him. Antonius made her cease her lamenting, and called for wine, either because he was a thirst, or else for that he thought thereby to haften his death. When he had drunk, he earnestly prayed her, and perswaded ried to the place where his Tomb was, and there falling down on her knees, embracing the Tomb with her women, the tears running down her cheeks, the began to speak in this fort: O my dear Cleophre's list. Lord Antonius, it is not long fithence I buried thee here, being a free woman and now I offer unto the the funeral sprinklings and oblations, being a captive and prisoner; and yet I am forbidden Tomb.

her, that the would feek to fave her life, if the could positible, without reproach and dishonour : and that chiefly the should trust Proculeise above any man else about Cefar. And as for himself, that she thould not lament nor forrow for the miterable change of his fortune at the end of his days; but rather that she should think him the more fortunate, for the former Triumphs and Honours he had received; confidering that while he lived, he was the nobleft and greateft Prince of the World; and that now he was overcome, not cowardly, but valiantly, a Roman by another Roman. As Ansanins gavethe laft gasp, Proculeius came that was sent from Cefar. For aster Amonius had thrust his The death of Sword in himlelf, as they carried him into the Tombs and Monuments of Cleopatra, on of his guard (called Dercetaus) took his Sword with the which he had striken himself, and hid it: then he secretly ftole away, and brought Offwiss Cefar the first news of his death, and shewed him his Sword that Officeins Cafar was bloodied. Cafar hearing this news, straight withdrew himself into a secret place of his Tem, Uncount Caper and there burst out with tears, lamenting his hard and miserable fortune, that had been his friend and lamenteth Astrains death. Brother-in-law, his equall in the Empire, and companion with him in fundry great Exploits and Battles. Then he called for all his friends, and shewed them the Letters Antonium had written to him, and his Answers also sent him again, during their quarrell and strife: and how fiercely and proudly the other answered him, to all just and reasonable matters he wrote unto him. After this, he sent

Procultius fent Proculeius, and commanded him to do what he could possible to get Cleopatra alive, tearing left otherby Odlawia wife all the Treafure would be loft : and furthermore, he thought that if he could take Cleopatra, Whe an the Treather would be followed by the World marvelloully beautifie and fet out his Triumph. But Cleo-Cleophra slive pairs would never put her felf into Proculeius hands, although they spake together. For Proculeius came to the Gates that were thick and ftrong, and furely barred, but yet there were some cranies, through the which her voice might be heard, and so they without understood, that Cleparra demanded the Kingdom of ÆGYPT for her Sons: and that Proculeius answered her: That she should be of good chear, and not be afraid to refer all unto Cefar. After he had viewed the place very well, he came and reported her answer unto Cefar : who immediately fent Gallus to speak once again with her, and bad him purpofely hold her in talk, whilft Proculeius did fet up a Ladder against the high window by the which Antonius was trifed up, and came down into the Monumen with two of his men hard by the gate, where Cleoparra ftood to hear what Gallas faid unto her. One of her women which was shut up in her Monuments with her, saw Proculeius by chance as he came down, and shrieked out : O poor Cleopatra, thou art taken. Then when she saw Proculeius behind Glessatzansken her, as she came from the gate, she thought to have stabbed her felf with a short dagger she wore of purpose by her fide. But Proculeius came suddenly upon her, and taking her by both the hands, said unto her: Cleopatra, first, thou shalt do thy self great wrong; and secondly, unto Cefar, to deprive him of the occasion and opportunity, openly to shew his bounty and mercy, and to give his Enemies caule to accuse the most courteous and noble Prince that ever was, and to appeach him, as though he were a cruel and mercileis man, that were not to be trufted. So even as he spake the word, he took her dagger from her, and shook her cloaths for fear of any poyfon hidden about her. Afterwards, Cafar fent one of his infranchifed men called Epaphroditus, whom he ftraightly charged to look well unto her, and to beware in any cale that the made not her felf away : and for the reft, to use her with Cefor took the all the courtefie possible. And for himself, he in the mean time entred the City of ALEXANDRIA, City of Alex and (as he went) talked with the Philosopher Arrins, and held him by the hand, to the end that his Countreymen should reverence him the more, because they saw Casar so highly efteen and honour characteristics. Then he went into the Shew-place of Exercises, and so up to his Chair of State which was preriss the Philo- pared for him of a great height; and there according to his commandment, all the People of ALEX-ANDRIA were affembled, who quaking for fear, fell down on their knees before him, and craved mercy. Cefar bad them all fland up, and told them openly that he forgave the People, and pardoned the felonies, and offences they had committed against him in this War. First, for the Founderstake of the fame City, which was Alexander the Great: fecondly, for the beauty of the City, which he much efteemed and wondred at: thirdly, for the love he bare unto his very friend Arriss. Thus did Philoftramathe Cafar honour Arrins, who craved pardon for himself and many others, and specially for Philoftraented O. 111, the eloquentest man of all the Sophisters and Orazors of his time, for prefent and sudden speech a howbeit, he falfly named himfelf an Academick Philosopher. Therefore Cefar that hated his nature time, for pre- and conditions, would not hear his fuit. Thereupon he let his gray beard grow long, and followed fent fpeech upfaid unto him:

May by a wise man have the better speed.

Cafar understancing this, not for the defire he had to deliver Philostratus of his fear, but to rid Ar-Anylus. An. riss of malice and envythat might have fallen our against him, he pardoned him. Now touching Antonius Sons, Amyllus, his eldest Son by Fulvia was slain, because his Schoolmaster Theodorus did Son by Falvia, betray him unto the Souldiers, who strake off his head. And the Villain took a precious Stone of great value from his neck, the which he did fow in his girdle, and afterwards denied that he had it : but it was found about him, and fo Cafar truffed him up for it. For Clopatra's Children, they were very honourably kept, with their Governours and Train that waited on them. Bux for Cafarian, who was faid to be Jalim Cofor's Son, his Mother Cleoperra had fent himunto the INDIANS through & THI-OPIA, with a great fum of Money. But one of his Governours also called Rhodan, even such another as Theodorus, periwaded him to return into his Countrey, and told him that Cafar fent for him to give him his Mothers Kingdom. So, as Cefar was determining with himself what he should do, Arrius

Arrius step by step in a long morning gown, still buzzing in his ears this Greek Verse:

A wife man, if that he be wife indeed

"death, I fear me they will make us change our Countreys. If therefore the gods where thou er art now have any power and authority, fith our godshere have forfaken us, fuffer not thy true friend "and lover to be carried away alive, that in me they triumph of thee : but receive me with thee, " and let me be buried in one self-Tomb. For though my griefs and mileries be infinite, yet none hath grieved memore, nor that I could lefs bear withall, then this finall time that I have been driven to live alone without thee. Then having ended these dolefull plaints, and crowned the Tomb with Garlands and fundry Nolegayes, and marvellous lovingly embraced the fame, the commanded they

was sumpruously served. Now whilst she was at dinner, there came a Countreyman and brought her was rumpruounty recrea. Now wante in was a same a coomic and bad in his Basket. The Souldiers that warded at the gates, asked him straight what he had in his Basket, Heoa basket. The Sounders mat warded at the gates, asked ministrateges what it must not no basket. He opened his basket, and took out the leaves that covered the figs, and flowed them that they were figs be brought. They all of them marvelled to fee fo goodly figs. The Countreyman laughted to hear them, and bad them take some if they would. They believed he told them truly, and so bad him carry them, and bad them take some if they would. them in. After Chopatra had dired, the fent a certain Table written and fealed into Cafar, and commanded them all to go out of the Tombs where the was, but the two women; then the flut the doors manurer them an to go one and this Table, and began to read her lamentation and petition, requelting to her. Cafar when he received this Table, and began to read her lamentation and petition, requelting to ner. (a ser would let ber be buried with Antonius, found straight what she meant, and thought to have gone thither himself: howbair, he sent one before in all haste that might be, to see what it was. Her death was very sudden: for those whom Cafar fent unto her, ran thinker in all haste possible, and deam was very manufactured in the gate, miftrufting nothing, nor understanding of her death. But when they had opened the doors, they found Cleopatra flark dead, laid upon a bed of Gold, attired and

Howbeit few can tell the troth. For angreu winian, maps the had hidden poyfon in a hollow razor which the carried in the hair of her head; and yet was there no mark feen on her body, or any fign diferented that she was poisoned, neither also did they find this Serpent in her Tomb: but it was reported onely, that there were feet certain field they find this Serpent in her Tomb: but it was reported onely, that there were feet certain field they find this Serpent in her Tomb fide towards the Sea, and specially by the door fide. Some fay also, that they found two little pretty bitings in her arm, feant to be differented: the which it The Images of feemeth Cefar himself gave credit unto, because in his Triumph he carried Cleopatra's Image, with an Citespan, car- Afpick biting of her arm. And thus goeth the report of her death. Cleopatra died being eight and thirty years old, after the hid reigned two and twenty years, and governed about fourteen of them with Antonius. And for Antonins, forne fay that he lived three and fifty years: and others fay, fix and fifty. All his Statues, Images, and Mettals, were plucked down and overthrown, faving those of Cleoparra, which frood fill in their places, by means of Archibins one of her friends, who gave Cafar a thouland Talents that they should not be handled as those of Antonius were. Antonius lest seven children by three wives, of the which, Cafar did put Anyllus (the eldeft Sonhe had by Fulvia) to death. Off avia his wife took all the reft, and brought themp with hers; and married Cleopatra, Antonius Daughter, unto King ja-ba, a marvellous courteous and goodly Prince. And Antonius (the Son of Fulora) came to be fo great, that next unto Agrippa, who was in greatest estimation about Cefar; and next unto the children of Livia, which were the second in estimation : he had the third place. Furthermore, Oltavia having had two Daughters by her first husband Marcellus, and a Son also called Marcellus, Cefar married his Daughter unto that Marcellus, and fo did adopt him for his Son. And Offavia also married one of her Daughters unto Agrippa. But when Marcellus was dead, after he had been married awhite. Oftavia perceiving that her Brother Cafar was very buffe to choose some one among his friends, whom he trufted beft, to make his Son-in-law, the perfwaded him, that Agrippa thould marry his Daughter (Marcellus widow) and leave her own Daughter, Cofar first was contented withall and then Agrippa and so the afterwards took away her Daughter and married her unto Antonius; and Agrippa married Julia, Cefar's Daughter. Now there remained two Daughters more of Offavia and Antonius: Domitius Anobarbus married the one; and the other, which was Antonia, fo fair and vertuous a young Lady, was married unto Drufus the Son of Livia, and Son-in-law of Cefar. Of this marriage came Germanicus and Clodius: of the which, Clodius afterwards came to be Emperor. And of the Sons of Germanicus, the one whose name was Cains, came also to be Emperor: who after he had licentioully reigned a time, was flain, with his Wife and Daughter. Agrippina also (having a Son by her first Husband Anobarbus, called Lucius Domitius) was afterwards married unto Clodius, who adopted her Son, and called him Nero Germanicus. This Nero was Emperor in our time, who flew his own Mother, and had almost destroyed the Empire of ROME, through his madness and wicked life, being the fifth Emperor of ROME after Antonius.

w, fithence it falleth out, that Demetrius and Antonius were one of them much like to the other, having fortune alike divers and variable unto them, let us therefore come to confider their Power and Authority, and how they came to be fo great. First of all, it is certain that Demetrius Power and Greatness fell unto him by inheritance from his Father Antigonus : who became the greatest The Power of and mightieft Prince of all the Successors of Alexander, and had won the most Antonius and Antonius. part of Asia, before Demetrin came of full age. Antonius in contrary manner, born of an honest man, who otherwise was no man of War, and had not left him any means to arise to fuch greatness, durit take upon him to contend for the Empire with Ca-fer, that had no right unto it by inheritance, but yet made himself Successor of the Power, the which the other by great pain and travel had obtained, and by his own industry became so great, without the help of any other, that the Empire of the whole World being divided into two parts, he had the one half, and took that of the greatest countenance and power. Antonius being ablent, oftentimes overtame the PARTHIANS in Battle by his Lieutenants, and chaled away the barbarous People dwelling bout Mount Caucasus, unto the Sea Hyrcanium, insomuch as the thing they most reprove him for, did anost witness his greatness. For Demetrius Father made him gladly marry Phila, Antipater's Daughter, although the was too old for him : because the was of a nobler House then himself. Antonius on the other fide was blamed for marrying of Cleopaira, a Queen that for her Power and Nobility of Blood, exceeded all other Kings in her time, but Arfaces: and moreover, made himself so great, that others thought him worthy of greater things, then he himself required. Now for the desire that mo- Demetries and ved the one and the other to conquer Realms, the defire of Demetrius was unblameable and just, defire-Antonius amwater one and the other to complete recamp, the other or so and defired to be governed by Kings, birio ing to reign over People which had been governed at all times, and defired to be governed by Kings, vern. But Antonius desire was altogether wicked and tyrannical, who fought to keep the People of ROME in bondage and subjection, but lately before rid of Cofar's reign and government. For the greatest and most famous Exploit Antonius ever did in Wars (to wit the War in the which he overthrew Coffine and Brutus) was begun to no other end, but to deprive his Countreymen of their Liberty and Freedom, Demetriss in contrary manner, before Fortune had overthrown him, never left to fet GREECE at liberty, and to drive the Garifons away, which kept the Cities in bondage, and not like Antonius that boafted he had flain them that had fet ROME at liberty. The chiefest thing they commended in Antonius was his liberality and bounty, in the which Demerium excelled him fo far, that he gave more to The liberality his Enemies, then Antonius did to his friends: although he was marvelloufly well thought of, for the and bounty honourable and sumptuous Funeral hagave unto Brutus body. Howbeit Demetrius caused all his E- Demetrius and nemies to be buried that were slain in Battle, and returned unto Ptolomy the Prisoners he had taken, Antonius.

with great Gifts and Presents he gave them. They were both in their prosperity, very riotoully and Demitrius and licentiously given : but yet no man can ever fay, that Demetrius did at any time ever let slip any oppor- Ansonius tiots, tunity or occasion to follow great matters, but onely gave himself indeed to pleasure, when he had nothing elfe to do. And further, to fay truly, he took pleasure of Lamia, as a man would have a delight eo hear one tell tales, when he had nothing effe to do, or is defirous to fleep: but indeed when he was to make any preparation for War, he had not then Ivy at his Darts end, nor had his Helmet perfumed, nor came out of the Ladies Closets picked and princt to go to Battle : buthe let all dancing and sporting alone, and became as the Poet Euripides faith :

The Souldier of Mars, cruel and bloody.

And therefore Demetrius Marriages never hurt him, for any wrong he had Orthmanics of the Antonius contrarily, was undone by his Wives. Of all the lafetitious parts Amonius played, none were so abominable, as this onely fact of Demetrius. For the Historiografered in Athens amounts prayed, note would not furfier dogs to come into the Caffle of ATRENS, because of all Beasts Castle, because phers write, that they would not furfier dogs to come into the Castle of ATRENS, because of all Beasts he is too buffe with butchery: and Demetring, in Minerva's Temple it felf lay with Curtizans, and ne is too dime with one litery and Democrams, in Cartery was a comple to ten lay with curticans, and there defiled many Citizens Wives. And besides all this, the horrible vice of cruelty, which a man would think were least mingled with these wanton delights, is joyned with Demetrius concupiscence; wound intered (or more properly, compelled) the goodlieft young Boy of ATHENS, to die amoft piwith numerous the himself from violence, being taken. And to conclude, Antonius by his incontituited death, to save himself from violence, being taken. nency, did no hurt but to himfelf, and Demetrius did hurt unto all others. Demetrius never hurt a nency, and not man be a sufficient of the sufficient of the friends; but Antonius suffered his Uncle by his Mothers side to be slain, that he might have his will of Cierro to kill him: a thing to damnable, wicked, and cruel of it felf, that he hardly deferuis will of there to an unit will be had killed Gieero, to have faved his Uncles life. Now where they vento nave occupationing, anough in a making Artabazus priloner, and the other killing Alexander.

Anonius out of doubt had best cause, and justest colour: for Artabazus had betrayed him, and forfakenhim in Media. But Demetrius (as divers do report) devised a falle matter to accuse Alexander, to cloak the murder he had committed: and fome think that he did accuse him, to whom he himself Demetriar and had done injury unto: and was not revenged of him, that would do him injury. Furthermore, Demetrini himself did noble feats of War, as we have recited of him before: and contrarily, Amonius when he was not there in person, wan many samous and great Victories by his Lieutenants: and were both overthrown being perfonally in Battle, but yet not both after one fort. For the one was forfaken of his men, being MACEDONIANS, and the other contrarily for fook his that were ROMANS: for he fled, men, being man and any in the man and left them that ventured their lives for his honour. So that the fault the one did, was, that he made them his Enemies that fought for him: and the fault in the other, that he fo beaftly left them that lord him beft, and were most faithfull to him. And for their deaths, a man cannot praife the one or theomin Deits, and were more and the more reproachfull : for he suffered himself to be taken Prisoner, ther, but yet Demetrius death was the more reproachfull : and when he was fent away to be kept in a strange place, he had the heart to live yet three years longer, to ferve his mouth and belly, as brute Beafts do. Antonius on the other fide, flew himfelf (to confes a troth) cowardly, and milerably, to his great pain and grief: and yet was it before his body came into his Enemies hands.

THE LIFE OF ARTAXERXES.

Anno Mundi.

Ant. Christ.

Reaxerxes, the first of this Name of all the Kings of Persia, a Noble and courteous Prince as any of all his House, was firnamed Long-hand. because his right hand was longer then his left : and he was the Son of King Xerxes. But the fecond, whose Life we prefently intend to Write, was firnamed Mnemon, as much to fay, Great memory : and he was The Parentage the Son of the Daughter of the first Artaxerxes. For King Darius, and of Artaxerxes his Wife Pary fatis, had four Sons, of the which, the eldeft was this Ar- Mnemon. taxerxes, the fecond Cyrus, and two other younger, Oftanes and Oxathres. Cyrus from the beginning bare the Name of the former Ancient Cyrus , which in the PERSIAN Tongue fignifieth the Sun. But Arta-xerxes was called before Arlicas, although Dinon writeth, that he was called Oarles. Howbeit it is unlikely, that Cressas (although his Books otherwise be full of Fables, and as untrue as they are fond) should forget the Name of the Prince with whom he dwelt , whom he served , and continually followed, both him, his Wife and Children. Grus from his cradle was of a hot ftirring mind, and Artaxerxes in contrary manner, more mild and gentle in all his actions and doings. He was of natures be married to a very fair Lady, by his Father and Mothers commandment; and afterwards kept her twist Cyrus and against their wills, being forbidden by them. For King Darim his Father, having put his Sons Wives ATLANETES. Brother to death, he would also have put her to death: but her Husband with tears made such humble fuit to his Mother for her, that with much ado, he did not onely get pardon for her life, but grant also that the should not be put from him. This notwithstanding, his Mother always loved Cyrus better then him, and prayed that he might be King after his Fathers death. Wherefore Cyrus being in his Provinces of Asia by the Sea fide, when he was fent for to come to the Court, at what time his Father lay fick of the Disease he died : he went thither in good hope his Mother had prevailed with his Father, that in his Will he would make him his Heir of the Realm of PERSIA. For his Mother Paryfat is alledged a matter very probable, and the which in old time did help King Xerwes in the like cafe, through Demaratus counsell. She said that Arficas was born before her Husband Darius was King, and Cyrm after he was crowned King. All this could not prevail : for her eldest Son Arficas , fitnamed Artaxerxes, was affigned King of PERSIA, and Cyrus Governour of LyDIA, and the Kings Arlicas firms-Lieutenant-Generall of all the low-Countries of As I A toward the Sea fide, Shortly after King Darius med Artaxerdeath, the new King Artaxerxes went unto Pajargades, there to be confecrated and anointed King by tobe King of the Priests of the Countrey of PERSIA. The place of this Pafargades, is a Temple dedicated unto Perfia. Minerva the goddels of Battels, as I take it, where the new King must be consecrated; and when he cometh into the Temple, he putteth off his Gown, and putteth on that which the old Ancient Cyrm wore before he was King. Furthermore, he must eat of a certain Tart or Fricacy made of of confectuing Figs with Turpentine : and then he must drink a Drink made with Vineger and Milk. There are allo certain other fecret Ceremonies which they must keep, and none do know, but the very Priess themselves. Now Artagerzes being ready to enter into all these Ceremonies, Tifaphernes came unto him, and brought him one of the Priefts that had been Cyrus School-mafter in his youth, and had taught him Magick; who by reason should have been more offended then any man else, for that he was not appointed King. And this was the cause why they beleered him the better , when he Cyrur accused accused Cyrus; for he said: That Cyrus had conspired treason against the King his Brothersown unto his Broperfon, and that he meant traiteroully to kill him in the Temple, when he should put off his ther AtuserGown. Some do report, that Cyrus was apprehended upon this simple accusation by word of mouth. Others write also, that Cyrus came into the Temple, and hiding himself, he was taken with the manner, and bewrayed by the Prieft. So, as he was going to fuffer death, his Mother took Cyrus in her armes, and wound the hair of her head about his neck, and tied him straightly to her; and withall she wept to bitterly, and made such pitifull moan unto the King her Son, that through her intercession; the King granted him his life, and sent him again into his Countrey and Government. But this satisfied not Cyrus, neither did he so much remember the King his Brothers favour unto him, in granting this his life, as he did the despite he had offered him, to be made prifoner. Infomuch that for this grudge and evill will, he ever after had a greater defire then before to be King. Some Writers alledge, that he entred into actuall rebellion against his Brother by force of arms , because he had not sufficient revenue to defray the ordinary expence of his House: howbeit it is a meer folly to fay fo. For, though he had no other help but his Mother, he might have had of her what he would have taken and defired. Again, to shew that of himfelf he had ability enough, we need but alledge the Souldiers and ftrangers he gave pay unto in divers places, (as Xrnophon writeth.) For he brought them not altogether into one Army, because he desired to keep his enterprife as fecret as he could: but he had friends and Servants that leavied them in divers places, and under divers colours. And furthermore, he had his Mother alway about the King, that cleared all fuspicions conceived against him. He himself also on the other fide, whilest he made these preparations, wrote very humbly unto his Brother, fometime asking fomewhat of him, and another time acculing Tisaphernes: all to blind the King, to make him think that he bent all his malice and fpire against him: besides that, the king of his own nature was somewhat dull and slow, which the common Peoplethought to proceed of his courtefie and good nature. At his first coming to the Crown, he followed the first Artaxerxes goodness and courtesse, by whom he had his Name, For he gave more easie audience unto Suiters: he did also more honourably reward and recompence those that had deferved well: and he used such moderation in punishing of Offenders, that it appeared he did it not of any malicious mind and defire of revenge, nor yet of will to hurt any man. When he had any thing given him, he took it asthankfully, as they offered it him, and did as willingly and frankly also give again. For, how little a thing soever was offered him, he took it well. And it is reported, that one Romifes on a time presenting him a marvellous faire Pomegranate: By the Sun faid he) this man in a short time, of a little Town would make a great City, if he were made Governour of it. Another time there was a poor Labourer feeing every man give the King a prefent, fome one thing, fome another, as he passed by them: he having nothing at hand to give him, ran to the Rivers side, and took both his hands full of water, and came and offered it him. King Anaxerxes was fo glad of it, that he fent him in a Cup of Massie Gold, a thousand Dareckes, which were pieces of Gold so named, because the Image of Darius was stamped upon them. And unto one Euclidu a Lacedemonian, that prefumed to give him bold words, it pleafed him to answer by one of his Captains: Thou maift say what thou lift; and I as King, may say and do what I lift. Another time as he was an hunting, Tiribazin flewed the King his Gown that was all to tattered : Well, faid the King, and what wouldest thou have me to do? Tiribazin answered him, I pray your Grace take another, and give me that you have on. The King did fo, and told him: Tiribazus, I give the my Gown, but I command thee not to wear it. Tiribazus took it, and cared not for the Kings commandment that he should not wear it; not that he was any evill disposed man, but because he was a fond lightheaded fellow that cared for nothing: thereupon he straight put the Kings Gown on his back, and not contented therewith, he did befides fet on many Jewels of Gold which Kings onely are wont to wear, and Womens Trinkets and Ornaments. Therewithall every man in the Court murmured at him , because it was a presumption, directly against the Laws and Ordinances of PERSIA. Howbeit the King but laughed at it , and told him : I give thee leave Tiribazus to wear those Womens gawds as a Woman, and the Kings Robe as a soole. Furthermore, where the manner was in PERSIA, that no Person sate at the Kings Board, but his Mother and Wife, of the which, his Mother fare uppermoft, and his Wife lowermoft : Areaxerxes made his two Brethren Offianes and Oxathres fit at his own Board : but yet he pleafed the PERSIANS best of all because he was content his Wife Statyra (hould fit openly in her Chariot, and that she might be seen and reverenced by the other Ladies of the Countrey. And this made him fingularly beloved of the People. Now, fuch as defired innovation and change, and that could not away with quiet life, gave out that the Realm of PERSIA required such a Prince as Cyrus, that was liberall of nature, given to arms, and greatly rewarded his Servants; and that the greatness of the Empire of Persia stood in need of a King whole mind was bent to high attempts and noble enterprises. So Cyrus thereupon began to make War upon his Brother, not onely trufting unto them that were of the low Countries about him, but hoping of those also in the high Provinces near unto the King. Furthermore he wrote Cyrut maketh also unto the LACEDEMONIANS, to pray them to fend him men of War, promising to give War sgainst also unto the LACEDAMONIANS, to play them to tells mind of the profiling to give his Brother the Footmen they sent, Horses; and to Attacerses. those that had Villages, to give them Cities: besides all this, that for the ordinary wages of them Crius wonderthat should serve him in this War, he would not pay them by account, but by full measure. And full promites boafting largely of himfelf, he faid he had a greater mind then his Brother; that he could better away with hardness then he, that he understood Magick better then he; and that he could drink more Wine then he, and carry it better: and that the King his Brother in contrary manner was fo womanish and fearfull, that when he went a hunting, he durst scarce get up upon his Horse back: and when he went to the Wars, he would hardly take his Chariot. When the LACEDEMONI-ANS had read his Letters, they fent a little scrole unto Clearchus, commanding him to obey Cirus in any thing he would command him. So Cyru did fet forward to make War against his Brother, having leavied a great number of fighting men of barbarous Nations, and of GRECIANS, little less then thirteen thouland men : fometime advertifing one cause, fometime another, why he leavied fuch a multitude of men. But his purpose could not be long diffembled : for Tisaphernes went himfelf unto the Court, to bring news of his attempt. Then all the Court was straight in an uproar withall. Many men also did accuse the Queen-Mother, for the practise of this War, and all her friends and Servants were vehemently suspected to be Conspiratours with Cyrus : but the greatest thing that troubled Pary fatis most, was Queen Statira her Daughter-in-law, who stormed marvelloufly to fee this War begun against King Artaxerxes her Husband, and incessantly cried out on her: O, where is the Faith thou vowedst by Oath? whereto are thy intercessions come, thou madest for the pardon of his life, who now conspireth his Brothers death? By saving of his life, art not thou now the cause of this War and troubles we see at hand? after this reproach and shame received by Statira, Parylatis being a cruell and malicious woman of nature, fo hated her, that from thenceforth the fought all the ways she could to put her to death. And Dinon the Historiographer faith, that during this War, fhe did executeher wicked purpose upon her : but Ctesiphas writeth , that it was after the War. And therefore it is liker that he being daily in the King of Persia's Court, should certainly know the time when she did execute her Treason against her; and also there is no cause why he should rather write in any other time, then in that which the fact was done : although in many other places he commonly useth to fain, and to write devices of his own head. Therefore let us leave the report of this fact to the felf-same time and place as he hath written it. Now when Cyrus drew near unto his Brothers Countrey, he had newes, and a rumour ran through his Camp, that the King was not determined to come and fight with him to foon: and that he meant first to go further into PERSIA, and to tarry there till he had gathered his Army together out of all parts. And for proof hereof, the King having cast a great Trench of ten yards broad, and as many high, the space of four hundred Furlongs in length: he left it without guard, and let Cyrus win it, who came on further without any refistance, even to the very City it felf of BABYLON. Howbeit in the end, Tiribazus (as it is reported) was the first man that durst tell the King, that he should not flie fight in that fort, nor hide himself in the farthest part of PERSIA, leaving his Enemy and Realms of ME-DIA, BABYLON, and Susa: confidering also that he had many more Souldiers in readiness then his Enemy, and an infinite number of Captains more skilfull, and able to give counsell, and to fight, then he was. These words of Tiribaziu made the King alter his mind, and to determine to give Battell as foon as he could. Thereupon he marched forward against his Enemy, with nine hundred Artaxtrats thousand fighting men, excellently well armed, and marching in very good order. That marvellous- Army of nine ly aftonied Cyrus men, and made them afraid at the first when they saw them in so excellent good hundred thouorder before them: for that they were dispersed straggling here and there without any order, and fund fighting men unarmed, trufting too much in themselves in despising of their Enemy : so that Cyrus had his Brother much ado to fet his men in Battell-ray, and yet was it with great noise and tumult. But the GRE- CITHE. CIANS wondered most of all other, when they faw the Kings Army march in lo good order of Battell without any noise: for they thought to have seen a wonderfull great disorder and consusion, in such an infinite multitude of People; and supposed they would have made such a noise, that one of them should not have heard another. Where indeed to the contrary, all was so well martialed specially because he had placed before his Battell the best Carts he had, armed with Sithes, and drawn with the strongest and biggest Horses he had in all his Army : hoping by the sierceness and sury of their carier, to break into the Ranks of the Enemies, before they could come to joyn with theirs, But fith this Battell is described by divers Historiographers, and specially by Xenophon, who hath (as a man would fay) lively fet it out to the eye; and fetteth it forth to the Reader, Xenophon the not as a Battell already fought, but presently a fighting, stirring up their minds, as if themselves missioning were in the action and instant danger (he hath so passingly set it down) it were but a folly there-pher excellentfore of me to take upon me to make any further description of it, saving to touch some specials by describeth points worthy of note, which he peradventure hath left out. As, the place where the Battell was between Arts. fought, is called COUNAXA, five hundred furlongs from BABYLON; and how that before the xerxes and his Battell Clearching gave Cyrus counfell to keep behind the fquadron of the GRECIANS, and not Brother Cyrus. to hazard his person among the first : and that Cyrus answered him , What sayest thou Clearchus? wouldest thou have me that strives to be King, to shew my felf unworthy to be a King? But Cyrus having made this fault, not standing upon his fafety and guard, but overrashly thrusting

himself into great danger, Clearchus self also committed as a great fault (if it were not worse) Sifety in a Ge. when he would not fet his men in order directly against the Battell of the Enemies, where the Kings Person stood, but went and pend them up by the Rivers side, being asraid least they should have been compassed in behind. For if he would have looked to straightly to himself, and have provided every way for his fafety, that no man might come to hurt him, he should have kept himself at home, and not have firred one foot out of the doors. But fith he had come to far, as from the low Countries of Asia, unto the place where the Field was fought, and uncompelled, onely to put Cyrus in his Fathers Seat and Imperiall Crown ; to go chuse a place in the Battell, not where he might do his Lord best service that had hired him, but rather where he might fight more at his eale, and at less danger, it was even as much, as if through cowardliness his wits had been taken from him when he should have fought, or that through treason he had forsaken his Enterprise. For, to prove that the Troops which were about the Kings person, had never been able to have received the charge of the GRECIANS, and that those being overthrown, the King had been flain in the field, or else forced to flie, and that Cyrus had won the Field, and by this Victorian ry had been King, the fuccess of this Battell doth plainly shew it. And therefore Clearchus over-curious respect, deserved more blame for the loss of this Battell , then Cyrus over hardinels. For if King Artaxerxes would have chosen or wished a place where the GRECIANS might have done him less hurt, he could not have devised a fitter place that was so far from him, and from whence the GRECIANS could neither fee nor hear what was done where he was, asit fell out in the fequel. For Cyrus was slain before he could prevail by Clearchus Victory, he was fo far from him: and furthermore, Cyrus therein knew before what was meetest to be done For he commanded Clearchus to place himself with his company in the middeft of the Battell: who answered him , he should take no thought for any thing , for he would see all things well ordered. And when he had faid fo, he marred all afterwards : for where the GRECIANS were, they overthrew the barbarous people that made head against them, and had them in chase while they were weary of following them. Cyrus being mounted upon a hot firring Horse, that had a hard head, and was very fierce and dogged, called Pajacas, as Ctefias writeth, Artagerfes, the Governour Pafacas , Cyrus of the Province of the CADUSANS, spied him a far off, and when he had found him, clapped fpurs to his Horle, and came with full carrier unto him, and cried out: O Traytour, and most Arragerfesthe Governour of unfaithfull and desperate man, thou now dishonourest the name of Cyrus (which is the goodliest and most honourable name of all the Persians,) for that thou hast brought so valiant Grethe Province CIANS hither to fo wicked an enterprise, to spoil the PERSIANS goods, in hope to destroy giveth charge thy foveraign Lord and onely Brother, who hath an infinite number of flaves and Servants far upon Cyrus. honester men then thou wilt be while thou livest; and that thou shalt presently know by proof, for thou shalt die before thou see the King thy Brothers face : and therewithall he threw his Dart at him with all the force he had. But Cyrus Armour was fo good, that it pierced him not : yet the blow came with fuch good will, that it made him stagger on his Horse back. When Artagerse had given him that blow , he presently turned his Horse. But Cyrus therewithall threw a Dart at him so happily, that he flew him right in the place above the bone that joyneth the two shoulders together : so that the head of his Dart, ran quite through his neck. Now, that Cyrus slew Ariagersis with his own hands in the Field, all the Historiographers do agree upon it: but for the death of Cyrus, because Xenophon toucheth it but a little by the way, for that he was not present in the very place where he Ártagerfes, was flain, it shall not be hurtfull particularly to set down the manner thereof, both according to the report of Dinon, and also of Cresias. First, Dinon writeth, that after Cyrus had flain Arragofes, he went with great fury, and flew in amongst the Troop of them which were nearest unto the Cocks, because Crefias , to couch in few words that which Dinon reporteth at large, faith : that Cyrus after he had

Kings Perfon, and that he came fo near the King that he flew his Horfe stark dead under him, and the King fell to the ground withall. But Tribazus that was hard by him, ftraight mounted the King again upon another Horfe, and faid unto him : Your Grace will remember this Battell another day, for it is not to be forgotten. And Cyrus clapping spurs again to his Horse, threw another Dart at Artaxorxes, and hit him. But at the third charge, the King told them that were about him, he could not abide this, and that he had rather die then fuffer it : fo therewithall he spurring his Horse to charge Cyrus (who came fiercely and desperately, having an infinite number of blows with Darts thrown at him on every fide) threw his Dart at him alfo. So did all those that were about his Person: and so was Cyrus flain in this Conflict. Some fay, that he was flain with the wound his Brother the King gave him. Others fay, that it was a man at arms of the Countrey of CARIA, unto whom the King for reward of his good service, gave the honour in all Battels to carry before the first Rank, a Cock of Gold on the top of a Spear: for the PERSIANS do call the CARIANS Cocks, because in the Wars they use to wear crests in the top of their Head-pieces. And this is Dinons report. But they west flain Artagerfes, galloped on the spur against the King himself, and the King against him, and credit on their not a word between them both. Arieus one of Cyrus statterers, threw the first Dart at the King, Head opicer. Crefes report but killed him not: and the King with all his force again threw his Dart, thinking to have hit Cyof Grus death. rus, but he miffed bim, and flew Tifaphernes, one of the valiantest and stoutest men Cyrus had about Artisteres: him, who fell down dead. Then Cyrus hit Artaxerxes fo fore a blow on his Breaft, that he pierbut by Crus. ced his Armour, and entred into his flesh two fingers deep. The King with this blow fell down to the ground : therewithall the most part of his men about him were to afraid , that they forfook him and fled. Howbeit he got up again , with the help of others that were about him, amongst whom Cressas said he was one, and so recovered a little Hill afat off to take a little . breath. In the mean time; Cyrus Horse that was hot in the mouth, and hard headed, as we have told you, carried his Master in spite of his heart far from his men, among his Enemies, and no man knew hing, because it was night, and his men were very busie in seeking for him. But Crrus hoping he had won the Victory, being of a hot stirring nature, and valiant, he went up and down in the thickest of his Enemies , crying out in the PERSIAN Tongue: Save your selves poor men. fave your felves. When they heard him fay so, some made a lane for him to pass by them, and did him reverence : but by evill fortune his Tiara (which is the high Royall Hat after the PERSIAN manner) tell off from his head. Then a young Persian called Mithridates, palling by him, hit him ablow with his Dart upon one of his Temples, hard by his Eye, not knowing what he was. His wound fraight fell on a marvellous bleeding. Whereupon, Cyrus fraggering at it, fell on the ground Cyrus him. in a fwound, and his Horle ran away from him: but the Capariton he had upon him fell to the ground all bloudied, and his Page that had hurt him, took it up. Shortly after Cyrus being come to himself again, some of his Eunuchs (which were men gelt , and Grooms of his Chamber) that were about him, did lift him up, thinking to fer him upon another Horse, and to get him out of the preass: but he was not able to fit on his Horse. Thereupon he proved if he could better go on foot, and the Eunuchs held him up by the arms, and led him amazed as he was, not able to frand on his feet; although he thought he had won the Battell, because he heard his Enemies flying about him cry, The gods fave King Cyrus, and they prayed him to pardon them, and to receive them to mercy. But in the mean time, there came certain poor men of the City of Caunus, who followed the Kings Camp, getting their living as drudges and flaves, to do most vile Service. They joyned with the Troop where Cyrus was, supposing they had been the Kings men: but when they perceived in the end by the red Coats they wore upon their Armours, that they were Enemies, for that the Kings men wore white Coats, there was one among the rest that valiantly strake at Cy- Cyrus miserable rus behind with his Partizan, not knowing indeed that it was Cyrus. The blow lighted full on the ham deftiny, of his Leg, and cut his finews fo, that Cyrm fell withall; and falling, by misfortune fell upon a great stone with his brow, where he had been hurt before, that he died forthwith. Thus doth Ctefirst report it, where me thinketh he cutteth his Throat with a dull edged Knife, he hath fuch ado to bring Cyrus to his end. Now after Cyrus was dead, Arta (yras, one of King Artaxerxes Eunuchs whom they called the Kings Eye in the Court) paffing by on horsback, knew Cyrus Eunuchs that mourined very pitifully, lamenting the death of their Mafter. So he asked the Eunuch whom Cyrus loved belt: Who is that that is dead, O Parifese, that thou weepelt to bitterly? Parifese answered him again, Seeft thou not Artalyras that it is Cyrus but newly dead ? Artalyras wondered much when he faw him. So he comforted the Eunuch, and willed him in no case to go from the body, and in the mean time he galloped apace to the King, who thought he had loft all, and was very ill besides, both for the great thirst he suffered, as also for the wound he had on his breast. Now when the Eunuch came unto the King, and told him with a smiling countenance the news, how behad feen Cyrus dead : the King was fo joyfull at the news, that he was desirous himself forthwith to go unto the place where he lay to fee him, and commanded Arta/yras to bring him thither. But after he had considered better of it, he was counselled not to go thither himself for sear of the GRECIANS, who they faid won all, and were yet chafing and killing them in the Field, that fled : but rather that he thould fend a good company of men thither , to bring him just report, whether the news were true of his death or not. Upon this advice he stayed, and sent thither thirty men, every man with Torches in their hands. In the mean time, one of the Eunuchs called Statibarzanes, ran up and down to fee if he could get any water for the King, that was almost dead for thirst: for there was no water near unto him where he was, and besides, his Camp was far from him. His Eunuch having run up and down a great way to feek it, met by chance with these poor Slaves and Porters the CAUNIANS, among the which one of them carried in an old ragged Goats Skin, about eight glafs-fuls of naughty ftinking water. So he prefently carried King Attathe fame to the King, who drank it up every whit. When the King had drunk it, the Eunuch xerxer beings asked him, if that naughty water did him no hurt. The King fware by the gods unto him, that thirld drake he never drank better Wine, nor fweeter water then that was, nor that pleafed him better then that flinking puldid; and therefore, faid be, I befeech the gods, if it be not my hap to find him that gave thee faid he never this water to reward him, yet that it will please them to send him good fortune. As the King taffed sweeter. was talking thus with the Eunuch , the thirty men with their Torches returned unto him , who altogether with joyfull countenance, confirmed the good news he looked not for : and then there were come together again a greater number of Souldiers about him, and still came more one after another, that he began again to be couragious. Then he came down into the Plain, with a world of Lights and Torches about him, and went straight to the place where his Brother Cyrus Body lay. There following the ancient manner of the PERSIANS against Traytours to the The manner King, he caused his head and right hand to be stricken off, and then made his head be brought in War, unto him, the which he took by the hairs of his head (for Gyrus wore them long and thick) against a and did himself shew it unto them that fled still and were afraid, to encourage them again. They Traytour to wondering to fee it, did him humble reverence, and so gathered by companies about the King, the Kingthat in a small time there were gathered together about him , threescore and ten thousand fig ting men, with the which he took his way again towards the Camp. Indeed Cressas faith, that he had but four hundred thouland fighting men in all : but Dinon and Xenophon fay more. And for the number of them that were flain , Ctefas faith , that word was brought to the King , that there were not above nine thousand flain , how beit that to fight they feemed to be no leis then twenty thouland: but for that point, be might be talked withall, in either of both. And furthermore, where he faith that the King did fend him with Phayllus ZACYNTHIAN unto the GRECI-ANS, and others with him, that is a flat lie. For Xenophos knew right well, that this Crefia waited upon the King, because he speaketh of him in divers places of his History: if he had been appointed by the King to carry report unto the GRECIANS of fo weighty a matter, it is like enough Xent. phon would not have concealed it, when he nameth Phaylum ZACYNTHIAN. But Crefiar (25 itappeareth by his Writings) was a very ambitious man, and partiall unto the LACEDEMONIANS, but specially unto Clearchus: and is glad when he can get any occasion to speak of himself for his glory, of LACEDEMON, and of Charebus. Now after this Battell, King Artaxerxes fent goodly rich Gifts unto Artager et Son, whose Father Cyrus had slain with his own hands : and (as it is reporded the good, ted) did also greatly honour Ciessa, and many others : and did not forget also to cause the poor CAUNIAN flave to be fought out, that had given him the water to be carried to him, which faved his life : and when he had found him out, of a poor wretch unknown before, he made him a rich Nobleman. He severely punished those also that had offended the Martiall Law, as amongst others Arbaras, one of the MEDES: who (when the Battell was joyned) fled first to Cyrus fide, and then , when he understood he was slain, he returned again to the Kings side. For, supposing that it was rather timoroufnefs and cowardly nature, then for treason or ill will he bare him, he compelled him to carry a Whore on his back stark naked, all day long about the Market-place. And to another (who befides he had yeelded himfelf to his Enemies, fallly boafting that he had flain two) he made his Tongue to be boared through in three feverall places with a Cordwainers Awl. Now the King being of opinion that it was himself that had stain his Brother Grus with his own hand, and being defirous that every man should so think and say, he sent Presents unto Mithridates, that had hurt him first in the jorehead, and commanded him that carried the Gifts unto him, to tell him from the King: The King doth fend thee thele Prefents , because thou finding first the Capacifon of Cyrus Horse, diddest bring it unto the King. The CARIAN also, that had cut the ham of his Leg wherewith Cyrus fell down, asked his Gift likewife: which the King gave him, and bad the Meffenger tell him The King doth give thee this, because thou wast the second person that brought him the good news: for Artaffras was the first, and thou the second, that brought him news of the death of Cyrm. Now Mithridates, albeit he was not well pleafed in his mind with these words, he went his way, and faid nothing then, nor made any thing ado: but the unfortunate CARIAN fondly fell into a foolish vein , common unto men. For, the suddain joy he felt (as it seemeth) to see such a goodly rich Present before him , as the King sent him , made him so forget himself , that he began to aspire , and to presend greater things then became his Effate and Calling. And therefore he would not take the Kings Gift, as in respect that he had brought him word of Cyrn, death : but began to from , and to rage, calling the gods to witness, that it was he onely, and none other, that flew Cyrus; and that they did him great wrong, to take this honour from him. The King being told of it, took it lo angrily, that he prefently commanded them to ftrike off his head. But Paryfais (the Queen Mother) being prefent when the King gave this commandment, the prayed him not to put him to death in this fort : for the villain (faid the) let me alone, I will chastile him well enough for his presumption and rash speech. The King was contented she should have him. Thereupon she sent the Strgeant to take this curfed CARIAN, and made him be hanged upon a Gibbet ten days together, and at the ten days end caused his eyes to be pulled out of his head : and last of all , poured molten Mettall into his ears, and so killed the Villain with this kind of torment. Mithridates also shortly after, died miserably by a like folly. He was bidden to supper at a Feast, whither came also the King and Queen Mothers Eunuchs: and when they came, Mithridates fate down at the Board in the Kings golden Gown he gave him. When they had fupped, and that they began to drink one to another, one of Parylatic Eunuchs faid unto Mishridates: The King hath indeed given the a goodly rich Gown Mishridates, and goodly Chains and Carcanets of Gold, and fo is the Sword very rich and good he gave thee , fo that when thou haft that by thy fide, there is no man (I warrant thee) but will think thee a happy man. Mithridates then , the Wine furning into his brain , answered straight: What meanest thou by that , Speramines? I deserved better then this when the Battell was fought. Then Sparamixes laughing on him, answered, I do not speak it for any furt or evil will I bare thee , Mithridates : but to fpeak frankly among our felves , because the Gascisns have a common Proverb, that Wine telleth true, I pray thee tell me, what valiant Act was it to take up a Caparison of a Horse that sell on the ground, and to carry it to the King? which the Eunuch spitefully put forth unto him, not that he was ignorant who did it; but to provoke him to speak, and to put him in a rage, knowing that he was a hafty man of nature, and could not keep his tongue. and leaft of all when he had drunk fo well as he had done; and fo it fell out indeed. For Mithrida tes could not bite it in , but replied fireight : You may talk as long as you lift of the Capaciton of a Horse, and such train, but I tell you plainly , that Cress was slain with mine own bands; and with see the permit of hellineftof no mans elfe. For I hit him not in vain as Artegrafes did, but full in the forehead hard by the eye, and firske him through and through his head again, and so overthrew him, of which blow he died. He had no fooner spoken these words , but the rest that were at the Board , cast down their eyes, forefeeing the death of this poor and unfortunate Mithridars. But then the Mafter of the Feaft began to speak, and faid unto him : Friend Mithridates, I pray thee let us drink and bemerry, and reARTAXBRXES verence and thank the good forume of our King; and for the reft, let this talk go, it is too high for us. When the Banuch went from thence, he told Paryland (the Queen Mother) what Mithridates had faid before them all: and fine went and told the King of it. Who was marvellously offended withall to be so belied, and to lose the thing that was most honourable, and best pleased him in his Victory. For it was his mind, that all the World (both GRECIANS and barbarous People.) should certainly believe, that in the Battell betweet him and his Brother he was hurt, but yet that he flow Cyrns with his own hand. So the King commanded that Mitbridges should suffer the pains of The terrible death in Boats, the which is after this manner. They take two Boats made of purpole so even, death of offenthat the one is neither broader nor longer then the other, and then lay the offender in one of them ders, in Boats upon his back, and so cover him with the other, and do sow both Boats together : so that the or Troughs feet, hands, and head do come out at holes made of purpole for him, the reft of his body is all among the hidden within. Now they give him Meat as much as he will eat, and if he will not eat, they Perfune. force him to it, by thrusting Awles in his eyes: then when he hath eaten, they give him Honey to drink mingled with Milk, and they do not onely pour it into his mouth, but also all his face over turning him full into the Sun, fo that his face is all covered with Flies: and furthermore, being driven to do his needs in that Trough, of his excrements there ingender Worms that eat his body to the very Privities. Then , when they fee the man is dead , they take off the uppermoft Boar , and find The milerable all his fielh devoured with Vermine ingendred of him, even to his very entrails. So, when Mithri- death of Midates had miferably languished in this manner, seventeen days together, at length he died in extream thridates. torments. Now Parylatis (the Queen Mother) lacked no more to accomplish her wicked defire. but Melabates, one of the Kings Eunuchs that had cut off Cyrus head and hand : and feeing that be was very wary and circumspect in his behaviour, that she could not take him at any advantage, in the end the deviled a fine way to intrap him. She had a marvellous wit, and among other things craft of Parcould play passingly well at all Games at Dice, and did many times play with the King her Son be-first, and her force the Wars: and after the Wars also, when he had made peace, she did play at Dice with great skill and him as the had done before, infomuch as the knew all his fecret love, and fuffered him to enjoy it, cunning at To be short, she would never be out of his fight but as little as she could, and would let his Wife Dice. Statira have as little time with him as might be, that the might govern and rule him as the would : both because she hated her of all creatures living, and also for that she would bear the greatest sway and credit about him. When she saw the King oneday at leasure, not knowing how to pass the time away, the inticed him to play a thousand Dareckes at Dice, and was contented to lose them willingly, and paid the thouland Dareckes down, feeming notwithstanding to be angry with her loss. So she prayed him alfo to play one of his Eunuchs with her: and the King was well contented with it. But before they would play, they agreed between them that they should both name and except five of the sruftieft and chiefest Eunuchs they had : and then, which of them lost, should presently deliver unto the Winner his choice of all the other Eunuchs he would demand. Thus they fell to play, and the imploying all the cunning the had, and playing as warily as the could possible, besides that the Dice ran on her fide, her luck ferved her fo, that the wan : and then the requireth Mejabates for her Winnings, because none of those the King had excepted. When she had him delivered her, she Perstatic craft gave him to the Hangman, and willed him to flea him alive, and then that they should crucifie him, and cruelty. and nail him to a Crofs, and hang his Skin upon another piece of Timber by him: the which was done accordingly. The King was marvellous angry withall when he knew it and grievoully offen and with his Mother. Howbeit the sported it out, and laughing told him: Indeed it becomes thee well to be angry for losing an old gelded Villain, where I lost a thousand Dareckes quietly, and faid never a word. So there came no other thing of it, faving that the King was a little angry, and repented him that he had played so fondly, and was so finely mocked. But Queen Statira on the other fide (belides that the was against ther in all other things) spared not to tell the Queen Mother plainly, that it was wickedly done of her, to put the Kings good and faithfull Servant fo cruelly to death, for Cyrus fake. But now, after that Tisabiernes (King Artaxernes Lieutenant) had deceived Clear Tisabiernes be-ghus, and other. Captains of Greece: detectably fallifying his word he had given them, and that trayed the he had fent them bound unto the King , Crefias faith , that Clearches prayed him to help him to a Captains of Comb; and that having had one by his means, and so combed his head, it pleased him so well, Greece. that to requite his good will, he gave him his Seal of Arms from his finger wherewith he Sealed his Letters, for a witness of the great friendship that was between them two. He faith also, that in the shope of this Ring there was graven the Dance of the CARYATIDES. And furthermore, that the other Souldiers which were prisoners with Clearehm, did take away the most part of the Victuals that were fent to him, and left him little or nothing; and that he did remedy all this procuring a greaser quantity to be fent unto them, and that they should put Clearches Portion apart, and all the other Souldiers parts by themselves. This he did, as he saith, by Parylatic confent and command-ment, who knowing that amongst other Victuals they daily sent Clearchus a gammon of Bacon, the gold him one day he flould do well to hide a little Knife in this gammon of Bacon, and to fend it him, to the end that the life of fo noble and valiant a man as he was , should not fall to the cruelty of the Clearchus and King. Howbeit, that he was afraid to meddle withall, and durft not do it: and that the King Iware, other Captains and promited his Mother (who was an earnest futter to him for Clearchus) that he would not put him of Greece put to death. This notwithstanding, the King being afterwards procured; and perforated to the control to death by trary, by Queen Stating his Wife, he put them all to death, but Menon. Seatife, and to make her dut of the way. But me thinken this finelleth like a lie; this Parffate should intend fo wicked and dangerous an Act, as to put the Kings lawfull Wife to death, by whom he had Sons that were to inherit the Crown, onely for the love and respect of Charebur; and it is too plain that he coyned that, to honoist and magnifie Clearchut memory the more. But to prove is a man may easify find it by the life site addeth afterward unto it : saying , that after the Captains were flain, all the bodies of the reft were torn in pieces by Dogs and Powls: and also that there catica boilterous wind, and covered all Clearchin body with a great Hill of duft; and that our of this Hill of doft, flortly after there forung up many Palm-Trees, which made a pretty thick Grove, that it shadowed all that place. Infomuch that the King himself did afterwards marvellously repent him for putting him to death, for that he was an honeft man, and beloved of the gods. This was not for Clearchus fake, burfor an old cankered malice Parylata had long born in her heart against Ouen Statista: because the faw well enough, that the credit and authority her felf had with the King, was in respect of a Sons duty and obedience to his Mother; and in contrary manner, Stating, Paryfatis hate tire's credit and authority had a better ground and foundation, because it came of the love and goodwill the King did bear her. And this is the onely cause that made her to practise the death of Queen Daughter in Stativa, having determined that her felf., or Daughter-in-law, must needs die. Now the Queenlaw Statira. Mother had one of the Women of her Chamber called Gigis, that was of great credit about her, and whom the onely trufted. Dison writeth, that this Gigis did help Paryfats to make the poylon: but Cteffas writeth contrarily, and faith, that the onely knew it, but otherwise that it was against Parysatis prapoyfon Queen her will: and that he that made the Poyfon, was one Belitaras, but Disson called him Melanta, her will: and that he that made the Poyfon, was one Belitaras, but Disson called him Melanta, her will: and that he that made the Poyfon, was one Belitaras, but Disson called him Melanta, her will a subject to the poyfon of the po ten all malice between them, and that they began again one of them to keep company with the other, and did eat and drink together: yet one of them miltrufted the other, and took great heed to themselves, both of them eating one self Meat, and in one dish together, and were both served with one felf Officers and men. In PERSIA there is a little Bird, of the which all the Parts are ex-Kynthers a Bird of Persia, cellent good to eat, and are full of fat within; so that it is thought it liveth by Air and Dew, and in the Persian Tongoe they call it Ryntaces, Parplatie, as Ctefias faith, took one of thele Birds , and cut it in the middeft with a little Knife , the which was poyloned onely on one of the fides, that hath no and gave that half which was poyloned unto Statira. Yet Dinon writeth, that it was not Parjfats her felf that gave it her, but her Carver Melantas that carved her Mear, and ftill gave Qeen Statists of that Meat which the fide of his poyloned Knife had touched. So Queen Statists prefently fell fick of the Difease whereof she died, with grievous pange and gripings in her bowels , and found plainly that the was poyfored by Parylatin means : whereupon the told the King as much, who was of the fame opinion, and thought it was his Mother, because he knew her cruel revenging mind, that never pardoned any against whom she conceived any grudge. The King therefore to know the troth, when his Wife Statira was dead, apprehended all his Mothers hould hold Servants and Officers, and did put them to torments, to make them confess the troth, faving Gigir whom the Queen-Mother kept close in her Chamber a long time , and would never suffer the King to have her: who earneftly requested her to deliver her unto him. Notwithstanding, Gigit her left at length prayed the Queen-Mother to give her leave one night to go home to her house. The King understanding it, laid wait for her, and intercepted her by the way: and when she was taken, he condemned her to fuffer the pains of death ordained for Poyfoners, the which in Per-$1 A is executed in this manner. They make them put their head upon a great plain stone, and with another stone they press and strike it to long, till they have dashed the brains of the Maleiachours out of their heads. After this fort was Gigis put to death. Now for Pary atis his Mother, the King did her no other hurt, nor faid any more unto her, but confined her to BABYLON according to her defire , and sware , that whileft the lived , he would never see BABYLON. In this state stood the Affairs of the King. But now, Artaxrace having done the utmost he could to have overcome the Grecians which came to make War with him in the heart of his Realm, and would have been a glad of that, as he was to have overcome Cyrm, and to keep his Crown and Realm: he could never prevail against them. For, though they had lost Cyrm that gave them entertainment, and all their private Captains that led them, they faved themselves notwithstanding, being in the heart of his Realm, and shewed the Persians by experience, that their doings was nothing but Gold and Silver, curiofity, and fair Women, or otherwife, nothing but pomp and va-nity. Hercupon all the Grecians became couragious, and despited the barbarous People; informuch that the LACEDEMONIANS thought it a great shame and dishonour unto them, if they did not deliver the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, from the flavery and bondage of the PERSIANS, and keep them from the open violence and cruelty of the barbarous People. For they traving at other times attempted to do it by their Captain Timbren; and afterwards also by Dereil-

For Conon, after he was overthrown in Battell at a place called the Goats River, damonians keptever after in the Isle of Cyprus, not so much for the safety of his Person, as also for that it from all their was a meet place to ftay in, untill the Wars of GREECE were appealed. He, knowing that the de- Dominion by vice he had in his head, lacked power to put it in execution; and on the contrary fide, that the power Sea. of the King lacked a man of deep judgement to be employed: wrote Letters unto him of his advice what he thought to do, firaightly charging him whom he delivered his Letters unto that if he could possibly, he should cause the same to be delivered unto the King by Xenon the CRETAN, one of the Kings Dancers, or by one Polycritus his Physician, born in the City of MENDE: and in both their absences, then to give it unto Ciestas, to deliver it unto the King. It chanced so, that this Letter came to the hands of Ciefias who (as it is reported) added moreover unto the contents of the Letter, that the King should fend him to Conon, because he was a necessary man to be imployed in his service, but specially by Sea. Cresias saith not so: but writeth that the King of his own voluntary motion gave him this charge. Now, after Arraxerxes had through the leading of Conon and Pharnabazus, won the Battell by Sea near the Isle of GNIDUS, and that thereby he had driven Gnidus Inf. all the LACEDEMONIANS from their jurisdiction by Sea, all GREECE had him in marvellous great estimation: fo that he gave unto the GRECIANS with such conditions as he would, that so famous Peace, called Antalcidas Peace. This Antalcidas was a Citizen of SPARTA, the Son of one Leon, whose favouring King Areaxerxes Affairs, procured by the treaty of this Peace, that the Peace, LACEDEMONIANS left unto Artaxerxes all the Cities of GREECE in Asia and all the Isles contained in the fame, to enjoy quietly, making them pay Tribute at his pleasure. This Peace being concluded with the GRECIANS (if to shamefull a treason, reproach and common infamy to all GREECE may be called Peace, as never War fell out more dishonourable and infamous for the vanquished) King Artaxirxes, that otherwise hated the LACEDEMONIANS to the death, and that efteemed them (as Dinon writeth) the impudentest men living , did notwithstanding love Antalcidas passing well, and entertained him very honourably when he came into Persia unto him. It Antalcidas Lais reported, that the King one day took a Garland of Flowers, and did wet it with the most precious and codemonian fweetest Oyl of Persume that was prepared for the Feast, and sent the same unto Antalcidas: intomuch as every man marvelled to fee the King fet fo much by him. Indeed he was a meet man to follow the vanity and curiofity of the PERSIANS, and had well deferved fuch a Garland to be fent him : who was fo bold to dance a Dance before the PERSIANS , mocking and counterfeiting Le- The Perfians onidas and Callicratidas, two of the valiantest men that ever were in GREECE. Therefore one full of vanity faid at that time in the presence of King Agefilaus: O how unhappy is poor GREECE at this day, and curiofity. when the LACEDEMONIANS come to follow the Persians? But Agefilans prefently answered him again, Not so, faid he: but rather the PERSIANS follow the LACED. EMONIANS. Notwithflanding, this wife answer Agefilaus made, did not take away the shame of the Fact : and shortly after, the LACEDEMONIANS lost the Battell of LEUCTRES, and therewith also the signiority and Principality they had kept of long time over all GREECE, although they had loft their estimation before, for consenting to so shamefull and dishonourable peace. When SPARTA florifhed most, and was chief of all the other Cities of GREECE, fo long did Artaxerxes continue still to make much of Antalcidas, and called him, his friend. But after that the LACEDEMONIANS had loft the Battell of LEUCTRES, having received fo great an overthrow, and wanting Money, they fent Agefilaus into EGYPT, and Antalcidas into PERSIA unto King Artaxerxes, to pray him to aid and help the LACEDEMONIANS. Howbeir, the King made to small account of him, and disdained him so much, denying him his requests, that he returned back to SPARTA, as a man knocked on the head, without any thing done with the King. And there also seeing that his Enemies mocked him; and fearing that the Ephor, would commit him to Prison, he killed himself with The death of famine. About that time also, the THEBANS after they had won the Battell of LEUCTRES, fent columnian. Imenias and Pelopidas into PERSIA, unto King Artaxerxes, where Pelopidas did nothing unworthy of himself. Howbeit, Ismenias being commanded to kneel to the King, he let fall his Ring at his feet, and stooped to take it up, whereby he was thought of some, that he did it to kneel to the Timagotas A-King. Another time Areaxerxes liking a fecret advertisement very well sent him from Timagoras the thenian, be ibed ATHENIAN, he gave him ten thousand Dariackes by his Secretary called Belluris. And because he by King Anahad a fickly body, and was driven to drink Cows Milk to restore him, the King therefore fent four xerxer. Furthermore, he fent him a Bed throughly furnished with all things necessary, and Grooms of the Chamber to make his bed, faying, that the GRECIANS could not tell how to make it : and did also let him have men to carryhim upon their arms to the Sea fide, because he was fick; and whilest he was at the Court, he entertained him very honourably and bountifully. So the ATHENIANS afterwards condemned the Timageras was fame Timageras to die, because he had taken bribes and money of the King of PERSIA. But Artaxerxes in recompence of fo many other things that he had done to despite the GRECIANS with, did one thing that pleafed them marvelloufly, when he did put Tisaphernes to death, who was the dreadfulleft Enemy the GRECIANS had. Parfais the Queen Mother did help to bring this topals, aggravating the accusations brought in against him: for the King kept not his anger long against his Mother, but fell in again with her, and fent for her, knowing that she had an excellent wit and noble King Artaxer- courage to govern a great Kingdom: and befides, that there was nothing now to lett them to come king Artaxer- courage to govern a great Kingdom of icaloufic or malice to any person. So ever the courage to govern a great kingdom of icaloufic or malice to any person. So ever the courage to govern a great kingdom of icaloufic or malice to any person. So ever the courage to govern a great kingdom of icaloufic or malice to any person. after, his Mother Pary (asis endeavoured her felf to feed the King her Sons humour every manner of way, feeming to millike nothing that he did: whereby the grew in fo great credit with him, that he denied her nothing whatfoever the asked him. So the perceived that the King was extreamely in love with one of his own Daughters, that was called Atoffa: howbeit that he diffembled his love the best he could, and kept it secret, chiefly for fear of her, although some write, that indeed hebad already had her Maiden-head. Now Parylatis having found his love, the began to make more of his Daughter then she did before, and talking with her Father, sometime she praised her beauty, another time her grace and good countenance, faying that fix was like a Queen and noble Printes; of that at length by little and little she perswated him to marry her openly, not passing for the Laws and Opinions of the GRECIANS, confidering that God had given him unto the PERSIANS, to stablish Laws unto them , to decide right from wrong , and the good from the bad. Some Historiographers do write, and amongst them Heraclides of Cumes, that Artaxerxes did not onely marry ele eldest of his Daughters, but the second also called Amestrue, of whom we will speak hereaster. Now when he had married the eldeft , Atolja, he loved her so entirely well, that though the fell fick eldelt Daugh of the difeafe commonly called Vitiligo, that ran over all her body, he loved her not the worse for it, tee droft. but prayed continually for her unto the goddefs Juno, honouring no other goddefs but her onely, and fell down on his knees before her Image; and fent by his friends and Lieutenants fo many offerings, that all the way from his Court Gates unto the Temple of Juno (which was fixteen Furlongs off) wasfull of Gold, Silver, Rich Purple, Silks, and Horse that were sent thinher. tenants, who did no good, because they fell at variance the one with the other. But asterwards, xerxes journey Artaxerxes himself went in person to conquer the CADUSIANS with three hundred thousand Pootmen , and ten thouland Horsemen. So he invaded their Countrey, which was a very rude Countrey, alway dark and cloudy: the earth bringeth forth nothing that man foweth, but doth onely feed the inhabitants with Pears, Apples, and fuch like Fruit, and yet themen be very ftrong and valiant notany very bar- withfranding. So when he was entred far into the Countrey before he was aware, he fell into great want of Victuals, and was also in great danger. For his Souldiers found nothing in all the Country that was good to eat; and worst of all, no Victuals could come unto them from any place, because Great famine of the hardness and naughty ways of the Countrey: fo that his Camp lived onely with the Flesh in ATHENEVIEW of their Beafts of Carriage, and yet they fold it dearly; for, an Affes head was fold for threefcore Silver Drachmaes. To conclude, the famine was fo great, that provision failed for the Kingsowa mouth , and there were but few Horfes left , for all the reft were eaten. Then Tiribazum , that had oftentimes been chief about the King, because he was a valiant man, and that through his folly was many times also out of favour, as at that present time, when he had no authority nor estimation, he devifed a Stratageme, whereby he faved the King and all his Camp. In this Countrey of the CADUS IANS, there were two Kings in the Field with their Armies, both of them camped alun-Tiribagus fira- der, one from the other. Tiribazus, after he had spoken with King Artaxerxes, and had told him tageme faved what he meant to do, he went unto one of the Kings, and at the felf fame time also fecretly fent his Artaxersers and Son unto the other King, and told either of them, that the other King had fent Ambassadours unto Areaxerxes to make peace with him, unwitting to his Companion; and therefore he counfelled them, if they were wife, one of them to feek to prevent another with all the possible speed he could; and promifed them both, one after another, to help them the beft he could. Both the one and the other of the Kings gave credit to his words, either of them both miftrufting one another: fo that the one speedily sent his Ambassadours unto King Artaxerxes, with Tiribaxus, and the other also his Ambassadours with his Son. But Tiribazus tarrying long in his journey, King Artaxerxer began somewhat to suspect him: his Enemies also did accuse him in his absence, and the Note, that foft King grew very cholerick, and repented him that he had trufted him fo far, and was willing to hear every man that spake against him. Howbeit, Tiribazm at length returned, and his Son also, Riches, make and either of them brought with them the Ambassadours of the CADUSIANS, and to Peace was taken with them both. Then was Tiribazus aloft again, and in greater credit then ever he was effeciments, but and fo departed with the King. The King then shewed plainly, that cowardlines proceedesh a vile bate not of Pomp and curiosity, as some take it, believing that it doth effectionate mens hearts; but not of Pomp and curiosity, as some take it, believing that it doth effectionate mens hearts; but rather of a vile base mind, that commonly followeth evill, and the worst counsell: for neither the Jewels of Gold, the Kingly Robe, nor other fumptuous Ornaments which the King ever wore about him, worth twelve thousand Talents (asit is reported) did not hinder him at that time to travell, and to take as much pains as any man in all his Army. For he himself marched on foot the foreARTAXERXES.

the Country besides was naked and barren, so that there was not a Tree a great way from thence feeing that, fell every man of them also to hewing: so that in a very short time they had provided themselves well with Wood, and made them great Fires in every place, and so past over the night quietly by the Fires fide. This notwithstanding, he lost a great number of valiant men in this Vov-age, and almost all his Horses. Therefore, thinking his men would mock him because he did fail of his purpose, he began to grow mistrustfull, and to suspect the chiefest Noblemen he had about him, fo that in a rage he put many of them to death, but many more of them remained whom he miffrusted. For there is nothing more cruell, nor a greater bloud-sucker, then a cowardly Tyrant : as in contrary manner, nothing is more courteous, and less suspicious then a valiant and hardy man. And therefore bruit Beafts, that be never made tame nor maftered, are commonly cowardly and timorous: and the other on the contrary, that are Noble and couragious, are bold, and do come straight to know a man, because they have no fear, neither do they flie from their clapping and making much of them as they do. Afterwards, King Artaxerxes being grown very old, heard that there was great stir and contention between his Sons, which of them should be

Heir after his death, and that this contention fell out also among his friends and men of great his Sifter Atoffa, whom he loved and honoured, promifing to marry her, and to make her Queen, if he might come to be King after his Fathers decease. And besides, there went a report abroad that in their Fathers life time he fecretly kept her : howbeit Artaxerxes never understood it.

Now, because he would betimes put his Son Ochus out of all hope to succeed him in his Kingdome, left this expectation might make him go about to practife that which Cyrus did, and that

Gift of him that proclaimeth him Successour. The which the other doth grant him, whatsoever it be that he asked, so it be not impossible. Darius then asked his Father a Concubine cal-and they made it not coy. But A/pasia stood on her feet by the Table, and said never a word :

and norwithstanding that Cyrus called her, she would not come at him. Moreover, when one of the Grooms of his Chamber would have taken her to have brought her to him: The first, faith she, that layeth hands on me shall repent it. Thereupon all those that were present, faid she was a foolish thing, and fimply brought up, and could not tell what was comely for her. Howbeit Cyrus being glad of it, passed it over with laughing, and told him that had brought them unto him : Doest thou not fee, that of all these thou hast brought me, there is not an honest Woman but she? After that, Cirus began to make much of her, and loved her better continually then all the rest, and called her Aspasia the wife. This Aspasia was taken among the spoiles of Cyrus Camp after he was overthrown; and Darius as we have told you, did beg her of his Father, who was very angry with he had also three hundred and threescore patting fair Concubines: and yet when his Son Darius asked Afrasia of him, the King answered, she was a free Woman born, and therefore if she would, he was content he should have her : but if she were unwilling to go to him , then he would not have him force her by any means. So Aspasia was sent for , and she was asked with whom she had rather be. She answered, with Darius: contrary to King Artaxerxes expectation, who both by the Custome, and also the Law, was compelled to let him have her. But shortly after he took her from him again, faying that he would place her in a Nunnery of Diana, in the Countrey of ECBA-

TANA, where they call her Anith, there to serve the goddes, and to live chast all the days of her life: supposing by this means to punish his Son, not rigorously, but moderately, with grief mixt

But the younger, which was called Ochus, being a valiant man, and of a hot stirring nature, had fome in the Court also that took his part, and hoped to attain to his purpose, by the means of Sons.

by this means his Realm should grow into faction and civil Wars: he proclaimed his eldest Artaxerxes Son Darius (being fifty years old) King after his death; and furthermore, gave him leave from proclaimeth thenceforth to wear the point of his Hat right up. in love with Afpafia, or else for that he saw his Father mocked him in that point, Tiribazus finding this, and perceiving that Darius took it very grievoully : he aggravated his anger against his Father, Tribagui in knowing the pattion of love in Darius, by his own upon the like occasion. King Artaxerxes had Enfech Darius muny Daughters, and had promifed Pharnabasus one of them, called Apama: unto Orentes, Rodo-Father Arts- goune : and to Tiribazus, Amestris. The King performed the other two marriages, and did put Tiribazus by his Wife. For the King himself married his own Daughter Amestria; and for her, he promifed Tiribazus the younger, Ato [a: with whom also he himself fell in love, and married her. Tiri-Tiribayusman- bazos hercupon was in fuch a rage with the King, that he hated him to the death; not because he was any Traytour or feditious man in nature, but a mad hare-brain'd fellow. For fometimes he was aloft. and in as good credit and authority as the beft; fuddainly again he would play fome mad part to anger the King, and then he was in as much difgrace, and out of countenance: and could away with neither fortune. For when he was in authority, he made every man hate him for his pride; and being in difgrace, he could not humble himfelf, but lookt bigger then before. Now there was Fire and Brimstone met, when Tiribazus took part with Darius. For he daily blew into his ears, that it was to no purpole for him to wear his Hat right up, if his affairs also went not rightly forward : and that he deceived himself much, if he did not know that his Brother (by means of the Woman he kept) fecretly alpired to the Crown: and that his Father being so unconstant as he was, he must not trust in any fort to succeed his Father in the Kingdom, what Proclamation soever he hath made in his behalf to the contrary. For , faid he , he that for a GRECIAN Woman hath broken and violated the holy. Law that was in PERSIA: thou must not look that he will perform that he hath promised thee. And furthermore, he perswaded him, that it was not a like repulse unto Ochus, to be denied that which he looked for : as it was for him to be turned out of all that ever he had gotten. For faid he, If it please Ochus to live like a private man, he may fasely do it, and no man will trouble him, but for himfelf that was already proclaimed King, he must of necessity make himself King, or else he must not live. So, the Poet Sophocles his faying most commonly proveth true:

Ill counsel easily takes place. For the way is large and plain for a man to believe as he lift, and men commonly are given rather to beleeve the evil then the good, because most men know what goodness meaneth. But now belides these perswasions, the greatness of the Kingdom, and the fear Darius stood in of his Brother Ochus , took great force and effect with him : and it may be also , that Venus her felf did some-Datius consti- what in the matter, for the malice and spite that Alpasia was taken from him. But whatsoever the cause was , thus was it handled : that Darius flatly confpired against his Father Artaxerxes, together with Artistrate his Tiribazut. Now, they having gotten many Conspiratours to joyn with them, one of the Kings Ennuchs perceiving it, ran and told the King of it, and how they had fuddenly determined to affail him, knowing certainly that it was agreed among themselves, that they should kill him in his bed in the night. Artaxerxes receiving this advertisement, thought it was not good to be careless of a matter of to great importance, as his life: and also that it were too great lightness in him so suddenly to believe his Eunuch, without better proof or knowledge. So he took this way with himself. He commanded the Eunuch that had given him this information, to keep company still with the Conspiratours, and to how to prevent follow them whereforeer they went, to fee their doings: and in the mean time he beat down his wall behind his bed, and made a door through, and fet up a hanging of Tapeftry before it. When the time was come, as the Eunuch had advertised the King, that the Traytours meant to do their feat: Artaxerxes being laid on his bed, rose not up, till he had seen every Traytour of them in the face that came to kill him. Then, when he faw them coming towards him with their Swords drawn, he suddenly lift up the hanging, and got into his inner Chamber, and shut the door after him, making an out-cry, Murder, murder. So, the Traytours being plainly feen and known by the King, fled the fame way they came, and failed of their purpose, and bad Tiribazus fave himself, because he was known. So they dispersed themselves, and scaped by flying. But Tiribacus was taken tardy, although he had slain divers of the Kings guard, valiantly defending himself: yet they took him not, till he Traytor , flain. was ftricken with a Dart a good way off , which flew him. Darins was also taken and apprehended, and brought priloner with his Sons: and the King referred him to be judged by his Peers. For the King himfelf would not be prefent to give judgement of him, but deputed others in his place to accuse him: howbeit he commanded his Secretaries to set down in writing, the opinion and sentence of every one of the Judges, and to bring it to him. In fine, they all cast him, and condemned him to die. Then the Officers laid hold on him, and brought him into a Chamber of the Prison, where the Hangman came with a Razor in his hand, with the which he used to cut mens Throats so condemned to die. So the Hangman coming into the Chamber, when he faw it was Darius, he was afraid, and came out of the Chamber again, his heart failing him, and durst not lay hands upon the person of the King. But the Judges that stood without the Chamber, bad him go and do it, unless he would have his own Throat cut. So the Hangman then came in , and took Darius by the hair of the head, and made him hold down his head, and fo cut his neck with his Razor he had in his other hand. Others do write, that this fentence was given in the prefence of King Artaxerxes felf, and that Darius feeing himfelf convicted by manifest proofs brought in against him, he fell down at his Fathers feet, and befought him to pardon him: and then that his Father being angry, role up, and drew out his Curtleax and wounded him in fo many places withall, that at length he flew him. Then returning into his Court, he worthipped the Sun, and turning him to his Lords that were about him, he faid unto them: My Lords, God be with you, and be merry at home in your houses, and tell them that were not here, how the great Oromazes hath taken revenge of them, that practifed treason against me. This was the end of Darius treason. Now Darius being dead, Ochus his brother stood in good hope to be next heir to the Crown, and the rather through the means and friendship of his lifter Atola: but yet of his legitimate brethren, he fear- King Attaed Ariaspes, who was onely left of all the rest that were ligitimate; and of his bastard brethren, Ar- xerxes sons. fames : not because Ariaspes was elder then be, but for that (he being of a soft and plain nature) her Persians therefore defired he might be their King. On the other fide, Arlams was wife, and valiant: and Ochus faw that his father loved him dearly. So he determined to intrap them both. Now Ochus being a fubrile and malicious natured man, he first shewed his cruelty upon Arlames, and his malice upon Ariafper his legitimate brother. For , because he knew he was but simple and plain, he fent daily some of the Kings Eunuches unto him, who brought him threatning words and meffages; as from the King: telling him, that he had determined to pur him to a shameful and cruel death. So, forging these news continually as things very secret, they did so terrisse poor Ariaspes, telling him, that the King was fully bent to put some of his threats in execution out of hand; and that he was put in such fear and despair of his life, that he prepared himself a poison, and drank it, to rid himself of his life. King Artaxerxes understanding of his death took it very heawily, and began to miftrust the cause that made him to make himself away : howbeit, he could not feek the proof of it, for his extream age. But this chance made him love Arfames better then before shewing plainly that he trusted him better then Ochus, and did make him privy to all things. Ochus could no longer abid to defer his intent, and therefore inticed Harpaces, Tiribazan fon, to kill his baltard Arasmes, the which he did. Now Artaxernes was so extream old, that he was as good as King Artaxer done with age: but after he heard his fon Arfames was murthered, he could bear it no longer, but xes. took it so to heart for sorrow, that when he had lived fourscore and fourteen years, and raigned three- Artaxerxes force and two, he died. When he was dead they then found that he had been a gracious and cour. was ninety four teous Prince, and one that loved his people and fubjects; when they faw the proof of his fucceffour year old at his death. Ochus, that passed all men living, in cruelty and severity.

ke as Simonides (O Siffice Senecio) faith, that the City of Illium was not offended with the CORINTHIANS, for that they came to make war with them with other GRECIANS, because Glaucus (whose first anceftors came from CORINTH) had taken arms , and lovingly fought for the fame : even fo methinkes, that neither the GRECIANS, nor Ro-MANS have cause to complain of the Academy, fith they be both alike praised of the same in this present book, in the which are contained the lives of Don and Brutm. Of the which, the one of them having been very familiar with Plate himself, and the other from his childhood brought up in Plato's doctrine: they both (as it were) came out of one felf Schoolhouse to attempt the greatest enterprises amongst men. vell if they two were much alike in many of their doings, proving that true, which their Schou mafter Plato wrote of vertue; that to do any noble act in the Government of a Common-wealth, How mens acts which should be famous and of credit, authority, and good fortune, must both meet in one self should be famous in the person, joyned with justice and wisdom. For as a certain Fencer (called Hippomachus) laid, shather than the person, joyned with justice and wisdom. knew his scholars far off, if he did but see them coming from the Market with meat in their hands so it must needs follow, that men having been vertuoully brought up, must needs be wife in all their do-It must needs to now, that men naving oven vertuously prought up, must needs be when all iter up, and befule that it bringeth them to civility and honefty, even so it frameth their conditions much like one to another: furthermore, their fortunes having also fallen out both alike, more by make then by any reason, do make their lives very like each other; for they were both of the share the property of the proper A wicked spirifilly appeared unto either of them; albeit there be some that cannot abide those opinions, and do maintain, that thefe fights and evill spirits do never appear to any man that hath his right wits, but mon Diss and that they are fancies of little children, or old women, or of fome men whose wits are weakned by sicknets, and fo have a certain imagination of fuch fittings fights, being of this fuperfittious mind, that have a wicked fiprit, and an evil angel in them. But if Dion and Brutus, both of them grave the best of the state of t and learned Philosophers, and very constant men, not overcome by any suddain passion or imagina-The performed and the performed by fuch fights and for its and have also told it unto their friends: I cannot tell whether we shall be enforced, to grant the most strange and old opinion of this, which shall be the performed by the most strange and old opinion of this, which shall be and foreign which are the performed by the performance of the performa That there be evil fpirits which envying the vertue of good men to withdraw them from their godly minds, to make them afraid with these fearfull fights, inticing them to forfake their godliness, lest that perfilting therein, they should be rewarded with better life in the world to come, then theirs is. But let us refer this disputation to some other book: and now in this twelfth couple of these famous mens lives compared, let us first begin to write the life of him that is the elder of these two men we speak of.

Diorifius the elder, after he had the Government of SICILIA in his hands, he married the Dughter of Hermocrates, a Citizen of Syracusa. But yet not being throughly Dissiplier married the Tryranny, the Syracusans did Rebell against him, and did so cruelly tied Hermocrate and abominably handle the Body of his Wife, that she willingly posioned her self. So, after he had established himself in his Government with more surety then before, he married again two other Wives together, the one a stranger of the City of LOCRES; called red again two other vives logarint, and one a stage of the one of the Doride; and the other of the Country is felf, called Arifornacie, the Daughter of Hipportune parisms the chiefest man of all Syra.cusa, and that had been companion with Dionysius, the Doride of Lofastit time he was chosen Generall. It was said that Dionysius married them both in one day, arts. Arifornations. and that they could never tell which of them he knew first: but otherwise, that he made the of syratusa, as much of the one, as he did of the other. For they commonly fate together with him Hippirman at his table, and did either of them lie with him by turns; though the Syracusans daughter and would have their own Country-woman preferred before the stranger. Howbeit, the strange woman had this good hap, to bring torth Dionyfine his eldest Son, which was a good countenance to delend her being a Forrainer. Aristomache in contrary manner, continued a long time with Dionjfins without Fruit of her Womb, although he was very defirous to have children by her : to that he put the LOCRIAN womans mother to death, accusing her that she had with Sorceries and Witchcraft, kept Aristomache from being with child. Died being the Brother of Aristomache, was had in great estimation at the first, for his Dions kindred Sifters fake; but afterwards the Tyrant finding him to be a wife man, he loved him then with Diensfint. for his own fake. Infomuch , that among many fundry things and pleasures he did for him: he commanded his Treasurers to let him have what money he asked of them, so they made him acquainted withall the felf fame day they gave him any. Now, though Dion had ever before a noble mind in him by Naure, yet much more did that magnaninity increale, when Plato (by good fortune) arrived in Sicile. For his coming thirder furely was no mans device (as 1 take it) but the providence of fome god : who (bringing far off the first beginning and foundation of the Liberty of the SYRACUSANS, and to overthrow the tyrannicall state) fent Plato out of ITALIE unto the City of SYRACUSA, and brought him Plato came out acquainted with Don, who was but a young man at that time, but yet had an apter wit to offeaty unto syacquanted with Dogod will to follow vertue, then any young man elfe that followed Pla-tacuft.

to; as Plato himself writeth, and his own doings also do witness. For Dion having from Etholat. a child been brought up with humble conditions under a Tyrant, and acquainted with a fervile a chied been brought up with a proud and infolent raign, with all vanity and curiofity, as placing chief felicity in covetoulness: nevertheless, after he had felt the sweet Reasons of Philolophy, teaching the broad way to vertue, his heart was enflamed straight with an earnest desire to follow the same. And because he found that he was so easily perswaded to love Vertue and Honesty, he simply thinking (being of an honest plain nature) that the self same perswasions would move a like affection in Dionysiu, obtained of Dionysius, that being at leifure, he was contented to fee Plato, and to fpeak with him. When Plato came to Dionysiu, all their talk in manner was of Vertue, and they chiefly reasoned, what was Plato and Dio-Fortitude : where Plato proved that Tyrants were no Valiant men. From thence passing nystus the elder farther unto justice, he told him, that the Life of Just men was happy; and contrarily, he talke together, Life of unjust men, unfortunate. Thus the Tyrant Dionysius perceiving he was overcome, durst no more abide him, and was angry to see the standers by make such estimation of Pla-70, and that they had such delight to hear him speak. At length he angrily asked him. What business he had to do there ? Plato answered him , he came to seek a good man, Donyfius then replied again; What in Gods name, by thy speech then it seemeth thou haft found none yet. Now Dion thought that Dionyfins anger would proceed no further, and therefore at Plato's earnest request, he sent him away in the Galley with three banks of Oars, the which Pollis a LACEDEMONIAN Captain carried back again into GREECE. Howbeit. Dionylius secretly requested Pollis to kill Plato by the way, as ever he would do Dionyliu mahim pleasure : if not , yet that he would sell him for a slave , howsoever he did : for , said lice unto Plato. he he shall be nothing the worse for that; because, if he be a just man, he shall be as happy to be a flave, as a freeman. Thus (as it is reported) this Pollis carried Plato into the Isle of EGINA, and there fold him. For the EGINETES having made war at that time with the ATHENIANS, made a Decree, that all the ATHENIANS that were taken in their Isle, should be sold. This notwithstanding, Dionysius resulted not to honour and the sold in trust Dion, as much as ever he did before, and did also send him Ambassadour in matters. Against the sold of orest weight; as when he sent him panto the Carthaganthas who he behaved. of great weight : as when he fent him unto the CARTHAGINIANS, where he behaved himself so well, that he wan great reputation by his journey: and the Tyrant could well Dions boldness away with his plain speech. For no man but he, durft fay their minds so boldly unto in speaking him, to speak what he thought good: as on a time he reproved him for Gelon. Now when Dion marriero mari cu unio nis promise de la fick, not like to escape, Dien would have spoken with him for his children his Necce A- Dionysias her father fell fick, not like to escape, Dien would have spoken with him for his children his Neece A Dionyfus her tather ten nek, not need creape; Dion would never poster wat in the mean rete, the dough- he had by his fifter Ariftomache. Howbeit the Phylicians about him, to curry favour with the next ter of Dionyfus, heir and fucceffor of the tyranny, would never let him have any time or opportunity to fpeak with and finisher, him. For (as Timens written) they gave Dionyfus the elder (as he had commanded them) a strong Ariftomache. Opiat-drink to cast him in a sleep, and so thereby they took from him all his senses, and joyned death with his fleep. Notwithflanding in the first counsel and assembly holden by his friends, to consult about the state and affairs of the younger Dionystus, Dion moved matter to necessary and profitable for that prefent time, that by his wifedom he sheweth they were all but children, and by his bold and frank speech made them know, that they were but slaves of the tyranny: because they beafily and cowardly gave such counsel and advice, as might best please and feed the young tyrants he mour. But, he made them most to wonder at him, when they fearing above all other things, the danger Di nyfins state was in , by reason of CARTHAGE , he did promise them , that if Diagfins would have peace, he would then go forthwith into Africk, and find the means honour ably to quench the wars : or , if otherwise he better liked of war , that he would furnish him at any to querien the wars. . . . , his own proper costs and charges, fifty Gallies ready to rowe. Dionyfus wondred greatly at the noble mind of Dios, and thanked him much for the good will be bare unto him, touching lisefate. Burall men elle taking Dions noble offer to be a reproach of their avarice; and his credit and authority, an impair unto theirs: they prefently upon this liberal offer took occasion to acuse us the young the property of the form of the property of the p for they complained of him, and faid, that he cunningly practifed to possess the tyranny, making himself strong by Sea, going about by his Gallies to make the tyranny fall into the hands of the children of Arifomache his Sifter. But the chiefest cause of all why they did malice and have him, was his strange manner of life, that he neither would keep company with then, nor live after their manner. For they that from the beginning were crept in favour ad friendship with this young ill-brought-up Tyrant, by flattering of him, and feeding him with vain pleafures, fludied for no other thing, but to entertain him in love-matters, and other vain exercises, as to riot and banquet, to keep light women company, and all such other vile victous passines and recreations: by the which the tyranny became like iron folined by fire; and feemed to be very pleasant unto the subjects, because the over great Majesty and se verity thereof was fomewhat milder, not fo much by the bounty and goodness, as by the felly and wreachlesness of the Lord. Thus, this little care and regard increasing more and more, sill winning way with the young tyrant, did at length melt and break afunder those strong Dumond Chains, with the which Dionyfins the elder made his boalt that he left his Monnchy and tyranny chained to his fon. For fometime he would be three days together without intermission, still banqueting and being drunk: and all that time his Court Gates were kept thut unto grave and wife men , and for all honest matters ; and was then full of drunkards,, of common plays, dancings, masks, and mummeries, and full of all fuch trumpery and disolute pastimes. And therefore Dion undoubtedly was much envied of them, because he gave himfelf to no sport and pleasure : whereupon they accused him, and misnamed his verures, vices, being fomewhat to be refembled unto them; as in calling his gravity, pride; his plainness and boldness in his oration, obstinacy, if he did perswade them, that he accused them; and because he would not make one in their fond pastimes, that therefore he delpited them. For , to fay truely, his manners by nature had a certain haughtiness of mind and severity, and he was a fowre man to be acquainted with : whereby his company was not onely trouble fome, but also unpleasant to this younger Dionysiu, whose ears were so fine, that they could not away to hear any other thing but flattery. And furthermore, divers of his very friends Dione manners and familiars (that did like and commend his plain manner of speech and noble mind) did too grave and yet reprove his sternness, and austere conversation with men : for it seemed unto them, that he spake too roughly, and dealt over hardly with them that had to do with him, and more then became a civill or courteous man. And for proof hereof , Plate himself fometime wrote unto him (as if he had prophefied what should happen) that he should beware of obstinacy, Oblinocy, lel- che companion of foliarinels, that bringeth a man in the end to be forfaken of every one.

stare. Now Dion knew well enough, that he was not fo well taken and esteemed through the good will of the Tyrant, as against his will, and for the necessity of the state and time.

So Dion supposing the ignorance, and want of knowledge in Dionysia was the cause, he devised to put him into fome honeft trade or exercise, and to teach him the liberal Sciences, to frame him to a civil life, that thenceforth he should no more be afraid of vertue, and should also take pleasure and delight in honest things. For Dionysius of his own nature, was none low and com. This notwithstanding, they did more reverence him at that time, then any man clie, be-panion of foli-cause of the state and Government, and for that they thought him the onely man that could of the worlt fort of tyrants, but his father fearing that if he came once to have a feeling and conceit of himself, or that he companied with wife and learned men, he would go near to enter into pra-Aife, and put him out of his feat; he ever kept him locked up in a Chamber, and would fuffer no man to speak with him. Then the younger Dionysius, having nothing else to do, gave himself to make little Chariots, Candlesticks, Chairs, Stools, and Tables of wood: for his father Dionylius was so fearful and miftrufful of every body, that he would fuffer no man with a pair of Barbers Cizers to pole the hair of his head, but caused an image-maker of earth to come unto him, and with a hor burning cole to burn his goodly bush of hair round about. No man came into his Chamber where Dionvilus the he was with a Gown on his back, no not his own brother nor fon, but he was driven (before he elder a marvelhe could come in) to put off his Gown, and the Guard of his Chamber to strip him naked, what to loss timorous ever he was : and then they gave him another Gown to cast upon him, but not his own. One day and suspicious his brother Leptines going about to describe unto him the situation of some place, he took a Hal-man. bard from one of the Guard, and with the point thereof began to draw out a plot of the same upon the ground. Dion yfins was terribly offended with him, and did put the fouldier to death that gave him his Halbard. He faid, he was afraid of his friends, yea and of the wifeft of them; because he knew that they desired rather to rule, then to be ruled, and to command, then to obey. He slew one of his Captains called Marsas (whom he had preferred and had given him charge of men) because he Marsas dream: dreamed, that he killed him : faying , that he dreamed of this in the night , because that waking in the day he had determined to kill him. Now Diony firs that was fo timorous; and whose mind through fearfulnels was ftill milerably occupied, was notwithstanding marvellously offended with Plato, be- Dion perswadcause he did not judge him to be the noblest and valiantest man alive. Dion therefore seeing (as we eth the younghave faid) the younger Dianysius clean marred, and in manner cast away for lack of good education , er Dianysius to perswaded him the best he could to give himself unto study, and by the greatest intreaty he could fill to study. possibly make, to pray the Prince of all Philosophers to come into Sicile. And then, when through his intreaty he were come, that he would refer himself wholly unto him, to the end that reforming his life by vertue and learning, and knowing God thereby (the best example that can be possible, and by whom the whole world is ruled and governed, which otherwise were out of all order and confused) he strould first obtain great happiness to himself, and consequently unto all his Citizens; who ever after through the temperance and justice of a father, would with good will do these things, which they then unwillingly did for the fear of a Lord. And in doing this; from a tyrant he should come to be a King : for, the chains of a Diamond to keep a Realm in safety, were not force The sflured and fear as his father Dionylius held opinion: neither the great multitude of young fouldiers, nor the guard of Pringuard of ten thousand barbarous people: but in contrary manner, that they were the love and good ces, is the love will of their fubjects, which the Prince obtaineth through vertue and justice; the which chains though of their fubthey be flacker then the other that are fohard and fliff, yet are they stronger, and will last longer jects. time, to keep a Realm and Kingdom in fafety. And furthermore, the Prince (faid he) is not defirous of honour, neither is a man that deserveth greatly to be praised and commended, that onely studieth to wear fumptuous apparel, and that glorieth to fee his Court richly furnished, and himself curiously served; and in the mean time doth not frame himself to speak better, to be wifer; and to carry a greater Majesty then any other mean or common person; not esteeming to adorn and beautiste the Princely Pallace of his mind, as becometh the Royal Majesty of a King. Dion oftentimes rehearling these exhortations unto Dionysius, and otherwhile enterlacing between, some reasons he had learned of Plato, he graffed in him a wonderful and (as it were) a vehement defire to have Plato in his company, and to learn of him. So, fundry letters came from Dionyfius unto ATHENS, divers requests from Dion, and great intreaty made by certain Pythagorean Philosophers, that prayed and perswaded Plate to come into Stelle, to bride the light disposition of this young man, by his grave and wife infructions: who without regard of reason, led a dissolute and licentious life. Therefore Plate (as himfelf reporteth) bluffning to himfelf, and fearing left he should give men cause to think, that it was but Plato goeth inthe opinion men had of him, and that of himfelf he was unwilling to do any worthy act: and further, to state, to the opinion men nad of mim, and that of infinitely the was miniming to do any worthy act. The flould the poing that doing good but unto one man alone; who was the onely guide of all the reft, he flould the younger. (as it were) recover all SICILE from her corruption and ficknels, he performed their requests that fent unto him. But Dions enemies fearing the change and alteration of Dionysius, they perswaded him to call Philiftus the Historiographer home again from banishment, who was a learned man, and had been brought up and acquainted with the tyrants faction: to the end he should serve as a counterpoile, to withftand Plato and his Philosophy: for this Philistus, from the first time that the teranny Historiograbegan to be established , did shew himself very willing and conformable to the stablishment thereof, pher. and had of long time kept the Caftle: and the voice went, that he kept the mother of Dionylius the elder, and as it was supposed, not altogether without the tyrants knowledge. But afterwards . Leptines having had two daughters by one woman, whom he entited to folly, being another mans wife, he married one of these his daughters unto Philisus, and made not Dionysius privy to it before. The tyrant Philisus the therewith was so offended, that he put Leptines woman in prison fast locked up, and drave Philiftin Historiograout of SICILE. He being banished thus, repaired unto some of his friends that dwelt about the pher banished Adriatick Sea, where it feemeth, he wrote the most part of all his History, being then at good out of Sicile by leafure. For he was not called home again during the life of Dionyfins the elder: but after his death, elder. the malice the Courtiers bare unto Dion, caused them to procure Philistus calling home again (as we have told you) as the man they thought would flick floutly in defence of the tyranny. So. Philifter no fooner returned, but he stoutly began to defend the tyranny : and others in contrary

manner, deviled acculations to the Tyrant against Dion, accusing him that he had practifed with Theodotes and Heraclides, to overthrow the tyranny of Dionylius. For Dion (in my opinion) hoped by Plato's coming to bridle and leffen a little the over-licentic us and imperious tyranny of Disnyfins, and thereby to frame Dionysim 2 wise and righteous governour. But on the other side, if he saw he Democratia the would not follow his counfell, & that he yeelded not to his wife inftructions, he then determined to put him down, and to bring the Government of the Commonwealth into the hands of the SYRACUS ANS: not that he allowed of Democratia (to wit, where the people govern) but yet certainly thinking Diss allowed not popular that Democratia was much better then the tyranny, when they could not come unto Ariffocratia (to the Ariffocratia with the Government of a few of the Nobility.) Now things being in this state, Plato arrived in Sisisting govern. CILE, where he was marvellously received and honoured by Dienysius. For when he landed on the fhore, leaving his Galley that brought him, there was ready for him one of the Kings rich and fumpruous Chariots, to convey him to the Caftle: and the tyrant made facrifice to give the gods thanks for his coming, as for fome wonderful great good hap chanced unto his feigniory. Furthermore, the wonderfull modelty and temperance that was begun to be observed in feasts and banquets, the Court younger. clean changed, and the great goodnels and clemency of the tyrant in all things, in ministring justice. The change of the change of to every man; did put the Syracusans in great good hope of change; and every man in the Distribute upon Court was very desirous to give himself to learning and Philosophy: so that (as men reported) the tyrants pallace was full of fand and duft, with the number of students that drew plats and figures of Geo. metry. Shortly after Pl.10 was arrived, by chance the time was come about to do folemn factifice within the Castle, at which facrifice the Herauld (as the manner was) proclaimed aloud the folema prayer accustomed to be done: That it would please the gods, long to preserve the state of the tyranny. Whereat Dionysius being hard by him, faith unto him, What, wilt thou not leave to cure me? This word grieved Philissus and his companions to the heart, thinking that with time, by little and little, Plato would win fuch estimation and great authority with Dionysius, that afterwards they should not be able to refift him: confidering that in so short a time as he had been with Dionysius, he had so altered his mind and courage. And therefore they now began, not one by one, nor in hugger mugger, but all of them with open mouth together to accuse Dion: and faid, that it was case to be Philistus accu. feen, how he charmed and inchanced Dionysius through Plato's eloquence, to make him willing to Emulius accurately relign his government, because he would transfer it to the hands of the children of his fifter Anista mache. Others feemed to be offended, for that the ATHENIANS having come before into Sici-LI a with a great Army, both by sea and land, they were all lost and cast away, and could no win the City of Syracusa: and that now by one onely Sophister, they utterly destroyed and overthrew the Empire of Dionyfins , perfwading him to discharge the ten thousand fouldiers he had about him for his guard, to forfake the four hundred Galleys, the ten thousand horfemen, and as many mo footmen, to go to the Academy to feek an unknown happinels never heard of before, and to make him happy by Geometry, refigning his prefent happines and selicity (to be a great Lord, to have money at will, and to live pleafantly) unto Diss and his Nephew. By fuch like acculations and wicked tongues, Dionyfins began first to mistrust Dion, and asterwards to be openly offended with him, and to frown upon him. In the mean time they brought letters that Dies wrote fecretly unto DISM SERVED. the Governours of the City of CARTHAGE, wishing them, that when they would make peace with Dionysing, they should not talk with him unless he stood by : affuring them that he would help them to fet things in quietness, and that all should be well again. When Dionysins had read these letters with Philifius, and had taken his advice and council what he should do, as Timens said; he deceived Dion under pretence of reconciliation, making as though he meant him no hurr, and trying that he would become triends again with him. So he brought Dies one day to the fea fide under his Castle, and shewed him those letters, burdening him to have practised with the CARTHAGINI-ANS against him. And as, Dien went about to make him answer to clear himself , Dienssius would Dies fent away not hear him, but caufed him to be taken up as he was, and put into a Pinnace, and commanded the Mariners to fet him a land upon the coaft of ITALY. After this was done, and that it was known abroad in the City, every man thought it a cruel part of Dionylius, infomuch that the tyrants pallace was in a marvellous peck of troubles, for the great forrow the women made for the departure of Dies. Moreover, the City felf of Syracus a began to look about them, looking for fome fuddain great change and innovation, for the tumult and uproar that would happen by means of Dions banishment; and for the mistrust also that all men would have of Dionysius. Dionysius contidering this, and being afraid of fome misfortune be gave his friends and the women of his pallace confortable words, telling them that he had not banished him, but was contented that he should absent himfelf for a time : being afraid that in his fuddain angry mood he might peradventure be compelled to do him fome worfe turn if he remained, because of his obstinacy and self-will. Furthermore, he gave unto Dions friends two ships, to carry as much goods, money, and as many of Dions fervants as they would, and to convey them unto him into PELOPONNESUS. Dien was a marvellous rich man, and for the pomp of his service, and sumptuous moveables of his house, they were like unto the perfon of a tyrant. All these riches Dions friends brought aboard upon those ships, and carried them unto him; besides many other riches which the women and his friends sent unto him; so that by means of his great riches, Dies was marvelloully effeemed among the GRECIANS : who by the riches of a banished Citizen, conjectured what the power of a tyrant may be. But now concerning Plate. When Dion was exiled, Diony fine caused him to be lodged in his Castle, and by this means craftily placed (under cloak of friendship) an honourable guard about him, because he should not return ten frequenting his company (as a wild beaft is made tame by company of man) he liked his talk fo well, that he became in love with him, but it was a tyrannical love : for he would have Plate to love none but him . and that he should esteem him above all men living, being ready to put the whole Dionysius the Realm into his hands, and all his forces, fo that he would think better of him then of Dion. Thus rannical love was this passionate affection of Dionysius grievous unto Plato: for he was so drowned with the love to Plato. of him. as men extreamly jealous of the women they love, that in a moment he would fuddainly fall out with him, and straight again become friends, and pray him to pardon him. And to say truely, he had a marvellous detire to hear Plato's Philosophy: but on the other fide, he reverenced them that did diffusade him from it, and told him, that he would spoil himself, if he entred over-deeply Dionysias sent into it. In the mean time fell out war, and thereupon he fent Plato again away, promifing him, Plato from that the next Spring he would fend for Dion home. But he brake promife therein, and yet fent him him, his revenues: and prayed Plato to pardon him, though he had not kept promife at his time appointed. For he alledged the war was the cause; and that so soon as he had ended his war, he would fend for Dion; whom in the mean time he prayed to have patience, and not to attempt any ftir or alteration against him, nor to speak evil of him among the GRECIANS. This Plate fought to bring Diens life in to pals, and brought Dion to study Philosophy, and kept him in the Academy at ATHENS, Dion Greece, lay in the City of ATHENS with one Galippus, whom he had known of long time; howbeit, he bought him a house in the Country, to lie there sometime for his pleasure; the which he gave afterwards (at his return into SICILE) unto Spenippus that kept him company, and was continually with him more then with any other friend he had in ATHENS, through Plato's counsel: who to foften and recreate Dions manners, gave him the company of some pleasant conceited man, knowing that this Spenippus could modeftly observe time and place to be pleasant and merry . for which respect, Timon in his satyricall jests, calleth Speusippus, A good jester. Now Plato himself having undertaken to defray the charges of common playes in the dancing of young children . Dion took the pains to teach, and exercise them; and moreover, himself was at the whole charge of these playes, Place Suffering him to bestow that liberality and courtesse upon the ATHENIANS ; the which wan Dion a great deal more good will, then Plato honour. Dion kept not ftill at ATHENS, but went al-To to fee the other good Cities of GREECE, passing his time away. He being at common feasts and affemblies with the chiefest men, and best learned in matters of state and government, and never shewing any light parts, nor fign of any tyrannical pride in this manner of life, nor of a man that had been brought up with all pomp and pleasure, but like a grave vertuous man, and well studied in Philosophy, whereby he grew to be generally beloved and esteemed of all men : the City granted him publike honours, and fent him decrees of his glory, made in their councils and affemblies. Furthermore, the LACEDEMONIANS made him a SPARTAN and Burgels of the City, not pal- plons verues fing for Diony size displeasure, though at that time he had given them great aid, in the war they made and honours against the THEBANS. Some report, that Dion on a time was intreated by Ptaodorus MEGARI- done unto him AN, to come and fee him at his house, and Dien went thither. This Ptaodorm was a marvellous by the Grecians great rich man, and therefore Dion feeing a great number of people standing at his gates, and that it was a hard thing to come and speak with him, he had such great business : he turned unto his friends that did accompany him, who were angry they made him tarry to long at the gate, and faid unto them : What cause have we to think evil of him, fish we did the like when we were at Syra-CUSA? But Dionypius being incenfed with envy against him, and searing the goodwill the GRECI-ANS bare him, he kept back his revenue, and would no more fend it him; and feized all the goods, the which he gave to his receivers to keep. Furthermore, because he would clear himself of the infamy he had gotten amongst the Philosophers for Plato's sake, he fent for divers wise and learned men. and vainly covering to excell them all in wildom, he was driven improperly, and out of time, to alledge many wife fayings, he had learned of Plate. Thereupon he began again to wifh for him, and to condemn himself, for that he had no wit to use him well when he had him at his commandment, and that he had not heard him so much as he should have done : and like a tyrant as he was, madly carried away with light defires, and eafily changing mind from time to time, a fuddain vehement defire took him in the head, to have Plato again. So he fought all the means and ways he could de-vife, to pray Archyea the Pythagorean Philosopher, to tell him that he might boldly come; and to Archytas 1 Pybe his furery unto him for that he would promife him: for first of all they were acquainted together inservan Phi-by his means. Therefore Archytas fent thither Archydamus the Philosopher. Dionysius also sent cer-losopher. tain Gallies, and fome of his friends thither, to pray Plato to come to him, and he himself wrote specific get hagain for cially and plainly, that it should not go well with Dion if Plato came not into SICILE: but if he Plato to come would be perswaded to come, that then he would do what he would have him. Many letters and re-into Sicile. quests came unto Dion from his wife and fifter, infomuch as Dion so used the matter, that Plato Plato's third obeyed Dionyfine without making any excuse at all. So Plate writeth himself, that he was driven to journey into Sicile. come again the third time into the streight of SICILE;

To trie, if once he could Charybdis dangers pafs.

Now Plato being arrived in SICILE, he made Diony sim a great joyful man, and filled all SICILE again with great good hope: for they were all very defirous, and did what they could, to make Plate overcome Philisten and the tyranny with his Philosophy. The women of Dionysius Court did he knew maliced him of long time, and fought to kill him, because he did perswade Dionysius to leave his tyranny, and to live without his Guard. Plato being in this inftant danger, Archytat fent Ambassadours torthwith unto Dionysus, in a Galley of thirty Oars, to demand Plate again:

declaring that Plato came again to Syracusa upon his word and caution. Dionyfus to excuse himself, and to shew that he was not angry with him, at his departure from him, he made him all the great chear and feafts he could, and to fent him home with great flews of good will. One day among the rest, he said unto Plato : I am afraid Plato (said he) that thou wilt speak evill of me when thou art among thy friends and companions in the Academy. Then Plate smiling, anfwered him again: The gods forbid, that they should have such scarcity of matter in the Academy, as that they must needs talk of thee. This was Plato's return (as it is reported) although that which he himfelf writeth, agreeth not much with this report. Thele things went to Dions heart, fo that shortly after he shewed himself an open enemy unto Dionysius, but specially when he heard how he had handled his wife. Plato under covert words fent Diony fins word of it by his letters : and thus it was. After Dion was exiled, Dionysius returning Plate back again, he willed him secretly liked not his marriage, and could not live quietly with his wife. Therefore when Plato was at A-THENS, and told Dion of all things, he wrote a letter unto Dionyssus the tyrant, and did set all other things down fo plainly, that every man might understand him; but this one thing onely so darkly, that he alone and none other could understand him, but he to whom he had written : declaring unto him, that he had spoken with Dion about the matter he wrote of, and that he did let him understand he would be marvellous angry if Dionysins did it. So at that time, because there more hope to return into favour again, and that he had also fent home Plate in disgrace and displea-entertain Plate the best he could: above all, Dionysius seemeth to have a marvellous trust and asfiance in him, and more then in any other of all his friends. For he suffered Plato to come to him without fearthing of him, and oftentimes offered to give him a great fum of money: but Plato would Arifippus (aymithout fearching of him, and ottentimes onercu to give him agreed a that time in the tyrants Court in Simig of Dionifius take none of it. Therefore Arifippus CYRENIAN being at that time in the tyrants Court in Simig of Dionifius take none of it. CILE, faid, that Dienyfins bestowed his liberality surely: for, to us that ask much, he giveth little, and much unto Plato, that requireth nothing. After Dionysius had given Pleto his welcome, hebegan to move him again of Dion: Dionysius on the other fide, at the first did use him with fine delays, but afterwards he thewed himfelf angry indeed, and at length fell out with Plate, but yet fo covertly that others faw it not: for Dionyfins diffembled that; but otherwise in all other things he did him as much honour as he could devile, practifing thereby to make him to forfake Dians friendship. Now Plate found him at the first, that there was no trust to be given to his words, and that all were but lies and devices he either faid or did: howbeit he kept it to himself, and ever patiently bare all things, hoping for the best, and made as though he believed him. They two thus finely diffembling with each other, thinking to deceive all men, and that none should understand their secrets: Hilycon CYZICENIAN, one of Plato's friends, did Prognoficate the Eclipic of the Sun. The same Helycon, a Mafalling out as he had Prognofticated, the tyrant efteemed marvelloully of him, and gave him a filver talent for his labour. Then Ariftippm (porting with other Philosophers, faid, he could tell them of a franger thing to happen then that. So when they prayed him to tell them what it was: I do prognosticate (faid he) that Plato and Dionyssus will be enemies ere it be long. In the end it came to país, that Dionysius made port-fale of all Dions goods, and kept the money to himselft, and lodge ed Plato (that before lay in the next Court to his Pallace) among the souldiers of his guard, whom

But when they were to far out, that there was no fure, then he married his fifter Arete (Dions wife) against her will, unto one of his friends called respectations. the clier. both have run one fortune together? Truely, I knew not of his departure till he was gone; for it had been more for my honour, to have been called the wife of the banished Polyxenus, then the fifter of thee a tyrant. Dionysius marvelled to hear his fifter speak thus boldly, and the Syra-CUSANS wondered at her noble courage: infomuch, that when the tyranny was utterly destroyed, they did not reinfe to do her all the honour they could devife, as unto a Queen. And when the was dead alfo; all the Citizens of Syracus a by a common decree, did accompany her body ather burial. This little digreffion from our History, is not altogether unprofitable. But now again to our matter. Dion from thenceforth disposed himself altogether unto war, against Plato'; counsell and ad-Die beginneth vice: who did his best endravour to perswade him from it, both for the respect of Dienysius good entertainment he had given him, as also for that Dion was of great years. Howbeit, on the other against Diony fide, Spensppns and his other friends did provoke him unto it, and perswaded him to deliver SICILE from the flavery and bondage of the tyrant, the which held up her hands unto him, and would reseive him with great love and goodwill. For whilest Plate lay at SYRACUSA, Sprafippus keeping the Citizens company more then Plate did, he knew their minds better then he. For at the first, they were afraid to open themselves unto him, and frankly to speak what they thought mistriofting he was a spie unto the tyrant, sent amongst them to feel their minds: but within thort time they began to truft him, and were all of one mind; for they prayed and perswaded Dion to come, and not to care otherwise for bringing of ships, souldiers, nor horses with him, but onely to bire a ship, and to lend the SICILIANS his body and name against Dionysius. Spensippus reporting these news unto Dion, did put him in good heart again: whereupon he began fecretly to leavy men by other mens means The Philosoto hide his purpose and intent. The Philosophers do set forward Dions wars amany Citizens dealing phers advanin the affairs of the Common-wealth , did aid him , and divers of them also that onely gave their ced Dions war. minds to the fludy of Philosophy: and among them, Endemus CYPRIAN (on whose death Aristotle Aris wrote his Dialogue of the foul) and Timonides LEUCADIAN went with him. Furthermore, there logue, De aniiovned also with him Miltas THESSALIAN, a Soothsayer, and that had been his companion in mil. ftudy in the Academy. Now, of all them whom the tyrant had banished (which were no less then a thousand persons) there were but onely five and twenty that durst accompany him in this war: for all the other were fuch daftards, that they for fook him, and durft not go with him. The place where they appointed to meet, was the Isle of ZACINTH, where they leavied all their fouldiers, that were not above eight hundred in all; but all of them brave fouldiers and valiant men, and excellently well trained in wars : and to conclude, fuch lufty men, as would encourage all the Army Dion hoped of at his arrival in Sicile, to fight like valiant men with them. These hired fouldiers, the first time that they understood it was to go into SICILE, to make war with Dionysim, they were amazed at the first, and misliked the journey, because it was undertaken rather of malice and spight that Dion had to be revenged, then otherwise of any good cause or quarrel; who having no better hope, took upon him desperate and impossible enterprises. Therefore the fouldiers were offended with their Captains that had pressed them, because they had not told them of this War before. But, after that Dion by a notable Oration had told them, how tyrannies have evil foundations, and are subject unto ruine: and that he led them not into SICILE fo much for fouldiers, as he did to make them Captains of the SYRACUSANS and the other SICILIANS, who of long time defired nothing more then occasion to rise: and, when after him also Alcimenes (a companion with him in this war, and the chiefest man of all the ACHAIANS, both for nobility and estimation) did speak unto them in like manner; then they were all contented to go whither they would lead them. It was then in the heat of Summer, and the wind blew, called the GRECIAN wind, the Moon being at the full; and Dien having prepared to make a fumptuous facrifice unto the god Apollo, he led all his men armed with white corflets in procession into the temple : and after the facrifice done , he made them a feast in the Park or shew-place of the ZACINTHIANS. There the Tables were laid, and the souldiers wondered to see the great state and magnificence of the great number of pots of gold and silver, and such other furniture and preparation, as passed a private mans wealth: then they thought with themselves, Dione sumptuthat a man being so old, and Lord of so great a good, would not attempt things of such danger, with- our fare in seaout good ground, and great affurance of his friends aid and help. But after his oblations of wine, and sting. common prayers made to the gods at feafts, fuddainly the Moon eclipfed. Dion thought it not strange to see an Eclipse, considering the revolutions of the Eclipses, and knowing very well it is a shadow that falleth upon the body of the Moon, because of the direct interposition of the earth betwixt her and the Sun. But because the souldiers that were afraid and astonied withall, stood in need of some the Moon, and comfort and encouragement, Miltan the Soothfayer standing up in the midst among them, faid unto cause of the them : My fellow fouldiers, be of good chear, and affure your felves that we shall prosper : for God Belipse. doth foreshew us by this fight we see, that some one of the chiefest things now in highest place and dignity shall be Eclipsed. And at this present time, what thing carrieth greater glory and same, then the tyranny of Dionyfius? Therefore you must think, that to soon as you arrive in Sicile your selves thall put out his light and glory. This interpretation of the Eclipse of the Moon, did Miltas the Soothfaver make, before all the whole company. But touching the swarm of Bees that lighted on the poop ed to Dion, of Dions ship, he told him and his friends privately : That he was afraid his acts (which should fall out famous and glorious) should be but a while, and flourishing a few days, would straight consume away. It is reported also, that Dieny firm in like manner had many strange figns and wonderful tokens from above. Among others, there came an Eagle, that fnatched a Partifan out of a fouldiers hand, and car- Wonders apried it quite away with her, and then let it fall into the fea. The fea also beating against the walls of pearing to Diethe Caftle, was as fweet to drink a whole day together, as any conduit or running water; as those that nystee. tafted of it, found it true. Furthermore, a Sow farrowed Pigs that lacked no part of their body but onely their ears. This the Soothfayers faid, did fignifie rebellion and disobedience of his subjects: and that the Citizens would no more hear him, nor obey his tyranny. Furthermore, they told also, that the lweetness of the falt water prognosticated to the Syracusans change of cruell and evill time, unto good and civill government : and that the Eagle, Jupiters Minister; and the Partisan, the mark and token of the Kingdom and Empire; did beteken, that Jupiter (the chief of all the gods) had determined to deftroy and put down the tyranny. Theopompus reporteth this matter thus. So, Dions fouldiers were imbarked into two great ships of burden, and another third ship that was not very great, and two Pinnaces with thirty Oars, followed them. For their armour and weapon, be-fide those the fouldiers had, he carried two thousand targets, a great number of bowes and arrowes, of Dions preparadarts, of pikes, and plenty of victuals: that they should lack nothing all the time they were upon tion. the fea, confidering that their journey stood altogether at the courtefie of the winds and fea; and for that they were afraid to land, understanding that Philiftus rode at Anchor in the coast of ApuGLIA,

A Wolf carried away the

with a Fleet of ships that lay in wait for their coming, So having a pleasant gale of wind, they failed the space of twelve days together, and the thirteenth day they came to the foreland of Sttanca the space of twelve days together, and the thirteenth day they came to the toreland of Si-Cile called Pachynus. There the Pilot thought it best they should land presently: for if they wil-lingly looffed into the sa, and lost that point; they were sure they should lose also many nights and days in vain in the midth of the fea, being then Summer time, and the wind at the South. But Dies being afraid to land to near his enemies, he was defirous to go farther, and to past by the foreland of Pa-CHYNUS. Then the Northwind role to big and great, that with great violence it drave back their thips from the coasts of Sicile. Furthermore, lightning and thunder mingled withall (because it was at that time when the Star Arthur w beginneth to shew)it made so terrible a tempest, and powred down fuch a fore shower of rain upon them, that all the Mariners were amazed withall, and knew not whither the wind would drive them, till that fuddenly they faw the ftorm had caft them upon the If the of CERCINA (which is on the coaft of Ly BIA) and specially where it is most dangerous to arrive for the Rocks; for their ships were like to have run upon them, and to have made shipwrack. But with much ado they bare off the ships with their great long potes, and wandred up and down the sea, not knowing whither they went until the storm ceased. Then they met a ship, whereby they knew that they were in the flat, which the Mariners call, The heads of the great S. rte. Thus they wandring up and down, being marvellous angry that the fea was calm, there 5. r.e. 1105 they wanting up and down, being marvinous angry that the sea was cann, there a little South wind from the land, although they leaft looked for any fuch wind at that time, and little thinking it would fo have changed: but feeing the wind rife bigger and bigger, they packed on all the fails they had, and making their prayers unto the gods, they croffed the fea, and failed from the cost of Lybia, directly unto Sicile, and had the wind folucky, that at the fifthday they were near unto a little village of SICILE, called MINOA, the which was subject to the CAR-THAGINIANS. Synalus CARTHAGINIAN, being at that time Captain and Governour of Synatur. Cap the Town of MINOA, and Diens friend, was there by chance at this prefent, who being ignorant of Synatur, cap the rown of retroya, and Dissi thereby was there by that a time pretent, who come growth that of Alinos his enterprife and coming, did what he could to keep Dissi fouldiers from landing. But they not for the Caribae withflanding fuddainly leapt on land armed, but flew no man: for Diss had commanded them the retrieval. contrary, for the friendship he bare the Captain: and they following the Townsmen hard that fled before them, entred the Town hand over head amongst them, and so wan the Market-place. When both the Captains mer, and that they had spoken together, Dion delivered the Town into Synalus hands again, without any hurt or violence offered him. Synalus on the other fide, did endeavour himself all he could to make much of the fouldiers, and holp Dies to provide him of all things necessary. But this did most of all encourage the fouldiers, because Dionysius at their arrival, was not then in Si-CILE: for it chanced fo, that not many days before he went into ITALY with fourfcore faile. Therefore when Dion willed them to remain there a few days to refresh themselves, because they had been fo fore fea beaten a long time together, they themselves would not, they were so glad to imbrace the occasion offered them, and prayed Dion to lead them forthwith to Syracus A. Dion leaving all his fuperfluous armour and provision in the hands of Synalsus, and praying him to fend them to him when time ferved, he took his way towards Syracusa. So by the way, two hundred horfemen of the ARGENT (NES, which dwell in that part called ECNOMUS, came first to joyn with him, and after them, the GELOIANS. The rumour of their coming ran straight to Syracusa; thereupon Timocrates that had married Arete, Diens wife, and Dionylius the fathers fifter, and to whom Dionyfine the younger had left the charge and government of all his men and friends in the City: he prefently dispatched a post with letters , to advertise Diony size of Dions coming. He himself also in the mean time had taken such order, that there rose no tumult nor mutiny in the City, though they all of them lacked no good will to rebel; but because they were uncertain whether this rumor were true or false (being afraid) every man was quiet. Now there chanced a great misfortune unto the mellenger which carried the letters unto Dionysim. For after he had passed the straight, and that he was arrived in the City of RHEG10 of ITALIE fide, making hast to come to the City of CAULONIA, where Dienssia was, he met by the way one of his acquaintance that carried a Mutton but newly facrificed. This good fellow gave him a piece of it, and the mellenger spurred away withall the spread he could possible: but when he had ridden the most part of the night, he was so weary and drowsie for lack of fleep, that he was driven to lye down: fo he lay down upon the ground in a wood hard by the high way. The favour of this flesh brought a Wolf to him that carried away the flesh and the Portmantle it was wrapt in , and in the which also were his letter of advertisement , which he carried unto Disayfus. When he awoke out of his fleep, and faw that his Portmantle was gone, he enquired for it, and went wandring up and down a long time to feek it: howbeit, all in vain, for he could never find it. Therefore he thought it was not good for him to go to the Tyran without his letters, but rather to flie into some unknown place, where no body knewhim. Thus overlate received Dionyliss advertisement by others of this war, which Dion made in SICILE. In the mean time, the CAMARINIANS came and joyned with Dions Army, in the high-way towards Syracusa: and fill there came unto him alfo a number of the Syracusans that were up in Armes, which were gotten into the field. On the other fide, certain CAMPANIANS and LEONTINES, which were gotten into the Castle of EPIPOLES with Timocrates of purpose to keep it, upon a falle rumour Dion gave out (and which came unto them) that he would first go againft their Towns: they for looke Timocrates, and went to take order to defend their own goods.

Dismoderflanding that, being lodged with his Army in a place called MACRA, he prefendly removable for the property of the Company has a dark park. ed his Camp, being dark night, and marched forward till he came unto the River of Anaput, which is not from the City above ten furlongs off : and there ftaying a while, he facrificed unto the River. and made his prayer and worshipped the rising of the Sun. At the self-same instant also, the Soothfayers came and told him, that the gods did promife him affured victory. And the fouldiers also seeing Dien wear a Garland of Flowers on his head, which he had taken for the ceremony of the facrifice, all of them with one felf goodwill took every man of them (being no less then five thoufand men that were gathered together by the way, and but flenderly armed with fuch things as came first to hand; howbeit, supplying with goodwill their want of better furniture and armour:) and when Dion commanded them to march, for joy they ran, and encouraged one another with great cries, to shew themselves valiant for recovery of their liberty. Now for them that were within the City felf of Syracus A, the Noblemen and chief Citizens went to receive them at the Gates, in their best Gowns. The common people on the other side, ran and set upon them that took part with the Tyrant, and spoiled them that were called the PROSAGOGIDES (as much to fay, The with the Tyrant, and ipoiled them that were called the Prosacotories (as much totaly) in Dionyfini pick-common Promooters of men) the detestablest villains, hatefull to the gods and men: for they like thanks flain. Sycophants and bufie tale-bearers, would jet up and down the City, and mingle among the Citizens, having an oar in every mans matter, being foll of prittle prattle, and busic headed, to know what every man faid and did, and then to go carry it to the tyrant. These men were they that had their payment first of all, for they killed them with dry blows, beating them to death with staves. When Timocrates could not enter into the Castle with them that kept it, he took his horse back, and fled out of the City; and flying, made all men afraid and amazed where he came, enlarging Dions power by his report, because it should not feem, that for fear of a trifle, he had for faken the City. In the mean time, Dion came on towards the City with his men, and was come fo near, that they might fee him plainly from the City, marching foremost of all, armed with a fair bright white corfelet, having his brother Megacles on the right hand of him , and Calippus ATHENIAN on the left hand crowned with Garlands of Flowers : and after him also there followed an hundred souldiers that Dion received were strangers, chosen for his guard about him, and the rest came marching after it in good order of into Syracuja. battell, being led by their Captains. The SYRACUSANS faw him coming, and went out and received him as a holy and bleffed procession, that brought them their liberty and popular state again, the which they had loft the space of eight and fourty years. When Dion was come into the City , by Dion refloreth the which they had for the space of eight and tourly years. Which some and the carly soy the Syraculans the gate called Menitide, he caused his trumpeter to found, to appeale the rumour and tumult of the to liberty. people. Then he commanded an Herauld to proclaim aloud: That Dion and Megacles, who were come to put down the tyranny, did fet all the SYRACUSANS at liberty, and all the other SICI-LIA NS also from the bondage and subjection of the tyrant. And because Dion himself was desirous to speak unto the people, he went to the upper part of the Town , called ARCADIAN. The SYRACUSANS, all the streets through as he passed by , had on either hand of him prepared facrifices, and fet up tables and cups upon them: and as he paffed by their houses, they cast flowers and fruits on him, and made prayers unto him, as if he had been a god. Now, under the Castle there was a place called Pentapyla (a clock, to know by the Sun how the day went) the which Dionyfins Dionyfins clock, had caused to be made, and it was of a good pretty height. Dien got up upon it, and from thence made his oration to the people that were gathered round about him, exhorting and perswading his Countrymen to do their endeavour to recover their liberty again, and to maintain it. They being in a marvellous joy withall, and defirous to please Dion , did choose him and his brother Mesacles their Lieutenants General, with absolute power and authority. Afterwards also, by the consent of Dion himself and his brother, and at their requests in like manner, they chose twenty other Captains, of the which the most part of them had been banished by the tyrant, and were returned again with Dion. The Soothfayers and Prognosticatours liked it well, and faid it was a good fign for Dion, that he trode the sumptuous building and workmanship of the tyrant under his teet, when he made his Oration : but because the hand of the Diall did shew the course of the Sun, which newer leaveth going, upon the which he got up when he was chosen Lieutenant General with absolute The predictipower and authority, they were afraid again, that it was a fign Dions affairs should have a suddain ons of the change of fortune. After this, Dion having taken the caftle of EPIPOLES, he fet all the Citizens at liberty, which were kept there as prisoners in captivity by the tyrant, and environed the Caftle round about with a wall. Within feven days after , Dionyfine returned by fea to the Caftle of SYRACUSA, and therewithall also came the Carts loaden with armour and weapons to SYRACUS-SA, which Dien had left with Sinalus: the which Dion caused to be distributed among the Citizens of SYRACUSA that had none. Others did furnish themselves as well as they could, and shewed that they had courage and goodwill to fight for the maintenance and defence of their liberty. In the Dionyflus sent mean time, Dionysius fent Ambassadours, first unto Dion privately, to see if he would yeeld to any Ambassadours composition. But Dien would not hear them, but bade them tell the SYRACUSANS openly unto Dien. what they had to fay, being men that were free, and enjoyed liberty. Then the Ambaffadours spake in the behalf of the tyrant, unto the people of Syracusa, promiting them with mild and gentle words, that they should pay no subsidies and taxes, but very little, and should be no more troubled with wars, other then fuch as they themselves should like of. The SYRACUSANS made a mockery at those offers, and Dion also answered the Ambassadours, and willed Dionisyus to send no more to the SYRACUSANS, before he had disposses himself of his tyranny : and, fo that he would leave it, he would be his mean to obtain all things just and reasonable of the people. Diony sins liked very well of his good offer: and therefore fent his Ambaffadours again to pray the Syracusans, that they would appoint fome amongst them to come to the Castle ; to talk with him for the benefit and commodity of the Common-wealth; that he might hear what they would alledge, and they also what answer lie would make. Dion chose certain whom he sent unto him. Now there ran a rumour in the Cay among the Syracus ans, which came from the Caftle, that Dionyfus would willingly of hindelf, rather then by reason of Dions coming, depose himself of the tyranny. But this was but a falle slarm, and crafty fetch of Dionyfius, to intrap the SYRACUSANS by. For those that were fent him from the City, he kept them prifoners every man of them, and one morning having made his fouldiers drink wine luftily, which he kept in pay to guard his perfon, he fent them with great fury to affault the wall the SYRACUSANS had built againft the Cafele. Now, because the SYRACUSANS looked for nothing lefs, then for the fuddain affault, and for that thefe barbarous people with a wonderfull courage and great tumult overthrew the wall, and others of them also did fer upon the Syracusans, there was not a man of them that durft make head to fight with them, faving the fouldiers that were strangers, whom Dion had brought with him. Who, when they heard thenoile, ran ftraight to repulie them, and yet they themselves could not well tell what they should do upon that fuddain. For they could hear nothing for the great noife and hurly burly of the Syra-CUSANS, which fled with great diforder, and came and mingled themselves amongst them. Till at length, Dion perceiving he could not be heard; to fhew them by deed what they should do, he went first himself against these barbarous people, and about him there was a cruel and bloody fight: for his enemies knew himas well as his own men, and they all ran upon him with great cries. Now for Dien fighteth Dien himself, indeed because of his age, he was heavier then was requisite for one that should away with Dionifus. with the pains of fuch battels: but he had fuch a valiant courage in him, that he went through with all luftily, and flew them that did affail him. Yet he had his hand also thrust through with a pike, and very hardly did his curaces hold out the blows of the darts and thrufts by hand which he received on them, they were fo mangled and hacked with fuch a number of darts and pikes passed through his thield and broken on him, that in the end he was beaten down : howbeit his fouldiers refued him straight. Then he made Timonides their Captain, and he himself took his horseback, and went up and down the City, staying and quieting the flying of the SYRACUSANS. Then he fent for his fouldiers the strangers, which he had put in Garrison in that part of the City called the Acaa-DINE to keep it, and brought them being fresh, against the barbarous people of the Castle that were wearied, and almost all of them discouraged to attempt any further enterprise. For they had made this fally out, in hope to have taken all the City at the first onset, onely running up and down: but when contrary to their expectation, they met these valiant souldiers, and fresh supply, they then began to retire again into the Caftle. And the GRECIAN fouldiers on the other fide, perceiving they gave back, they canie the fafter upon them, fo that they were compelled to turn their backs, and were driven within the walls, after they had flain threefcore and fourteen of Dions men, and lost a great number of their own. This was a noble victory, and therefore the SYRACUSANS gave the fouldiers that were strangers, an hundred filver Minaes, in reward for their good service: and they gave Dion their Generall a crown of gold. After this, there came letters to Dion by a Trumpet from the Caftle, written from the women of his house: and among the packet of letters, there was one of them directed, To my father, the which Hipparinus wrote unto him. For that was Hipparinus, Di. Dient fons name, though Timan writeth he was called Aretem, after his mothers name Arete. But in fuch matters, me thinks Timonides is better to be credited, because he was his friend and companion in arms. All the other letters that were fent, were openly read before the affembly of the Syra-CUSANS , and did onely concern requests of these women unto Dion. The SYRACUSANS would not have the supposed letter of his son to be openly read ; but Dion against their minds open-Dionyfius craft ed it, and found that it was Dionyfius letter; who by words, made the direction of it unto Dion, but in effect, he spake unto the Syracusans. For in sight, it seemed a manner of request and justification of him; but in truth, it was written of purpole to accuse Diem. First of. all, he remembred him of the things he had done before, for the establishing and prefervation of the tyranny; and afterwards, of cruel threats against those whom he should love best, as his wife, his son, and fister: and last of all ; full of most humble requests and intreaties, with forrow and lamentation. But that which most moved Dion of all other, was, that he required him not to destroy the tyranny, but rather to take it for himself, and not to fer them at liberty that hated him, and would always remember the mischief he had done unto them: and that he would himself take upon him to be Lord, saving by that means the lives of their parents and friends. When these letters had been read before the whole affembly of the people, the SYRACUSANS thought not how to reverence (as they ought) with admiration, the inflexible constancy and magnanimity of Dion, that stood firm and fast for justice and verue against such vehement intreaty and perswasion of his Kinssolk and friends: but they constraily began to be afraid, and to mistrust him, as he that of necessity should be forced to pardon the tyrant, for the great pledges and hoftages he had of him. Wherefore, they began to chule them new governours, and the rather, because they heard that Herachides was coming unto them, whom they loved fingularly well. This Heractides was one of them that had been banished, a good fouldier and Captain, and well efteemed of for the charge and office he bare under the tyrants: howbeit, a very was unconstant man in everything, and would not continue long in a mind, and least constant in wars where he had great charge of honour in hand. He had fallen out with Dion in PELOFONNESUS; wherefore he determined to come with a power by himfelf, and with his own Fleet against the tyrant. So he arrived at length in SYRACUSA, with fever. Gallies, and three other Thips: were he found Dionypus again shut up into his Castle with a wall, and the SYRACUSANS also to have the better

Then he began to curry favour with the common people all the ways he could possibly devife, having by nature a certain pleafing manner to win the common people, which feek nothing else but to be flattered. Furthermore, he found it the easier for him to win them, because the people did already millike Dion's feverity, as a man too fevere and cruel to govern a Commonwealth. For they had now their will so much, and were grown so strong headed, because they saw themselves the fronger, that they would be flattered (as commonly the people be in free Cities, where they onely be Lords, and do rule) before they were fully fet at liberty. Therefore first of all, not being called together by the authority of the Governours, they ran in a fury, of their own light heads, unto the place of common affemblies, and there chose Heraclides Admiral. Then Dion understanding this, came The great actions to complain of the injury they had done him, declaring unto them, that to give this power now unto do the Hera-Heraclides, was to take that away which they had first given unto him: because he should no more be elides Admiral General, if they chose any other Admiral by Sea then himself. The SYRACUSIANS then, as it were to spite Dion. against their wills, did revoke the power they had given unto Heraclides: but afterwards Dion fent for Heraclides, to pray him to come home to him. When he came, he rebuked him a little, and told him. it was not honeftly, nor profitably done of him, to fue to the people, and to contend for honour against him in so dangerous a time, when the least occasion in the world was enough to have marred all. Afterwards, Dion himself called an affembly again of the City, and established Heraclides Admiral: and perswaded the Citizens to give him souldiers, as he had indeed. Heraclides outwardly seem- Heraclides. ed to honour Dion, and confessed openly that he was greatly bound unto him, and was at his heels very diffembler, pralowly, being ready at his commandment : but in the mean time ; secretly he inticed the common Etising to make people to rebell, and to stir up those whom he knew meet men to like of change. Whereby he the people reprocured Dion such trouble, and brought him into such perplexity, that he knew not well which way Dion. to take. For, if he gave them advice to let Dionysius quietly come out of the Castle, then they accufed, and faid, he did it to fave his life: if on the contrary fide, because he would not trouble them, he continued siege still, and established nothing; then they thought he did it of purpose to draw out the Wars in length, because he might the longer time remain their Chieftain general, and to to keep the Citizens longer in fear. At that time there was one Sofis in Syracus A, a man of sofis a wicked no name, but noted among the SYRA CUSIANS for his villany and wickedness, effeeming that full man, moveth and ample liberty, when he might unchecked licentiously speak what he would, as indeed he did. sedition against For he seeking to do Dion a displeasure, first of all one day at a common Counsel he stood up on his Dion. feet, and called the Syracusians beafts (amongst many other vile words he gave them) if thew did not perceive, that being come from a fond and drunken tyranny, they had now received a fober mafter, and a wife wary Tyrant. So when he had thus openly shewed himself an enemy unto Dion, he came that day no more into the Market-place; but the next morning he was feen running up and down the City naked, his head and face all of a gore blood, as if he had been followed of men to have flain him. Thus Sofis, coming in this manner into the middeft of the Market-place, cried out that Dion's strangers had lain in wait for him, and had handled him in this fort, shewing his wound on his head. Many of the people took this matter very grievously, and cryed out upon Dion, and faid it was vilely and tyrannically done of him, by fear of murther and danger, to take away the liberty from the Citizens to speak. Now, though the whole affembly hereupon fell into an uproar withall: Dion notwithstanding came thither to clear himself of these accusations, and made them presently see, that this Softs was brother to one of Dionysius guard . who had put into his head, in Dion cleareth this fort to put the City of Syracus a in an uproar, because Dionysius had no other hope nor Sosisaccusation mean to escape, but by stirring up faction and sedition among them, to make one of them fall our against him. with another. The Chirurgions were fent for forthwith to fearch the wound of this Sofis: who found that it was rather a little scratch, then any violent wound given him. For the wounds or cuts of a fword, are ever deepest in the midst: and Sosis cut was but very little, and not deep, having had many beginnings, and given him (as it feemed) at fundry times, but for very pain, the party that cut him, was driven to leave off, and came to cut him at divers times. Furthermore, there came certain of his friends in the mean time, that brought a razor before the affembly, and reported that as they came, they met Sofis by the way all bloodied: who faid that he fled from Dions fouldiers, which had but newly hurt him. Whereupon they prefently followed them, but found no man; and onely they faw a razor, which some body had cast upon a hollow stone thereabouts, where they first faw him coming unto them. Thus, Sofis device had but evil fuccess. For besides all these proofs and tokens. Dion's houshold servants came to be witness against him, that very early in the morning he went abroad alone with a razor in his hand. Then they that before did burden and accuse Dion, knew not what to fay to the matter, but shrunk away : whereupon the people condemning Sofis to Sofis condemndeath, they were quiet again with Dion. Yet were they alwaies afraid of these souldiers that were ed to death. strangers, specially when they saw the greatest conflicts they had with the Tyrant, was by sea, after that Philiftus was come from the coast of Apuglia with a great number of Galleys to aid the Tyrant. For then they thought, that these souldiers (the strangers) being armed at all parts to fight by land, they would do him no more service by sea: because the Citizens themselves were they that kept them in safety, for that they were men practifed to fight by sea, and were also the stronger by means of their ships. But beside all this the onely thing that made them to be couragious again, was the good fortune they had at the Battle by Sea, in the which when they had overcome Philistus, they cruelly and barbarously used him. Truly Ephorus faith, that Philistus slew himself, when he

faw his Galley taken. Howbeit Timonides (who was alway with Dion from the first beginning of this War) writing unto Speufppus the Philotopher, faith: that Philiffus was taken alive, because his Galley ran aland : and that the SYRACUSIANS first took off his Curaces, and stripped Philips flain, him naked, and after they had done him all the villany and spite they could, they cut off his head, and gave his body unto boys, commanding them to drag it into that part of the City called Aand gave in body and boys, commanding the common privy. Timens also to spite him the more, faith that the boys and the dead body by his lame leg, and fo dragged him up and down the City, where that the boys an incurate body by the latter tegs, and to design and to fee him dragged by where all the Syracusians did what villany to it they could, being glad to fee him dragged by the leg, that had faid: Dienysim should not fly from the tyranny upon a light horse, but that they should pall him out by the leg against his will. Now Philiftus reporteth this matter thus: not as spoken to Dionysiss by himself, but by some other. But Timens taking a just occasion and colour to speak evil of the good will, fidelity, and care that Philifins had always feemed to shew in the confirmation and defence of the tyranny, doth liberally befrow injurious words on him in this place. Now for them, whom he had indeed offended, if they of malice and spite to be revenged, did offer him cruelty, peradventure they were not much to be blamed; but for them that fince his death have written the guells, who were never offended by him in his life time, and who ought to shew themselves discreet in their writing, methinks that if they had regarded their own credit and estimation, they should not so fondly and outragiously have reproved the advertities and misfortunes, which by Fortune may as well chance to the honestest man, as unto him. Thus fondly did Ephotus praise Philistus, who although he have an excellent fine wit to counterfeit goodly excuses, and cunningly to hide wicked and dishonest parts, and eloquently to devise by honest words to defend an evil cause: yet cannot be with all the fine wit he hath, excuse himself, that he hath not been the onely man of the world that hath most favoured Tyrants, and that hath ever loved, and specially defired power, wealth, and alliance with Tyrants. But he (in my opinion) taketh the right course of an Historiographer, that neither doth commend Philift and doings, nor yet cafteth his adverficies in his teeth to his reproach. After Philistus death, Dionzsius sent unto Dion, to make an offer to deliver him the Caftle, armour, munition, and fouldiers that were in it, with money also to pay them for five moneths space. For himself, he prayed that he might be suffered to go safely into ITALY, and to lie there, to take the pleasure of the fruits of the Countrey called GYARTA, which was within the territory of Syracusa, and lieth our from the Seatowards the main land. Dion refused this ofter, and answered the Ambassadors, that they must move the SYRACUSIANS in it. They supposing they should easily take Dionyfins alive, would not hear the Ambassadors speak, but turned them away. Dionysins seeing no other remedy, left the Castle in the hands of his eldest fon Apollocrates, and having a lusty gale of Dionflat Byeth wind, he fecretly imbarked certain of his men he loved beft, with the richeft things he had, and so from Syraelfs hoiled fail, unawares to Heraclides, the Admirall of Syraecusa. The people were marvellously Apauerates of offended with Heraclides for it, and began to mutiny against him. But Heraclides, to pacific this the decition of turnult of the people, fuborned one Hippon an Orator, who preferred the law Agraria unto the people, for the division of all the Island amongst them: and that the beginning of liberty was equality and of bondage poverty, unto them that had no lands. Heraclides giving his confent to this decree, and fittring the common people to fedition against Dion, that withstood it: perswaded the Syracusians, not onely to confirm the law Hippon had propounded, but also to discharge the hired strangers, to chufe other Captains and Governours, and rid themselves of Dion's severe Government. But they supposing straight to have been rid from the tyranny, as from a long and grievous fickness, over rashly taking upon them, like people that of long time had been at liberty, they utterly undid themselves, and overthrew Dion's purpose: who like a good Physician was carefull to fee the City well ordered and governed. So when they were affembled to chuse new Officers in the Signs appear middeft of Summer, there fell such horrible thunders, and other terrible ftorms, and unfortunate ing to the $7.4- figns in the Element, that for the space of fifteen days together, the people were still scattered and dispersed when they were assembled: insomuch, that being afraid of these signs above, they durst not at that time create any new Captains. Certain days after, as the Orators had chosen a fair time to proceed to the election of Officers, an Ox drawing in a Cart (being daily acquainted with every fight and noise) suddenly without any occasion offered, fell into a madnels against the Carter that drave him, and breaking his yoke asunder, ran straight to the Theatre, and there made the people run into every corner, to fly and fave themselves: and then flinging, and bearing all down before him that stood in his way, he ran through as much of the City, as the enemies afterwards wan of them. This norwithflanding, the SYRACUSIANS making light account of all these signs, they chose five and twenty Captains, of the which Heraclides was one: and fecretly they fent to feel the hired fouldiers, to fee if they could entice them from Dion, to cause them to take their part, and made them large promises to make them free men (as themfelves) of SYRACUSA. The fouldiers would not be entitled from him; but faithfully and lovingly took Dien amongst them with their Armour and Weapons : and putting him in the middest of their small number; and because they did not first set upon them, but trusting on the other side to themselves, for that they were the greater number, they came to affail them, supposing they should eafily overcome them in the City, and kill every man of them. Dion being thus in a straight, that of necessity he must fight against his own Countreymen, or else be slain himself with his souldiers, he

Dion dessreeth them, led him in this manner out of the City, and did no man hurt, but reproved their unthankfulout of Syracula nels and villany unto all those they met by the way. Then the Syracus I and despiting them for held up his hands to the SYRACUSIANS, and very earneftly prayed them to be contented, pointing them with his finger to the Castle that was full of their enemies, which shewed themselves upon the walls, and faw what they did. In the end, when he faw that he could not pacific their fury and tumult. and that all the City was in an uproar with the prittle practle of these seditious people, who were carried like the fea with the wind, he did yet forbid his fouldiers to give any charge upon them; who notwithstanding made a countenance with great cries, and rattling of their harness, as if they had meant to have run on them. Then the SYRACUSIANS durft not abide by it, but ran away like The cowardlistheop through the streets no man chasing them, So Dion called back again his men, and led them nels of the Sydirectly into the Countrey of the LEONTINES. Then the new Officers and Governors of Syra- racufants Cusa, perceiving the women laughed them to fcorn: because they would recover the same they had loft, they armed their men anew, and marched after Dion to fight with him; whom they overtook at a River, as he was ready to pass over. Then began their horfemen a little to skirmish with Dions company: but when they saw he did no more bear with their faults for Countries sake but frowned indeed upon them, and fet his men in battle ray against them: they turned their backs again, with more fhame and reproach then before, and fo fled unto the City of Syracusa, and had not many of their men flain. The LEONTINES received Dion very honourably, took the strangers his fouldiers, The Leontines gave them pay, and made them free Citizens with them: and fent Ambaffadors also unto the Syra- dorective Dion GUSIANS, to will them to let the strangers have their pay. The SYRACUSIANS on their fide also, fent Ambaffadors unto the LEONTINES to accuse Dion. So all their confederates were affembled in the City of the LEONTINES; and in that affembly, after both parties had been heard, to hear what they would fay, it was judged: that the SYRACUSIANS were to blame. Howbeit, they would not stand to the judgement of their confederates, for they were now grown proud and carelefs, because they were governed by no man, but had Captains that studied to please them, and were afraid also to difplease them. After that, there arrived certain Galleys of Dionysius at Syracusa, of the which Nypfins Neapolitan was Captain: which brought victuals and money, to help them that were befieged within the Castle. These Galleys were fought with, and the SYRACUSIANS obtained victory, and took four of the Tyrants Galleys with three banks of Oars a piece : howbeit they fondly abused their victory. For they having no body to command or rule them, employed all their joy in rioting and banquetting, and in fond and diffolute meetings, taking so little care and regard to their business, that Thenegligence now when they thought the Castle was sure their own, they almost lost their City. For Nypsius and troubles of perceiving that every part of the City was out of order, and that the common people did nothing the Syracufant. all day long unto dark night, but bib and drink drunk, dancing after their Pipes and Howboys and that the Governors themselves were very glad also to see such feasting, or else for that they disfembled it, and durst not command and compell them that were drunk : he wifely took the occasion offered him, and scaled the wall which had shut up the Castle, and wan it, and overthrew it. Then he fent the barbarous fouldiers into the City, and commanded them to do with them they met, what they would or could. The SYRACUSIANS then too late found their fault, and hardly gave present remedy, they were so amazed and suddenly set on: for indeed they made a right sack of the City. Here men were killed, there they overthrew the wall; in another place they carried away women and little children Prisoners into the Castle, weeping and crying out : and lastly, they made the Captains at their wits end, who could give no prefent order, nor have their men to ferve them against their enemies, that came hand over head on every fide amongst them. The Cina being thus milerably in garboil, and the ACRADINE also in great hazard of taking, in the which they put all their hope and confidence to rife again: every man thought then with himself, that Dion must be fent for, but yet no man moved it notwithstanding, being ashamed of their unthankfulness and over great folly they had committed, in driving him away. Yet necessiry enforcing them unto it, there were certain of the horsemen and of their consederates that cryed, that they must send for Dion and the PELOPONNESIANS his fouldiers, which were with him in the territory of the LEONTINES. As foon as the word was heard, and that one had the heart to tell it to the people, all the SYRACUSI-ANS cried out, There was the point : and they were fo glad of it, that the water stood in their eyes for joy, and belought the gods it would please them to bring him unto them, they were so desirous to have him again. For they called to mind how valiant and resolute he was in danger, and how that he was never afraid, but did encourage them with his manhood, in fuch fort, that being led by him, they were not afraid to fet upon their Enemies. So the Confederates of them, fent prefently Archo- The Strumfians mides and Telefides unto him : and the Noblemen that ferved on Horfeback, they fent him also five a- do fend for Dimonght them, beside Hellanicus. Who took their Horses, and posted for life, so that they came on again. unto the Ciry of the LEONTINES about Sun-fet : and lighting off from their horses, they went first of all and kneeled down at Dions feet, and weeping, told him the miserable state of the SYRACUSTENS: Straight there came divers of the LEONTINES, and many of the PELOPON-NESTAN fouldiers unto Dion (mistrusting then there were some news in hand) to see the earnest and humble fuit the Ambaffadors of Syracus a made unto him. Wherefore Dion took them prefently with him, and brought them himself into the Theatre, where the common councils and affemblies of the City were holden: thither ran every man to hear what the matter was. Then Archo-nides and Hellanicus brought in by Dion, told openly before the water affembly, the greatness of Dions Orstion nides and Hellanicus brought in by Dion, told openly before the ware allentity, the greatest of unto his foul-their milery, and requested the hired fouldiers to come and aid the Syracus IANS, forgetting diers, persuadthe injury they had received: confidering, that they had more dearly payed for their folly, then ing them to aid they thenselves (whom they had fo injured) would have made them to have suffered. When the Syracofiars unty man their minus, there was a great mane an angular the mane. and their him to fpeak; where and began to fpeak. But the great sears that fell from his eyes would not fuffer him to fpeak; wherefore the hired fouldiers being forry to fee him weep, prayed him not to trouble himself, but to be of good courage. Then Dion letting go the forrow and grief he had conceived, began to fpeak unto them good courage. Then Dien letting go the forrow and grief he had conceived, began to speak unto them this manner. "My Lords of PELOPONNESUS, and you also the Confederates: I have called you regether to consult with you, what you should do. For my self, it were no honestly for me to consult what I should do now, when the City of Syracusa standeth in perill me to consult what I should do now, when the City of Syracusa standeth in perill of destruction: and therefore if I cannot save it from destruction, yet at the least I will bury my self of destruction: "in the fire and ruine of my Countrey. But for you, if it please you once more to help us, unadvised "and most unfortunate people, you shall by your means set the poor distressed City of Syra-"CUSA again on foot, which is your deed. Or if it be fo, that remembring the injuries the SYRA-"CUSTANS have offered you, you will fuffer it to be destroyed : yet I beseech the gods, that at the "leaft they will require your valiantness, fidelity and good love you have born me untill this prefeat, "befeeching you to remember Dion, who neither forfook you at any time when you have been in-" jured, nor his Countreymen, when they were in trouble. So going on ftill with his tale, the mercenary strangers stepped forth with great notic, and prayed him to lead them to aid SYRACUSA. Then the Ambalfadors that were fent from the SYRACUSIANS falured and embraced them, and prayed the gods to blefs Dion and them, with all the good hap that might be. So when all was whifth and quiet, Dion willed them forthwith to go and prepare themselves, and that they should be there ready armed after supper, determining the very same night to go to aid Syracus A. But now at Syracus A, while day light lafted, Dionyfine Souldiers and Captains did all the mischief and villany they could in the City, and when night came, they retired again into the Castle, having lost very few of their men. Then the feditious Governors of the SYRACUSIANS took heart again unto them, hoping that the enemiss would be contented with that they had done : and therefore began anew to perfusade the Citizens to let Dion alone, and not to receive him with his mercenary fouldiers if they came to aid him, faying that they themselves were honester men then the strangers, to fave their City, and to defend their liberty without help of any other. So, other Ambassadors were fent again unto Dion; some from the Captains and Governors of the City, to flay them that they should not come; and other also from the horfemen, and noble Citizens his friends to haften his journey: whereupon by reason of this variance, Dion marched very foftly at his cafe. Now by night, Dion's enemies within the City got to the Gates, and kepr them that Dion should not come in. Nypfins on the other side made a fally out of the Casile, with his mercenary fouldiers, being better appointed, and a greater number of them then before: and with them be ftraight plucked down all the wall which they had built before the Caftle, and ran and facked the City. At this fally out of the Castle, they did not onely kill the men they met, but women and little children also, and stayed no more to spoil, but to destroy and put all to havock. For, because Dionylins law that he was brought to a straight and desperate case, he bare such mortal malice against the Syracus IANS, that fith there was no remedy but that he must needs forgo his tyranny, he determined to bury it with the utter deftruction and defolation of their City. And therefore to prevent Dion's aid, and to make a quick dispatch to destroy all, they came with burning Torches in their hands, and did fet fire on all things they could come to : and farther off, they fired their darts and Syracula let on arrows, and bestowed them in every part of the City. So, they that fled for the fire, were met withall, fireby Dinnyfast ouddiers.

and fell down upon them that by force of fire: for there were a number of houses that were on fire, and fell down upon them that went and came. This mifery was the chiefest cause why all the SYRACUSIANS agreed together to set open the gates unto Dion. For when Dion heard by the way, that Dionysius fouldiers were gone again into the Caftle, he made no great hafte to march forward : but when day was broken, there came certain horfemen from Syracusa unto Dion, who brought him news that the enemies had once again taken the City. Then also came other of his enemies unto him, and prayed him to make hafter. Now their milery enere sing, fill, and they being brought into hard flate, Heractidas first fent his brother unto Dien, and then Theodotus his Uncle, to pray him to come quickly and help them: for now there was no man left to refift the enemies, because he himself was hurt, and the City also was in manner clean burnt and destroyed. When these men came to Dion, he was yet about threescore furlongs from the Town. So he told his mercenary fouldiers the danger that the Town was in, and having encouraged them, he led them no more fair and foftly, but running towards the City, and meeting messengers one in anothers neck as he went, that prayed him to make all the possible speed be could. By this means the fouldiers marching with wonderfull speed and good will together, he entred the Gates of the City at a place called Hecasompedon. First of all, he fent the lightest armed he had against the enemies, to the end that the SYRACUSIANS seeing them, they might take good heart again to them, whilft he himself in the mean time did fet all the other heavy armed fouldiers and Citizens that came to joyn with them in battle ray, and did caft them into divers squadrons, of greater length and breadth; and appointed him that should have the leading of them, to the end that setting upon the enemies in divers places together, they should put them in greater fear and terror. When he had fet all things in this other, and made his prayer unto the gods, and that they faw him marching through the City against them demises: then there role such a common noise and rejoycing, and great flout of the souldiers, mingled with yows, prayers, and perfections of the SYRACUSIANS, that they called Distriction and and sustains and the presentation solutions and fellow Citithey called Dion their god and faviour, and the mercenary fouldiers their brethren and fellow Citizens. Furthermore, there was not a Syracus IAN that to much regarded his own life and perfon, but he seemed to be more afraid of the loss of Dion onely, then of all the rest. For they saw him the foremost man running through the danger of the fire, treading in blood, and upon dead bodies that lay Dions fight in flain in the midst of the streets. Now indeed to charge the enemies, it was a marvellous dangerous the City of syenterprise: for they were like mad beafts, and stood beside in battle ray along the wall which they had racinfa. overthrown, in a very dangerous place, and hard to win. Howbeit, the danger of the fire, did most of all trouble and amaze the strangers, and did stop their way, for on which side soever they turned them. the houses round about them were all on a fire, and they were driven to march over the burnt timber of the houses, and to run in great danger of the walls of the house sides that fell on them, and to pass through the thick smoak mingled with dust, and beside to keep their ranks with great difficulty. And when they came to affail the enemies, they could not come to fight hand to hand, but a few of them in number, because of the straightness of the place: howbeir, the Syracusians with force of cries and shouts, did so animate and incourage their men, that at length they drave Nypsius and his men to Nypsius comfor fake the place. The most part of them got into the Castle, being very near unto them : the other pelled by Dion that could not get in in time, fled firaglingly up and down, whom the GRECIAN fouldiers flew, to fly into the chafing of them. The extremity of the time did not prefently fuffer the conquerors to reap the fruit of their victory, neither the joys and embracings meet for fo great an exploit. For the SYRA CUSIANS went every man home to his own house, to quench the fire, the which could scarcely be put out all the night. When day brake, there was none of these seditious flatterers of the people that durst tarry in the City, but condemning themselves, they fled to take their fortune. Heraclides and Theodotus came together of their own good wills to yield themselves unto Dion, confessing that they had done him wrong, and humbly praying him to flew himfelf better unto them, then they had shewed themselves unto him, and that it was more honourable for him, being every way unmatchable for his vertues, to shew himself more noble to conquer his anger, then his unthankfull enemies had done : who contending with him before in vertue, did now confets themselves to be far inserior unto him. This was the fum and effect of Heraclides and Theodotus submission unto Dion. But his friends did perswade him not to pardon two such wicked men, who did malice and envy his honour: and as he would do the strangers his souldiers any pleasure, that he should put Heraclides into their hands, to root out of the Commonwealth of Syracusa, his vile manner to flatter and curry favour with root out of the Commonweath of Syracus A, and such assistant to make and curry tarous want the people, the which was as dangerous and great a plague to a City, as the tyranny. Dion pacify. his enemies, ing them, answered: Other Generals of Armies, faid be, do employ all their wits in martial exercises and the great and the and wars: but for himself, that he had of long time studied and learned in the School of the Aca-profit he took demy, to overcome anger, envy, and all malice and contention: the noble proof whereof is most by study, in the feen, not in using honest men and his friends moderately, but in shewing mercy also unto his ene- Academy at mies, and forgetting his anger against them that have offended him; and that for his part, he had rather overcome Heraclides, not in riches and wildom, but in clemency and justice; for therein chiefly confifted excellency, fith no man else in wars can challenge power and government, but fortune that ruleth most. And though Heraclides, said he, through envy hath done like a wicked man, must Dion therefore through anger blemish his vertue? Indeed by mans law it is thought meeter to revenge an injury offered, then to do an injury : but nature sheweth, that they both proceed of one felf imperfection. "Now though it be a hard thing to change and alter the evil disposition of a man, No man should "after he is once nuzled in villany: yet is not man of fo wild and brutish a nature, that his wickedness be worse by an "may not be overcome with often pleasures, when he feeth that they are continually shewed him. Di- others wickedon answering his friends thus, he forgave Heraelides; and beginning again to shut up the Castle with ness. a wall round about, he commanded the SYRACUSIANS every man of them to cut down a stake, and to bring it thither. So when night was come, fetting his fouldiers the strangers in hand withall, whilst the Syracusians slept and took their ease, by morning he had compassed the Castle round about with a pale. The next day, they that faw the greatness and sudden expedition of this work, wondered much at it, as well the enemies, as also the Citizens: and when they had buried the dead bodies, and redeemed them that were taken prisoners (which were not much less then two thousand persons) he called a Common Council of the City, in the which Heraclides made a motion, that Dion should be chosen General of Syracus A, with absolute power and authority both by Sea and Land. The chiefest men of the City liked very well of it, and would have had the people to have passed it. The froward-But the rabble of the Mariners, and other mechanical people living by their labour, would not fuffer ness of the Sy-Heraclides to be put from his Admiralship, but sell to mutiny, thinking that though Heraclides rates and no did them no pleafure elfe, yet he would ever be a more popular man then Dion, and pleafe the common gainft Dion; people better. Dion granted their defire, and made Heraclides Admiral again of the Sea: howbeit he did anger them as much another way, when he did not onely reject the earnest suit they made to have the Law Agraria pass for division of lands in equality amongst them, but did also cancel and revoke all that had been done before. Wherefore Heraclides remaining at Messing, began Heraclides at thenceforth to enter into new practiles again, and to flatter the fouldiers and featfaring men he had gain flirreth brought thither with him, and to stir them up against Dion, saying that he would make himself up the Syracu-Tyrant: and himself in the mean time secretly practifed with Dionysius, by means of a Spar. Just to rebell TAN called Pharax. The noblest men of the Syracusians mistrusted it, and thereupon there fell out great mutiny in their Camp, whereby also followed great famine in Syracusa: fo that Dion was at fuch a straight, that he could not tell what to say to it, and was reproved of all his friends for that he had again preferred so great authority against himself, to so untractable a man, and so

nearunto to the City of NAPLES, in the marches of the AGRIGENTINES, Dion did bring the Army of the SYRACUSIANS into the field, being yet determined not to fight with him till another time. But through Heraclides, and the Seamens crying out, that faid, he would not try this War by Battle, but would draw it out in length, because he would be still General, he was forced to give Battle, and lost it. Howbeir, the overthrow was not great, and happened rather because his men were at a jar among themselves by reason of their faction and division, then otherwise. Dion therefore prepared to fight another Battle, and gathered his men together again, encouraging them, when even at twi-light word was brought him, that Heraclides with all his Fleet was under fail towards Syracus A, meaning to take the City, and to shut Dion and his Army out of it. Wherefore he presently took with him the chiefest men of authority in the City, and the most willingest men, and rode all night with them in such haste, that they were at the Gates of SYRACUSA the next morning by nine of the Clock, having ridden feven hundred furlongs. Heraclides that had failed with all the possible fpeed he could, to prevent him with his ships, perceiving that he came short, he turned fail, and taking Gafilas Late- Seasat all adventure, by chance he met with Gafylus LACED. EMONIAN, who told him he was fent d. monitation from Laced & Mon, to be General to the Sicilians in this War, as Gylippus was fent at other times besore. He was glad he had met with him to have such a remedy and desence against Dion, and boulted of it unto the Friends and Confederates of SYRACUSA, and fent an Herauld before unto the SYRACUSIANS, fummoning them to receive Gafylus LACED. MONIAN, who was fent to be their General. Dion made answer: That the SYRACUSIANS had Governours enough; and though that their affairs did of necessity require a LACEDEMONIAN Captain, yet that himself was he; for that he was made free in SPARTA. Then Geffins perceiving he could not obtain to be General, he went unto SYRACUSA, and came to Dign, and there made Heraclides and him friends again by the great and folemn Oaths he made: and because Gafylus also did swear, that he himself would be revenged of him for Dions fake, and punish Heraclides it ever after he did once more conspire against him. After that, the SYRACUSIANS brake up their Army by Sea, because it did them no service, and was beside chargeable keeping of it, and further did also breed sedition and trouble amongst their Governours: and so went to lay straighter siege to the Castle then ever they did; and built up the wall again, which the enemies had overthrown. Then Dionysius fon seeing no aid to come to him from any part, and that victuals failed them; and further, that the fouldiers began to mutiny being unable to keep them, he fell to a composition with Dion, and delivered up the Castle into his hands, with all the armour and munition in it: and to took his mother and his fifters of Dion, and put them aboard upon five Galleys, with the which he went unto his father, through the fafe conduct of Dion. There was not a man at that time in all Syracusa, but was there to fee this fight; or if by chance there were any absent, the other that were there, called them thither as loud as they could cry, saying: That they did not fee the goodlieft day and Sunshine, which the City of SYRACUSA might fee then at her rifing, the fame being now restored again to her former liberty. If untill this present day they do reckon the slying of Dionysius for one of the rarest examples of fortunes change, as one of the greatest and notablest things that ever was : what joy (think we) had they that drave him out, and what pleafure had they with themselves, that with the least mean that could be possible, did destroy the greatest tyranny in the world? So when Apollocrates (Dionysius son) was imbarked, and that Dion was entred into the Caftle, the women within the Castle would not tarry till he came into the house, but went to meet him at the gates; Aristomache leading Diens fon in her hand, and Arete following her weeping, but very fearfull how fhe should call and salute her husband, having lain with another man. Dion first spake to his fifter, and afterwards to his fon : and then Ariftomache offering him Arete, faid unto him : "Since thy "banilhment O Dion, we have led a miferable and captive life, but now that thou are returned home " with victory, thou hast rid us out of care and thraldom, and hast also made us again bold to liftup our "heads, faving her here, whom I (wretched creature) have by force (thy felf alive) feen married unto another man. Now then, fith fortune hath made thee Lord of us all, what judgement giveft thou " of this compulsion ? How wilt thou have her to falute thee ? asher Uncle or husband ? As Aristo-Syracuja.

Diontskethhis mache spake these words, the water stood in Dions eyes: so he gently and lovingly taking his Wise Arete by the hand, he gave her his son, and willed her to go home to his house where he then remaingain which had ed, and fo delivered the Caftle to the Syracusians. He having this profperous fuccels and victory, would not reap any present benefit or pleasure thereby, before he had shewed himself thankfull to his friends, giving great gifts also unto the Confederates of SYRACUSA, and specially before he had given every one of his friends in the City, and his mercenary fouldiers the strangers, some honourable reward according to their deferts, exceeding his ability with magnanimity of mind : when he himself lived soberly, and kept a moderate diet, contenting him with any thing that came first to hand. Every man that heard of it, wondered at him, confidering that not onely all SICILE and CAR-THAGE, but generally all GREECE looked upon his great prosperity and good fortune, thinking no man living greater then he, northat any Captain ever attained unto fuch fame and wonderfull fortune as he was come unto. This notwithst inding, Dion lived astemperately and modestly in his apparel, and also in his number of servants, and service at his board, as if he had lived with Plato in the Academy at ATHENS, and had not been conversant among fouldiers and Captains, which have no other comfort nor pleasure for all the pains and danger they suffer continually, but to eat and drink their fill, and to take their pleasure all day long. Plato wrote unto him, that all the world had him in admiration. But Dion, in my opinion, had no respect but to one place, and to one City, to wit, the Academy, and would have no other Judges nor lookers into his doings, but the scholars of the same : who neither wondred at his great exploits, valiantness, nor victory, but onely considering if he did wisely and modeltly use the fortune he had, and could so keep himself within modelt bounds, having done fo great things. Furthermore, touching the gravity he had when he spake to any body, and his inflexible severity which he used towards the people, he determined never to alter or change it : notwithstanding that his affairs required him to shew courtesie and lenity, and that Plato also reproved him for it, and wrote, that feverity and obstinacy (as we faid before) was the companion of folitariness, But it feemeth to me that Dion did use it for two respects. The first, because nature had not framed him courteous and affable to win men: fecondly, he did what he could to draw the Syracus I and to the contrary; who were over licentious, and spoiled with too much flattery. For Heraclides began again to Heraclide combe busic with him. First of all, Dion sending for him to come to councill, he sent him word he would by there again not come: and that being a private Citizen, he would not be at the common counsell amongst others "gainst Dion." when any was kept. Afterwards he accused him, for that he had not overthrown and razed the Castle: and also because he would not suffer the people to break open the tomb of Dionysius the elder, to cast out his body : and also because he sent for Counsellors to Corinan, and distained to make the Citi- Dion sent to zenshis companions in the Government of the Commonwealth. And for that purpose he thought the CORINTHI- stocratia. The murther of Heraclides was wealth of the much milliked of the SYRACUSIANS, howbeit Dion cauled him to be honourably buried, and brought his hady to the ground followed with all his Army. Then have do so Owning him clift, and brought the murther of his body to the ground, followed with all his Army. Then he made an Oration himself to the people, Heracides, and told them that it was impossible to avoid sedition and trouble in the City, so long as Dion and He- Callippus, Aractides did both govern together. At that time there was one Callippus an ATHENIAN, a familiar thenian, con of Dions, who (as Plato faith) came not acquainted with Dion through the occasion of his study in spireth against Philosophy, but because he had been his guide to bring him to see the secret mysteries and ceremonies Dion. of the facrifices, and for such other like common talk and company. This notwithstanding, Callippus did accompany him in all this War, and was very much honoured of him, and was one of the first of all his friends that entred into Syracus a with him, and did valiantly behave himself in all the battles and conflicts that were fought. This Callippus seeing that Dions best and chiefest friends were slain in this War, and that Heraclides also was dead, that the people of SYRA CUSA had no more any head, and besides, that the fouldiers which were with Dion did love him better then any other man: he became the unfaithfullest man, and the veriest villain of all other, hoping that for his reward to kill his friend Dion, he should undoubtedly come to have the whole Government of Sicile ; and as some do report, for that he had taken a bribe of his Enemies of twenty talents, for his labour to commit this murther. So he began to practife, to bribe and to suborn certain of the mercenary fouldiers against Dion, Note the lub. and that by a marvellous crafty and subtle fetch. For, using commonly to report unto Dion certain fe-tilty of taleditious words spoken peradventure by the fouldiers indeed, or else devised of his own head, he wan besters, fuch a liberty and boldness by the trust Dion had in him, that he might safely say what he would to any of the fouldiers, and boldly fpeak evil of Dion by his own commandment: to the end he might thereby understand the better, whether any of his fouldiers were angry with him, or wished his death. By this policy, Callippus straight found out those that bare Dion grudge, and that were already corrupted, whom he drew to his confipracy. And if any man unwilling to give ear unto him, went and told Dion, that Callippus would have inticed him to confipre against him, Dion was not angry with him for it, thinking that he did but as he had commanded him to do. Now as this treason was practifing against Dion, there appeared a great and monftrous Ghoft or Spirit unto him. By chance fitting late one even- A spirit sping all alone in a Gallery he had, and being in a deep thought with himfelf, fuddenly he heard a noise: peareduned and therewith casting his eye to the end of his Gallery (being yet day light) he saw a monstrous great Dion. woman, like one of the furies shewed in Plays, and saw her sweeping of the house with a broom. This vision so amazed and affrighted him, that he sent for his friends, and told them what a sight he had seen: and prayed them to tarry with him all night, being as it were a man befide himself, fearing left the spirit would come to him again if they left him alone, of the which notwithstanding he never heard more afterwards. Howbeit shortly after, his son being grown to mans state, for a certain light anger he had taken when he was but a boy, he cast himself headlong down from the top of the house, and so was slain. he death of Dion being in this state, Callippus went on still with his treason, and spread a rumour abroad among the Dions son, SYRACUSIANS, that Dion feeing himself now deftitute of children, was determined to fend for Apollogance erates, Dionysius son, to make him his heir and successor, being Cousin-German to his wife, and his Dionysius. fifters daughters fon. Then began Dion his wife, and fifters to miftruft Callippus practiles, and they were told it by divers and manifest proofs. But Dion being forry (as I suppose for Heraclides death

Callippus then feeing the women to buffe and inquifitive of his doings, and fearing left he should be bewrayed, he came weeping unto them, and told them, it was nothing, and that he was ready to affure them of it by any manner of way they would devile. The women then willed him to fwear by the great Oath, which was in this manner. He that mult take this Oath, cometh into the temple of the goddeffes Thefmophore; The great onth whits manner. He that mult take this Oath, cometh into the temple of the goddeffes The smooth on the purple chapter of othe 39-scoff which are, General and Proferpina: and after certain factifices done, he putteth on the purple chapter of othe 39-scoff which are the same of the the goddels Proferpina, holding a burning torch in his hand, and sweareth in this manner. Callippus having done all thele ceremonies, and made the Oath in form as I have told you, he made folight account of the goddeffes, that he tarried no longer to do the murther he had determined, but till the very feaft day of the goddels should come, by whom he had sworn : and slew him on the day of the feaft of Proferpina. Now, 1 do not think that he chose that day of set purpose, knowing right well that he did Dion Hain by a rejection. And the second time foreer he had killed his brother, being by his means specially admitted callingua Aire always fin against her, what time foreer he had killed his brother, being by his means specially admitted to the fociety and brotherhood with him, of the fraternity and mysteries of Ceres and Proferpina. Of this confpiracy there were divers. For, as Dion was fet in his chamber talking with his friends, where there were many beds to fit on, fome compaffed the house round about, others came to the doors and windows of his Chamber; and they that should do the deed to disparch him, which were the ZACYN-THIAN fouldiers came into his chamber in their coats without any fword. But when they were come in, they that were without did flut the doors after them, and locked them in, left any man should come out, and they that were within, fell upon Dion, and thought to have ftrangled him. But when they saw they could not, they called for a fword. Never a man that was within, durst open the doors, though there were many with Dien. For they thought every man to fave their own lives, by fuffering him to be killed, and therefore durft not come to help him. So the murtherers tarried a long time within, and did nothing. At length there was one Lycon a SYRACUSIA N, that gave one of the ZACYN-THIAN fouldiers a dagger in at the window, with the which they cut Dions throat, as a weather they had holden a long time in their hands, even dead for fear. The murther being executed, they caft his fifter, and wife great with child, into prison, and there the poor Lady was pitifully brought to bed of a goodly boy: the which they rather determined to bring up, then otherwise to do any thing with the child. Their keepers that had the charge of them, were contented to let them do it, because Callippus began then a littleto grow to some trouble : for at the first, after he had slain Dion, he bare all the whole fway for a time, and kept the City of Syracusa in his hands: and wrote unto ATHENS, the which next unto the immortal gods he was most afraid of, having defiled his hands in so damablea treason. And therefore (in my opinion) it was not evil spoken, That ATHENS is a City, of all other, that bringeth forth the best, when they give themselves to goodness; and the wickedest people also, when they dispose themselves to evil: as their Countrey also bringeth forth the best Honey that is, and Hemlock in like manner that quickly dispatcheth a man of his life. Howbeir, the gods and fortune did not fuffer this treason and wicked man to reign long, having come to the government of a Realm by so damnable a murther: but shortly after they gave him his payment he had deferved. For Callispon going to take a little Town called * CATANA, he loft the City of SYRACUSA: whereupon he faid, That he had loft a City and gor a Cheele-knife. Afterwards he went to affail the MESSINIANS, and there he loft a great number of his men and amongst them were slain those that killed Dian. Now Callippus finding no City in all SICILE that would receive him, but that they all did hate and abbor him, he went to take the City of RHEGIO in ITALY. There being in great diffres and need of all things, and not able to maintain his fouldiers, he was slain by Leptines and Polyperchon, with the felf-same dagger wherewith Dion before was flain : the which was known by the fashion, being short like the LACONI-AN dagger; and also by the workmanship upon it, that was very excellently wrought. And thus was Halias Pollux, the end and death of Callippus. Now for Ariftomache and Arese, they were taken out of prilon; and Iceres SYRACUSIAN, that fometimes had been one of Dions friends, took them home to his own house, and used them very well and faithfully for a certain time, but afterwards was won and corrupted by Dions enemies. So he caused a ship to be provided for them, and bare them in hand that he would fend them into PELOPONNESUS: but he gave them charge that carried them away, to kill them as they went, and to throw them over-board into the Sea. Some fay that the two women, and the little young the Syreculars boy, were cast alive into the Sea. But this reward of the finfull act that he committed, returned again upon himself, as it had done beforeunto others, For he was taken by Timoleon that put him to death: and belides, the SYRACUSIANS did also kill two of his daughters in revenge of the unfaithfulnels he his posterity.

Arcus Brutus came of that Junius Brutus, for whom the ancient ROMANS The parentage made his statue of Brass to be set up in the Capitol, with the images of the Kings, of Bruss. holding a naked fword in his hand : because he had valiantly put down the Tar-QUINES from the Kingdom of ROME. But that Junius Brutus being of a fowre ftern nature, not foftned by reason, being like unto sword blades of too hard a temper, was fo subject to his choller and malice he bare unto the Tyrants, that for their fakes he caused his own Sons to be executed But this Marcus Brutus in contrary manner, whose life we prefently write, having framed his manners Brutus man of life by the rules of vertue, and fludy of Philosophy, and having employed his wir, which was gen- ners. tle and constant, in attempting of great things, methinks he was rightly made and framed unto vertue. So that his very Enemies which wish him most hurt, because of his Conspiracy against Julius Cefar, if there were any noble attempt done in all this Conspiracy, they refer it wholly unto Brutus, and all the cruel and violent acts unto Cassiu, who was Brutus familiar friend, but not so well given, and conditioned as he. His mother Servilia, it is thought, came of the blood of Servilius Hala; who when Sparius Melius went about to make himself King, and to bring it to pass had entited the common peoBrutus mother ple to rebell, took a dagger, and hid it close under his arm, and went into the Market-place. When he was comethither, he made as though he had fomewhat to fay unto him, and preffed as near him as he could : wherefore Melius stooping down with his head, to hear what he would fay, Servilius stabbed bim in with his dagger and flew him. Thus much all writers agree for his mother. Now touching his father, some for the evil will and malice they bare unto Brutus, because of the death of Julius Casar, do maintain, that he came not of Junius Brutus that drave out the TARQUINES: for there were none left of his race, confidering that his two Sons were executed for Conspiracy with the TARQUINES, and that Marcus Brutus came of a mean house, the which was raised to honour and office in the Commonwealth but of late time. Posidonius the Philosopher writeth the contrary, that Junius Brutus indeed flew two of his Sons which were men grown, as the Histories do declare; howbeit that there was a third Son, being but a little child at that time, from whom the House and Family afterwards was derived: and furthermore, that there were in his time certain famous men of that family, whose stature and countenance resembled much the image of Junius Brutus. And thus much for this matter.

Marcus Cato the Philosopher was brother unto Servilia, Marcus Bruins mother : whom Bruins Servilia, Castudied most to follow of all the other ROMANS, because he was his Uncle, and afterwards he to's lister.

married his daughter. Now touching the GRECIAN Philosophers, there was no feet nor Philoso-Branu hudiet, pher of them, but he heard and liked it: but above all the reft he loved Plato's feet best, and did not much give himfelf to the new or mean Academy. (as they call it) but altogether to the old Acade-Bratus follow- my. Therefore he didever greatly eftern the Philosopher Antiochus, of the City of Ascalon: many other Philosophers, but for wisdom and courtesie, equal with the best and chiefest. Touching Emplus whom M. Braus himself doth mention in his Epistles, and his friends also in many places, the was an Orator, and left an excellent book he wrote of the death of Julius Cefar, and intituled rator, wrote a new was an analyst and book of Gafar's it, Bratus. He was properly learned in the Latine tongue, and was able to make long discourse in book of Calars at the fide that he could also plead very well in Latine. But for the Greek tongue, they do note in some death, and intititled it Brautt. of his Epiftles, that he counterfeited that brief compendious manner of speech of the LA CED.EMONI-ANS. As when the War was begun, he wrote unto the PERGAMENIANS in this fort: I under-A NS. As when the Wal was begun, he was done it willingly, you confess you have offend-frand you have given Dolabella money: if you have done it willingly, you confess you have offend-Epittles in Greek.

A build letter SA MIANS: Your countels be long, your doings be flow, confider the end. And in another Epittle to the Samians. he wrote unto the PATAREIANS: the XANTHIANS despiting my good will, have made their Countrey a grave of despair, and the PATARETANS that put themselves into my protection, have for no jot of their liberty: and therefore whileft you have liberty, either chuse the judgement of the PATAREIANS, or the fortune of the XANTHIANS. These were Bruiss manner of letters, which Bratus follow. were honoded for their briefnels. So Bratus being but a young stripling, went into Cyprus with his Uncle Cato, who was fent against Ptolomy King of EGYPT; who having slain himself, Cato staying for certain necessary business he had in the life of Rhodes, had already fent * Caninius, one of his friends before to keep his treasure and goods. But Caro searing he would be light-fingered wrote unto Brutus forthwith to come out of PAMPHILIA (where he was but newly recovered of a fickness) into Cyprus; the which he did. The which journey he was forry to take upon him, both for respect of Caninins shame, whom Caso (as he thought) wrongfully slandered : as also because he thought this office too mean and unmeet for him, being a young man, and given to his book. This mought an source too mean and maneet for min, occur a young man, and given one book. This notwithflanding, he behaved himfelf to honeftly and carefully, that Cato did greatly commend him: and after all the goods were fold and converted into ready money, he took the most part of it, and returned withall to ROME. Afterwards, when the Empire of ROME was divided into factions, and that Cafar and Pompey both were in Arms one against the other, and that all the Empire of ROME was in garboil and uproar: it was thought then that Brunni would take part with Cafar, because Pompey not long before had put his father to death. But Britis preferring the respect of his Courtrey and Commonwealth before private affection, and perswading himself that Pompey had justice. Bratustreth cause to enter into Arms, then Cesar, he then took part with Pompey; though oftentimes meetpart with Pom- ing him before, he thought foorn to speak to him, thinking it a great sin and offence in him, to fpeak to the murtherer of his father. But then fubmitting himself unto Pompey, as unto the head of the Commonwealth, he failed into SICILE: Lieutenant under Sefisse that was Governor of that Province. But when he faw that there was no way to rile, nor to do any noble exploits, and that Cefar and Pompey were both camped together, and fought for Victory: he went of himfelf unfent for, into MACEDON: to be partaker of the danger. It is reported, that Pompey being glad, and wondering at his coming, when he saw him come to him, he rose out of his chair, and went and embraced him before them all, and used him as honourably, as he could have done the noblest man that took his Britan studied part. Britan being in Pompey's Camp, did nothing but study all day long, except he were with Pompey, and not onely the days before, but the felf fame day also before the great battle was fought in the fields of PHARSALIA, where Pompey was overcome. It was in the middeft of Summer, and the Sun was very hot; befides that, the Camp was lodged near unto Marihes, and they that carried his Tent, tarried long before they came: whereupon being very weary with travel, fcane any meat came into his mouth ardinner time. Furthermore, when others flept, or thought what would happen the morrow after, he fell to his-book, and wrote all day long till night, writing a breviary of Polybim. It is reported that Cefur did not forget him, and that he gave his Caprains grand Care charge before the battle, that they should beware they killed not Brutus in fight; and if he yielded willingly unto them, that then they should bring him unto him: but if he resisted, and would not be taken, then that they should let him go, and do him no hurt. Some say he did this for Sorvilia's fake, Brutus mother. For when he was a young man, he had been acquainted with Servilia, lored Scrulia who was extreamly in love with him. And because Brutus was born in that time when their love Bruiss mother, was hotest, he perswaded himself that he begat him. For proof hereof the report goeth, that when the weightiest matters were in hand in the Senate, about the conspiracy of Catiline, which was likely to have undone the City of Rome, Cefar and Cato fate near together, and were both of contrary minds to each other and then, that in the mean time one delivered Cefar a letter. Cefar took it, and read it fofily to himfelf: but Cato cryed out upon Cefar, and faid he did not well to receive advertifements from enemies : whereupon the whole Senate began to murmur at it. Then Cefor gave Cato the letter as it was fent him, who read it, and found that it was a love letter that from his fifter Servilia: thereupon he caft it again to Cefor, and faid unto him; Hold, drunken sop. When he had done so, he went on with his tale, and maintained his opinion as he did before: fo commonly was the love of Servilia known, which she bare unto Cefar. So, after Pompey's overthrow at the battle of PHARSALIA, and that he fled to the fea, when Cafar came to beliege his Camp, Brutiss went out of the Camp Gates unfeen of any man, and leapt into a Marsh full of Water and Reeds. Then when night was come, he crept out, and Braus laved went unto the City of LARISSA: from whence he wrote unto Cafar, who wasvery glad that he by Falius Cahad feared, and fent for him to come unto him. When Bratas was come, he did not onely par. [47, after the don him, but also kept him always about him, and did as much honour and efteem him, as any falia. man he had in his company. Now, no man could tell whither Pompey was fled, and all were marvellous desirous to know it: Wherefore Casar walking a good way alone with Brutus, he did ask him which way he thought Pompey took. (ejar perceiving by his talk that Bruins gueffed certainly whither Pompey thould be fled, he left all other ways, and took his journey directly towards AGYPT. Pompey (as Brutus had conjectured) was indeed fled into AGYPT, but there wards AGYPT. Pompey (28 Brutus usu conjectures) was marca and among Cassius and defend-he was villainoully slain. Furthermore, Brutus obtained pardon of Cassar for Cassius and defend-he was villainoully slain. Furthermore, Brutus obtained pardon of cassar for Cassius and defending allo the King * of Lybians cause, he was overlaid with a world of accusations against him .* This King howbeit, intreating for him, he faved him the best part of his Realm and Kingdom. They say beitit is true also, that Casar said, when he heard Brutus plead: I know not (said he) what this young man also, that Bruwould, but what he would, he willeth it vehemently. For as Brutus gravity and constant mind tus made interwould not grant all men their requests that fued unto him, but being moved with reason and discre-cession for Deition, did always encline to that which was good and honeft: even fo when it was moved to follow others: King of any matter, he used a kind of forcible and vehement perswasion, that calmed not till he had ob-was deprived tained his desire. For by flattering of him, a man could never obtain any thing at his hands, nor notwithstandmake him to do that which was unjust. Further, he thought it not meet for a man of calling and estima- ing of the most tion, to yield unto the requests and entreaties of a shameless and importunate futer, requesting part of his things unmeet; the which notwithstanding some men do for shame, because they dare deny no- Cossur, and thing, and therefore he was wont to fay, That he thought them evil brought up in their youth that could deny nothing. Now when Cafar took Sea to go into Africa against Cato and place were best that could deny nothing. Now when Lefar 1000 304 to go into account the Alpes, which was to be under-Scipio, he left Bruus Governour of Gall in ITALY on this fide of the Alpes, which was to be undera great good hap for that Province. For where others were spoiled and polled by the infolenture. cy and covetousness of the Governours, as if it had been a Countrey conquered, Brutus was a Casar made comfort and rest unto their former troubles and miseries they sustained. But he referred it wholly Brutus Goverup and down ITALY, the things that pleased him best to see, were the Cities under Bruss on this side the mountains. charge and Government, and Bruens himself who honoured Cafar in person, and whose company also Casar greatly esteemed. Now there were divers forts of Pratorships in ROME, and it Cassing contend was looked for, that Brutus or Cassius would make fuit for the chiefest Prætorship, which they for the Prætorcalled, The Prætorship of the City: because he that had that Office, was as a Judge to minister ship of the Ci-Justice unto the Citizens. Therefore they strove one against another, though some say, that 'y' Cassumarried there was some little grudge betwirk them for other matters before, and that this contention did Junia, Bratus fet them further out, though they were allied together: for Cassius had married Junia, Brutus sifter. Sifter. Others fay, that this contention betwirt them came by Cafar himself, who secretly gave either of them both hope of his favour. So their fuit for the Pratorship was so followed and laboured of either party, that one of them put another into fuit of Law. Brutus with his vertue and good name contended against many noble exploits in arms, which Cassim had done against the PARTHIANS. So Casar after he had heard both their objections, told his friends, with whom he consulted about this matter : Cassius cause is the juster (faid he) but Brutus must be first preferred. Thus Brutus had the first Prætorship, and Cassius the second : who thanked not Casar so much for The first cause the Pratorihip he had, as he was angry with him for that he had loft. But Brates in many other of coffice at things rafted of the benefit of Coffee's favour in any thing he requested. For if he had lifted, he live against might have been one of Casar's chiefest friends, and of greatest authority and credit about him. Casar. Howbeit, Cassius friends did disswade him from it (for Cassius and he were not yet reconciled together fithence their first contention and strife for the Pratorship) and prayed him to beware of Cafar's fweet enticements, and to fly his tyrannical favours: the which they faid Cafar gave him. not to honour his vertue, but to weaken his conftant mind, framing it to the bent of his bow. Now Cafar on the other fide did not trust him overmuch, nor was without tales brought unto him against him : howbeit he feared his great mind, authority and friends. Yet on the other fide also, he trufted his good nature, and fair conditions. For , intelligence being brought him one day , Cofur suspectthat Antonius and Dolabella did conspire against him : he answered, That these fat long haired ed Brusse men made him not afraid, but the lean and whitely faced fellows, meaning that by Brutus and Cassius. At another time also when one accused Brutus unto him: and bad him beware of him: What (faid he again, clapping his hands on his breast) think ye that Brutus will not tarry till this body die? meaning that none but Brutus after him was meet to have fuch power as he had. And furely (in my opinion) I am perswaded, that Brutus might indeed have come to have been the chiefest man of ROME, if he could have contented himself for a time to have been next unto Cefar, and to have suffered his glory and authority, which he had gotten by his great victories, to consume with time. But Cassius being a cholerick man, and hating Cassar privately, more then he did the tyranny openly, he incended Brusus against him. It is also reported, that fold Brusus against Bruens could evil away with the tyranny, and that Caffins hated the tyrant; making many comfeth Bruens a plaints for the injuries he had done him: and amongst others, for that he had taken away his Lions from him. Cassius had provided them for his sports, when he should be Ædilis, and they were found in the City of MEGARA, when it was won by Calenus, and Cafar kept them. The ru-C. The Lions mor went, that thefe Lions did marvellous great hurt to the MEGARIANS : for when the City was taken, they brake their cages where they were tied up, and turned them loofe, thinking they would have done great milchief to the enemies, and have kept them from fetting upon them: but the Lions (contrary to expectation) turned upon themselves that fled unarmed, and did so cruelly tear some in pieces, that it pitied their enemies to see them. And this was the cause (as some do report) that made Cassius conspire against Casar. But this holdeth no water: For Cassius even from his cradle could not abide any manner of Tyrants, as it appeared when he was but a boy, and went unto the same School that Faustus the son of Sylla did. And Faustus bragging among other boys, highly boafted of his fathers Kingdom: Caffin rofe up on his feet, and gave him two good wirts on the ear. Fauftus Governours would have put this matter in fuit against Caffius: but Pompey would not fuffer them, but cataled the two boys to be brought before him, and asked them, how the matter came to pals. Then Cassim (as it is written of him) said unto the other: Go too Faustu, fpeak again and thou dareft, before this Nobleman here, the same words that made me angry with thee, that my fifts may walk once again about thine ears. Such was Caffine hot fitring nature. But for Brutus, his friends and Countreymen, both by divers procurements, and fundry rumors of the City, and by many bills also, did openly call and procure him to do that he did. For under the image of his Ancelor Junius Brutus (that drave the Kings out of ROME) they wrote: O, that it pleafed the gods thou wert now alive, Brutus ! and again, That thou wert here among us now! His tribunal or chair, where he gave audience during the time he was Prator, was full of fuch bills: Brutus thou art afleep, and art not Brutus indeed. And of all this, Cefar's flatterers were the caule: who besides many other exceeding and unspeakable honours they daily devised for him, in the night time they pur Diadems upon the heads of his images, supposing thereby to allure the common people to call him King, inftead of Dictator. Howbeit it turned to the contrary (as we have written more at large in Julius Cofar's life. Now when Caffins felt his friends, and did fite them up against Cafar; they all agreed, and promifed to take part with him, so Brutus were the chief of their conspiracy. For they told him, that so high an enterprise and attempt as that, did not fo much require men of manhood and courage to draw their fwords, as it stood them upon to have a man of such estimation as Bruins, to make every man boldly think, that by his onely prefence the fact wereholy and just. If he took not this course, then that they should go to it with fainter hearts; and when they had done it, they should be more fearfull because every man would think that Bruus would not have refuled to have made one with them, if the cause had been Cassian prayers good and honest. Therefore Cassias considering this matter with himself, did first of all speak Laplus prayers to Brutus, fince they grew strange together for the suit they had for the Pratorship. So when he was reconciled to him again, and that they had embraced one another, Cassins asked him if he were determined to be in the Senate house the first day of the month of March, because heheard fay that Cefar's friends should move the Council that day, that Cefar should be called King by the Senate. Brutus answered him, he would not be there. But if we be fent for (faid Caffies) how then? For my felf then (faid Brutus) I mean not to hold my peace, but to withfrand it, and rather die then lose my liberty. Cassius being bold, and taking hold of this word: Why quoth he) what ROMAN is he alive that will fuffer thee to die for thy liberty? What? knowest thou not that thou art Brutus? Thinkest thou that they be Coblers, Tapsters, or such like base mechanic nicall people, that write these bills and scroles which are found daily in thy Przetors Chair, and not the noblest men and best Citizens that do it? No be thou well assured, that of other Prztors they look for gifts, common distributions among the people, and for common Plays, and to see the Fencers fight at the sharp, to shew the people passime: but at thy hands, they specially re-Quire (as a due debt unto them) the taking away of the tyranny, being fully bent to fuffer any extremity for thy fake, to that thou wilt them thy felf to be the man thou art taken for, and that they hope thou art. Thereupon he kilfed Brutus, and embraced him: and fo each taking leave of other, they went both to speak with their friends about it. Now amongst Pompey's friends, there was one called * Caim Ligarius, who had been accused unto Casar for taking part with Pompes, and Casar discharged him. But Ligarius thanked not Casar for much for his discharge, as he was offended with him, for that he was brought in danger by his tyrannicall power. And therefore in his heart he was alway his mortall enemy, and was befides very familiar with Braum, who went Bruzu maketh to fee him being fick in his bed, and faid unto him: Ligarius in what a time art thou fick? Ligarius Brutts maketh rifing up in his bed, and raking him by the right hand, faid unto him: Brutts (faid he) if thou the conspiracy. haft any great enterprise in hand worthy of thy self, I am whole. After that time they began to feel all their acquaintance whom they trufted, and laid their heads together confulting upon it, and did not onely pick out their friends, but all those also whom they thought from enough to attempt any desperate matter, and that were not afraid to lose their lives. For this cause they durit They do hide not acquaint Ciero with their conspiracy, although he was a man whom they loved dearly, and the configured in acquaint Constant with comparacy, annough its was a man whom any age also having encreased seasons Color trusted best: for they were asked that he being a coward by nature, and age also having encreased seasons Color. his fear, he would quite turn and alter all their purpofe, and quench the heat of their enterprife, the which specially required hot and earnest execution, seeking by perswasion to bringall things to fuch fafety, as there thould be no perill. Brutus also did let other of his friends alone, as Statilius Epicurean, and Faonius, that made profession to follow Marcus Cato: because that having cast out words afar off, disputing together in Philosophy to feel their minds, Faonius answered, That civill War was worse then tyrannicall Government usurped against the Law. And Statilius told him alfo, That it were an unwife part for him to put his life in danger, for a fort of ignorant Civill War fools and affes. Labeo was prefent at this talk, and maintained the contrary against them both, worse then ty-But Bruts held his peace, as though it had been a doubtfull matter, and a hard thing to have been rannicall decided. But afterwards, being out of their company, he made Labeo privy to his intent; who very readily offered himself to make one. And they thought good also to bring in another Brutus to joyn with him, firnamed Albinns: who was no man of his hands himself, but because he was able to bring good force of a great number of flaves, and Fencers at the Sharp, whom he kept to shew the People pattime with their fighting besides also that Cafar had some trust in him. Cashus and Labeo, told Brutus Albinus of it at the first, but he made them no answer. But when he had spoken with Brutus himself alone, and that Brutus had told him that he was the chief Ring-leader of all this conspiracy, then he willingly promised him the best aid he tould. Furthermore, the onely Name and great Calling of Brutus, did bring on the most of them to give consent to this confoiracy: who having never taken Oaths together, nor taken nor given any caution or affurance, The wonder nor binding themselves one to another by any religious Oaths, they all kept the matter so secret full faith and to themselves, and could so cunningly handle it, that notwithstanding, the gods did reveal it by secretie of the manifest figns and tokens from above, and by Predictions of Sacrifices, yet all this would not Conspirators be beleeved. Now Brutus, who knew very well, that for his fake all the nobleft, valianteft, and of Casth. most couragious men of Rome did venture their lives, weighing with himself the greatness of the danger: when he was out of his house, he did so frame and tashion his countenance and lookes that no man could discern he had any thing to trouble his mind. But when night came that he was in his own house, then he was clean changed : for, either care did wake him against his will when he would have flept, or else oftentimes of himself he fell into such deep thoughts of this enterprise. cafting in his mind all the dangers that might happen: that his Wife lying by him, found that there was some marvellous great matter that troubled his mind, not being wont to be in that taking, and that he could not well determine with himself. His Wife Porcia (as we have told you before) was the Daughter of Cato, whom Brutus married being his coufin, not a Maiden, but a Porcis, Cato's young Widow after the death of her first Husband Bibulm , by whom she had also a young Son Daughter, young vision and also young son beginning by which had also young son beginning and called Bibulus, who afterwards wrote a Book of the acts and gets of Brutus, extant at this Wife unto Brutus. Perfent day. This young Lady being excellently well feen in Philosophy, loving her Husband well, Bibulus Book and being of a noble courage, as the was also wife: because the would not ask her Husband of Brutus Aftr. what he ayled before she had made some proof by her self: she took a little Razor, such as Porcia studieth Barbers occupy to pare mens nails, and caufing her Maids and Women to go out of her in Philosophy. Chamber gave her felf a great gash withall in her thigh, that she was straight all of a gore of Porcia, Channer gave let tell a great a whement Feaver took her, by reason of the pain of her wound. Then perceiving her Husband was marvellously out of quiet, and that he could take no rest, even in her greatest pain of all, she spake in this fort unto him: " I being, O Brutus, Great differett, even in her greater pain and in the street of the st e evill Fortune. Now for thy felf, I can find no cause or fault in thee touching our match : but Porcia's words for my part, how may I shew my duty towards thee, and how much I would do for thy sake, if I unto her Hus-"cannot constantly bear a secret mischance or grief with thee, which requireth secretie and fide-band Brutus. "lity? I confess, that a Womans wit commonly is too weak to keep a secret safely: but yet (Brutsu) good education, and the company of vertuous men, have fome power to reform "the defect of nature. And for my felf, I have this benefit moreover, that I am the Daughter of "Cato, and Wife of Brutus. This notwithstanding, I did not trust to any of these things before, "untill that now I have found by experience, that no pain or grief whatfoever can overcome me. With those words she shewed him her wound on her thigh, and told him what she had done to prove her felf. Bratse was amazed to hear what she said unto him, and lifting up his hands to Heaven, he befought the goddesses to give him the grace he might bring his enterprise to so good pass, that he might be found a Husband, worthy of so noble a Wife as Porcia: so he then did comfort her the best he could. Now, a day being appointed for the meeting of the Senate, at what time they hoped Cafar would not fail to come, the Conspiratours determined then to put their enterprise in execution, because they might meet fafely at that time without suspicion; and the rather, for that all the noble and chiefest men of the City would be there: who when shey should see such a great matter executed, would every man set to their hands, for the desence of their liberty. Furthermore, they thought also that the appointment of the place where the Councill should be kept, was chosen of purpose by divine Providence, and made all for them. For it was one of the Porches about the Theater, in the which there was a certain place full of Seats for mento fit in, where also was set up the Image of Pompey, which the City had made and confecrated in honour of him, when he did beautifie that part of the City with the Theater he built, with divers Porches about it. In this place was the affembly of the Senate appointed to be, just on the fifteenth day of the Moneth March, which the Ro-

to be slain, for revenge of Pompey's death. So when the day was come, Bratus went out of his

the Market-place, who on that day did put on the mans Gown, called Toga Virilis; and from thence they came all in a Troop together unto Pompey, Porch, looking that Cefar would ftraight come thither. But here is to be noted, the wonderfull affured conftancy of these Conspiratours, in fodangerous and weighty an enterprife as they had undertaken. For many of them being Prators, by reason of their Office, whose duty is to minister justice to every body; did not onely with great quietness and courtesse hear them that spake unto them, or that pleaded matters before them, and gave them attentive ear, as if they had no other matter in their heads : but moreover, they gave just fentence, and carefully dispatched the Causes before them. So there was one among them, who being condemned in a certain sum of Money, resused to pay it, and cried out, that he did appeal unto Cafar. Then Brutus casting his eyes upon the Conspiratours. faid : Cefar shall not lett me to see the Law executed. Notwithstanding this, by chance there iell out many misfortunes unto them, which was enough to have marred the enterprife. The first and thiefest, was Cefers long tarrying, who came very late to the Senate: for, because the figns of the Sacrifices appeared unlucky, his Wife Calparnia kept him at home, and the Soothfayers bade him beware he went not abroad. The fecond cause was, when one came unto Calca being a Conspiratour, and taking him by the hand, said unto him: O Casca, thou keepest it close from me, but Brutes hath told me all. Cases being amazed at it, the other went on with his tale, and faid: Why, how now, how cometh it to pair thou art thus rich, that thou doeft fue to be Ædilis? Thus Casca being deceived by the others doubtfull words, he told them it was a thousand to one, he blabbed not out all the conspiracy. Another Senatour called Popilius Lena, after he had faluted Brutus and Cassius more friendly then he was wont to do , he rounded fosily in their ears, and told them: I pray the goddels you may go through with that you have taken in hard , but withall , dispatch I read you , for your enterprise is bewrayed. When he had faid, he prefently departed from them, and left them both afraid that their confpiracy would out. Now in the mean time, there came one of Brutus men post haste unto him, and told him his Wife was a dying. For Porcia being very carefull and pensive for that which was to come, and being too weak to away with so great and inward grief of mind, she could hardly keep within, but was frighted with every little noise and cry the heard, as those that are taken and possest with the fury of the BACCHANTES; asking every man that came from the Market-place, what Britis did, and ftill fent Meffenger after Meffenger, to know what news. At length Calars coming being prolonged (as you have heard ,) Porcia's weaknels was not able to hold out of Parcia, not any longer, and thereupon she suddenly swounded, that she had no leasure to go to her Chamber, but was taken in the middeft of her house, where her speech and senses failed her. Howbeit she soon came to her self again, and so was laid in her bed, and attended by her Women. When Brutus heard these news , it grieved him , as it is to be supposed : yet he lest not off the care of his Countrey and Common wealth, neither went home to his houle for any news he heard. Now, it was reported that Cefar was coming in his Litter : for he determined not to flay in the Senate all that day (because he was afraid of the unlucky figns of the sacrifces) but to adjourn matters of importance unto the next Session and Councill holden, sayning himself notto be well at ease. When Casar came out of his Litter, Popilius Lona (that had talked before with Brutus and Cassius, and had prayed the godders they might bring this enterprise to pass) went unto Cafar , and kept him a long time with a talk. Cafar gave good ear unto him, wherefore the Conspiratours (if so they should be called) not hearing what he said to Cessar, but conjecturing by that he had told them a little before, that his talk was none other but the very difcovery of their conspiracy, they were afraid every man of them; and one looking in anothers face, it was easie to see that they all were of a mind, that it was no tarrying for them till they were apprehended, but rather that they should kill themselves with their own hands. And when Cassius and certain other clapped their hands on their Swords under their Gowns to draw them; Brutus marking the countenance and gesture of Lana, and considering that he did use himself rather like an humble an earnest suiter, then like and accuser: he said nothing to his Companion (because there were many amongst them that were not of the conspiracy,) but with a pleasant countenance encouraged Cassius. And immediately after, Lana went from Cefar, and kiffed his hand which thewed plainly that it was for some matter concerning himself, that he had held him so long in talk. Now all the Senarours being entred first into this place or Chapter-house, where the Councill should be kept, all the other Conspiratours ftraight ftood about Cafars Chair, as if they had had fomething to fay unto him. And fome fay, Braus Albinus that Cassius casting his eyes upon Pompeys Image, made his prayer unto it, as if it had been alive. that kept An * Trebonius on the other fide , drew Antonius afide , as he came into the house where the Senate fate, and held him with a long talk without. When Cofar was come into the houle, all the Senate role to honour him at his coming in. So when he was fet, the Conspiratours flocked about him, and amongst them they presented one * Tullius Cimber, who made humble sur for the calling home again of his Brother that was banished. They all made as though they were interceffours for him, and took Cafar by the hands, and kiffed his head and breaft. Cafar at the first, simply refused their kindness and intreaties : but afterwards , perceving they still preffed on him, he violently thrust them from him. Then Cimber with both his hands plucked Co-Jars Gown over his shoulders, and Casca that stood behind him, drew his Dagger first and strake Cefar upon the shoulder, but gave him no great wound. Cefar feeling himlest hurt, took him thou? Casca on the other fide cried in Greek, and called his Brother to help him. So divers running on a heap together to flie upon Cafar, he looking about him to have fled, faw Brutus with a Sword drawn in his hands ready to ftrike at him : then he let Casca's hand go , and casting his Gown over his face, fuffered every man to strike at him that would. Then the Confoiratours thronging one upon another, because every man was desirous to have a cut at him; so many Swords and Daggers lighting upon one body, one of them hurt another, and among them Brueus caught a blow on his hand, because he would make one in murthering of him, and all the rest also were every man of them bloudied. Cafar being flain in this manner, Brutus standing in the middest of the house, would have spoken, and stated the other Senatours that were not of the conspiracy. to have told them the reason why they had done this fact. But they as men both afraid and amazed, fled one upon anothers neck in hast to get out at the door, and no man followed them. For it was fet down, and agreed between them, that they should kill no man but Cafar onely. and should intreat all the rest to look to defend their liberty. All the Conspiratours, but Brutus, determining upon this matter, thought it good also to kill Antonius, because he was a wicked man, and that in nature favoured tyranny: besides also, for that he was in great estimation with Souldiers, having been conversant of long time amongst them; and especially having a mind bent to great enterprises, he was also of great authority at that time, being Consull with Why Antonias Casar. But Brutus would not agree to it. First, for that he said it was not honest: secondly, be-was not slain cause he told them there was hope of change in him. For he did not mistrust, but that Antonius with Cafar, being a noble-minded and couragious man (when he should know that (afar was dead) would willingly help his Countrey to recover her liberty, having them an example unto him, to follow their courage and Vertue. So Brutus by this means faved Antonius life, who at that prefent time difguifed himself, and stole away: but Brutus and his Conforts, having their Swords bloudy in their Brutus with hands, went straight to the Capitoll, perswading the ROMANS as they went, to take their liberty his Conforts again. Now, at the first time when the murther was newly done there were suddain outcries of wentunto the People that ran up and down the City, the which indeed did the more increase the fear and tu-Capitoll. mult. But when they faw they flew no man, neither did spoil nor make havock of any thing , then certain of the Senatours; and many of the People emboldening themselves, went to the Capitoli unto them. There a great number of men being affembled together one after another , Brutus made an Oration unto them to win the favour of the People, and to justify that they had done. All those that were by , faid they had done well , and cried unto them , that they should boldly come down from the Capitoll: whereupon Brutus and his Companions came boldly down into the Market place. The reft followed in Troop, but Brutus went foremost, very honourably compaf-fed in round about with the noblest men of the City, which brought him from the Capitoll, through the Market-place, to the Pulpit for Orations. When the People faw him in the Pulpit, although they were a multitude of rake-hels of all forts, and had a good will to make fome ftir : yet being afhamed to do it, for the reverence they bare unto Bruens, they kept filence to hear what he would fay: when Brutus began to speak, they gave him quiet audience: Howbeit immediatly after, they shewed that they were not all contented with the murther. For when another called Cinna would have spoken, and began to accuse Casar, they fell into a great uprore among them, and marvellously reviled him. Infomuch that the Conspiratours returned again into the Capitoll. There Bruens being afraid to be besieged, fent back again the Noblemen that came thither with him thinking it no reason, that they which were no partakers of the murther, should be partakers of the danger. Then the next morning the Senate being affembled, and holden within the Temple of the goddels Tellus, to wit, the Earth: and Antonius, Plancus, and Cicero, having made a motion to the Senate in that Affembly, that they should take an order to pardon and forget all that was past, and to establish friendship and peace again: it was decreed, that they should not onely be pardoned, but also that the Confuls should refer it to the Senate what honours should be appointed unto them. This being agreed upon, the Senate brake up, and Antonius the Confull, Honours deto put them in heart that were in the Capitoll, fent them his Son for a pledge. Upon this creed for the affurance; Brutus and his Companions came down from the Capitoll, where every man faluted and Murtherers of embraced each other, among the which, Amonius himself did bid Cassius to Supper to him: and Casar. Lepidatatio bade Brutur, and so one bade another, as they had friendship and acquaintance together. The next day following, the Senate being called again to counfell, did first of all commend Antanins, for that he had wifely stayed and quenched the beginning of a civil War: then they also gave Brutus and his Conforts great praises; and lastly they appointed them severall governidence of Provinces. For unto Brutus they appointed CRETA; AFRICK unto Cassis; Casas Will. As IA unto Trebonine BITHYNIA unto Comber; and unto the other Decine Brutus Albinus and Funerals, GABLE on this fide of the Alpes. When this was done, they came to talk of Calars Will and Testament and of his Funerals and Tomb. Then Antonins thinking good his Testament should be read openly, and also that his body should be honourably buried, and not in hugger mugger, left the

against it. But Bratus went with the motion, and agreed unto it : wherein it seemeth he committed a fecond fault. For the first fault he did, was when he would not confent to his fellow Conspiratours, that Antohins should be slain: and therefore he was justly accused, that thereby

he had faved and strengthened a strong and grievous Enemy of their conspiracy. The second fault was, when he agreed that Cafars Funerals should be as Antonins would have them, the which indeed marred all. For first of all, when Cefar's Testament was openly read among them, whereby it appeared that he bequeathed unto every Citizen of Roms, feventy five Drachma's a man; and that he left his Gardens and Arbors unto the People, which he had on this fide of the River Tyber, in the place where now the Temple of Fortune is built : the people then loved him, and were marvellous forry for him. Afterwards, when Cafars body was brought into the Market place, Antonins making his Funerall Oration in praife of the dead, according to the ancient Custom of ROME, nerall Cration and perceiving that his words moved the common People to compatition, he framed his Eloquence to make their hearts yearn the more; and taking Cafars Gown all bloudy in his hand, he layed it open to the fight of them all , shewing what a number of cuts and holesit had upon it. Therewithall the Peoplefell prefently into fuch a rage and mutiny, that there was no more order kept amongst the common People. For fome of them cried our , Kill the Murtherers : others plucked up Forms, Tables , and Stalls about the Market place , as they had done before at the Funerals of Clodius ; and having laid them all on a heap together, they fer them on fire, and thereupon did put the Body of Cefar, and burnt it in the middeft of the most holy places. And Furthermore, when the fire was throughly kindled, fome here, fome there, took burning Fire-brands, and ran with them to the Murtherers houses that killed him, to set them on fire. Howbeit, the Confpiratours foreseeing the danger, before had wifely provided for themselves, and sled. But there was a Poet called Cinna, who had been no partaker of the conspiracy, but was alway one of Cafar; chiefest friends : he dreamed the night before, that Cefar bad him to supper with him, and that he refusing to go, Cefar was very importunate with him, and compelled him, so that at length he led him by the hand into a great dark place, where being marvelloufly afraid, he was driven to follow him in spice of his heart. This dream put him all night into a Feaver, and yet notwithstanding, the next morning when he heard that they carried Cafars body to buriall, being ashamed not to accompany his funerals, he went out of his house, and thrust himself into the preass of the common Peoplethat werein a great uproar. And becaule some one called him by his Name, Cinna: the People thinking he had been that Cinna, who in an Oration he made, had spoken very ill of Casar, they falling upon him in their rage, flew him outright in the Market-place. This made Brutum and his Companions more afraid then any other thing next unto the change of Antonius. Wherefore is they got them out of ROME, and kept at the first in the City of ANTIUM, hoping to return again to ROME, when the fury of the People was a little affwaged. The which they hoped would be quickly, confidering that they had to deal with a fickle and unconstant multitude, easie to be carried, and that the Senare stood for them : who notwithstanding made no enquiry for them that had torn poor Cinna the Poet in pieces, but caused them to be lought for and apprehended that went with Fire-brands to fet fire on the Conspiratours houses. The People growing weary now of Assessias pride and infolency, who ruled all things in a manner with absolute power, they defired that Bruns might return again; and it was also looked for, that Bruns would come himself in Person to play the Plays which were due to the People, by reason of his Office of Prætorship. But Bratan understanding that many of Cesars souldiers which served under him in the Wars, and that also had Lands and houses given them in the Cities where they, lay, did lie in wait for him to kill him, and that they daily by fmall Companies came by one and by one into RONE, be durft no more return thinter : but yet the People had the pleafure and pastime in his absence, to see the Games and Sports he made them , which were sumptuously set forth and fornished with all things necessary, sparing for no cost. For he had brought a great number of ftrange Beafts, of the which he would not give one of them to any friend he had, but that they should all be employed in his Games; and went himself as far as BY ZANTIUM, to speak to forme Players of Comedies and Musicians that were there. And further he wrote unto his friends for one Canntists an excellent Player, that whatfoever they did, they should intreathin to play these Plays. For (faid he) it is no reason to compell any GRECIAN, unles he will come of his own good will. Moreover, he wrote also unto Cicero, and earneftly prayed him in a ny case to be at these Plays. Now the state of ROMs standing in these terms, there fell our smother Official Control of the control of t Juliu Cafars Necce, whom he had adopted for his Son, and made his Heir, by his laft Will and Testament, But when Julius Ce/ar his adopted Father was stain, he was in the City of Apollonia (where he studied) tarrying for him, because he was determined to make War with the PARTHI-ANS : but when he heard the news of his death, he returned again to ROME, where to begin to curry favour with the common People, he first of all took upon him his adopted Fathers Name, and made diffribution among them of the Money which his Father had bequeathed unto them. By this means he troubled Ansonine forely, and by force of Money, got a great number of his Fathers Souldiers together, that had ferved in the War with him. And Giver himself, for the great malice be bare Antonius, did favour his Proceedings : but Bratas marvelloufly reproved him for it, and wrote unto him, that he feemed by his doings not to be forry to have a Marter, but onely to be afraid to have been than should have him: and that all his doings in the Common wealth did wimels, that he chole to be subject to a mild and bourstous bondage, sith by his words and Writings he did commend this young man Officerin Cofee, to the a good and gentle Lord. For our

Predeceffours (faith he) would never abide to be subject to any Masters, how gentle or mild soever they were : and for his own pare, that he had never refolutely determined with himself to make War, or Peace: but otherwise, that he was certainly minded never to be slave nor subject. And therefore he wondered much at him , how Cicero could be afraid of the danger of the civill Wars, and would not be afraid of a shamefull Peace : and that to thrust Antonine out of the usurped tyranny, in recompence he went about to stablish young Ottavius Cafar Tyrant. These were the Contents of Bruttu first Letters he wrote unto Cicero. Now the City of ROME being divided into two Factions. fome taking part with Antonius, other also leaning unto Ollavius Cafar, and the souldiers making port-fale of their Service to him that would give most : Bruth seeing the state of Rome would be utterly overthrown, he determined to go out of ITALY, and went on foot through the Countrey of LUKE, unto the City of ELEA, standing by the Sea. There Porcia being ready to depart Porcia's for. from her Husband Brutus, and to return to Rome, did what the could to diffemble the grief and rowful return from her Husband Brutus, and to return to NOME, and what the cound to dimembre the grief and to Remefor the forrow the felt at her heart: but a certain painted Table bewrayed her in the end, although until ablence of her that time she shewed always a constant and patient mind. The device of the Table was taken out Husband Brisof the Greek Stories, how Andromache accompanied her Husband Hellor, when he went out 180. of the City of TROY to go to the Wars, and how Heller delivered her his little Son, and how The Story of her eyes were never off him. Porcia feeing this Picture, and likening her felf to be in the fame Heffor and Ancase the fell a weeping : and coming thither oftentimes in a day to see it, she wept still. Acident forth in paintone of Brutus friends perceiving that, rehearled the Verses Andromache speaketh to this purpose ed Tables. in Homer:

Thou Hector art my Father, and my Mother, and my Brother, And Husbandeke and all in all : I mind not any other.

Then Brutus smiling, answered again: But yet (faid he) I cannot for my part say unto Porcias as Hellon answered Andromache in the same place of the Poet :

For indeed the weak constitution of her Body, doth not suffer her to perform in shew, the valiant Acts that we are able to do: but for courage and constant mind, she shewed her self as stout in the defence of her Countrey, as any of us. Bibulus the Son of Porcia, reporteth this Story thus, Now Brutus embarking at ELEA in Luke, he failed directly toward ATHENS. When he arrived there the People of ATHENS received him with common joys of rejoycing, and honourable decrees made for him. He lay with a friend of his, with whom he went daily to hear the Lectures, of Then ifficeles the Academick Philosopher, and of Crasippus the Peripatetick, and fo would talk with them in Philosophy, that it feemed he left all other matters, and gave himself onely to study : howbeit, fecretly notwithstanding, he made preparation for War. For he sent Herofrans into MACE. How British belowed his pow, to win the Captains and Souldiers that were upon those marches, and he did also entertain all times the sent the s DON, 10 Will the Capacitis and Condense and Shortly after, he began to enter openly into arms: and being advertised that there came out of Asia mendeth a certain Fleet of ROMAN Ships that had good store of Money in them, and that the Captain of Citere's Son. those Ships (who was an honest man, and his familiar friend') came towards ATHENS: he went to meet him as far as the Isle of CARYSTOS, and having spoken with him there, he handled him so, that he was contented to leave his ships in his hands: whereupon he made him a notable banquet at his house, because it was on his Birth-day. When the Feast-day came, and that they began to drink luftily one to another, the Guests drank to the Victory of Brutus, and the liberty of the Ro-MANS. Brutus therefore to encourage them further, called for a bigger Cup, and holding it in his hand, before he drank spake this aloud :

> My destiny and Phoebus are agreed, To bring me to my finall end with freed.

And for proof hereof, it is reported, that the fame day he fought his last Battell by the City of PHILIPPES, as he came out of his Tent, he gave them for the word and fignall of Battell, Prabus so that it was thought ever fince, that this his suddain crying out at the Feast, was a Prognostication of his misfortune that should happen. After this, Antistius gave him of the Money, he carried into IT A LIE, fifty Myriades. Furthermore, all Pompeys Souldiers that straggled up and down THESSALY, came with very good will unto him. He took from Cinna also, five hundred Horsemen, which he carried into Asia, unto Dolabella. After that, he went by Sea, unto the City of DEMETRIADE, and there took a great deal of Armour and Munition which was going to And tonius: and the which had been made and forged there by Julius Cafars commandment, for the Wars against the PARTHIANS. Furthermore, Horsensus Governour of MACEDON, did resign the Government thereof unto him. Besides, all the Princes, Kings, and Noble-men thereabouts, came and joyned with him , when it was told him, and that Caise (Antonius Brother) coming out of ITALY, had paffed the Sea, and came with great speed towards the City of DYRRACHIUM, and APOLLONIA, to get the Souldiers into his hand, which Gabinim had there. But including to eat; his Souldiers were compelled to go to their England, and having nothing in his Camp to eat; his Souldiers were compelled to go to their England, mies; and coming to the Gates of the City, they prayed the Warders to help them to Bread mies; and coming to the Gates of the Chy, they brought him both meat and drink: in requitall whereof, afterwards, when he wan the City, he did not onely intreat and use the Citizens thereof courteoully, but all the Inhabitants of the City also for their sakes. Now when Cains Antonius was arrived in the City of APOLLONIA, he fent unto the Souldiers thereabours to come unto him. But when he understood that they went all to Brutus: and furthermore, that the Citizens of Apol-LONIA did favour himmuch: he then forfook that City, and went unto the City of BUTHRO-Tus; but yet he loft three of his Entigns by the way, that were flain every man of them. Then he fought by force to win certain places of strength about BYLLIS, and to drive Bratus men from thence, that had taken it before: and therefore to obtain his purpole, he fought a Battell with Cierro, the Son of Marcus Tullius Cierro, by whom he was overcome. For Brutus made the younger Cicero a Caprain, and did many notable exploits by his fervice. Shortly after having flolen upon Caius Antenius in certain Marithes far from the place from whence he fled, he would not fet on him with fusy but onely rode round about him, commanding his fouldiers to spare him and hismen, as reckoning them all his own without stroke striking; and so indeed it happened: for they yeelded themselves and their Captain Antonius, unto Brutus; so that Brutus had now a great Army about him. Now Brutus kept this Cains Antonius long time in his Office, and never rook from him the marks and figns of his Confulship, although many of his friends, and Cicero among others, wrote unto him to put him to death. But when he faw Antonius feeretly practifed with his Captains to make some alteration, then he sent him into a Ship, and made him to be kept there. When the Souldiers whom Cains Antonins had corrupted, were gotten into the City of A-POLLONIA, and fent from thence unto Brueus to come unto them, he made them answer, That it was not the manner of ROMAN Captains to come to the Souldiers, but the Souldiers to come to the Captain, and to crave pardon for their offences committed. Thereupon they came to him, and he pardoned them. So Bruins preparing to go into Asia, news came unto him of the great change at ROME: for Off-voins Cefar was in arms, by commandment and authority from the Senate, against Marcus Amonius. But after that he had driven Antonius out of ITALY, the Senate began then to be afraid of him, because he sued to be Consull, which was contrary to the Law; and kept a great Army about him when the Empire of Rome had no need of them. On the other Offering Cafer fide, Offering Cafer perceiving the Senate stayed not there, but turned to Britis that was on of ITALY, and that they appointed him the Government of certain Provinces: then he began to be afraid for his part, and fent unto Antonins to offer him his friendship. Then coming on with his Army near to ROME, he made himself to be chosen Consull, whether the Senare would or not, when Bruur accused he was yet but a stripling or springall of twenty years old, as himself reporteth in his own Comand condemnentaries. So when he was Confull, he prefently appointed Judges to accuse Brutus and his Companions, for killing of the nobleft person in Rome, and chiefest Magistrate, without Law or Judgement: and made L. Cornificus; accule Brutus, and M. Agrippa, Caffins. So the parties means, for the death of Julius accused were condemned, because the Judges were compelled to give such sentence. The voice went, that when the Herauld (according to the Custom after fentence given) went up to the Chair or Pulpir for Orations, and proclaimed Brista with a loud voice, fummoning him to appear in perfon before the Judges, the People that flood by fighed openly, and the Noblementhan were prefent hung down their heads, and durst not speak a word. Among them the tears fell from Publint Silicent Eyes: who shortly after, was one of the Proscripts or Outlaws appointed to be ilain. After that, there three Offavins Cefar. Antonini and Lepidas made an agreement between themselves, and by those Articles divided the Provinces belonging to the Empire of Rosse among themselves, and did set up Bills of Proscription and Outlawry, condemning two hundred of the noblest men of ROME to suffer death, and amongst that number, Cicero was one. News being brought thereof into Macedon, Brutus being then inforced to do it, wrote unto Horsenfins that he should put Cairs Antonius to death, to be revenged of the death of Gierre, and of the other Brusus, of the which the one was his friend, and the other a Kinsman. For this cause therefore Antonine afterwards taking Hoetensine at the Battell of PHILTPPES, he made him to be flain upon his Brothers Tomb. But when Bratus faid, that he was more afhamed of the cause for the which Cicero was flain, then he was otherwife forry for his death; and that he could not but greatly reprove his friends he had at ROME, who were Slaves more through their own fault, then through their valiantness or man-hood which usurped the tyranny : considering that they were so cowardly and faint-hearted, as to fuffer the fight of those things before their eyes, the report whereof should onely have grieved them to the heart. Now when Brutus had passed over his Army (that was very great) into Asia, he gave order for the gathering of a great number of Ships together, as well in the Coast of BITHYNIA, as also in the City of CYZICUM, because he would have an Army by Sea; and himself in the mean time went unto the Cities, taking order for all things, and giving audience to Princes and Noblemen of the Countrey that had to do with him. Afterwards he sent unto Cassius in Syria, to turn, him from his Journey into ÆGYPT, telling him that it was not for the Conquest of any Kingdom for themselves, that they wandered up and down in that fort, but contrarily, that it was to restore their Countrey again to her liberty : and that the multitude of Souldiers they gathered together, was to fubdue the Tyrants that would keep them in flavery and fubjection. Wherefore regarding their chief purpole and intent, they should not be far from ITALY, as near as they could possible, but should rather make all the haste they could, Brutus and to keep their Countreymen. Cassius beleeved him, and returned. Brutus went to meet him, Cassius do joyn and they both met at the City of SMYRNA, which was the first time that they faw together Armies fince they took leave each of other, at the Haven of PIREA in ATHENS, the one going into Syria, and the other into Macedon. So they were marvellous joyfull, and no less couragious, when they faw the great Armies together which they had both leavied : confidering that they departed out of ITALY like naked and poor banished men, without armour and money, nor having any Ship ready, nor Souldier about them, nor any one Town at their commandment; yet notwithstanding, in a short time after they were now met together having Ships, Money, and Souldiers enough, both Footmen and Horsemen, to fight for the Empire of ROME. Now Callins would have done Brutus much honour, as Brutus did unto him : But Brutus most commonly prevented him, and went first unto him, both because he was the elder man, as also for that he was fickly of Body. And men reputed him commonly to be very skillfull in Wars, but otherwise marvellous cholerick and cruell, who fought to rule men by fear, rather then with lenity : and on the The than other fide he was too familiar with his friends, and would jest too broadly with them. But Brutus in and cruell concontrary manner, for his Vertue and Valiantness, was well-beloved of the People and his own, ditions of efteemed of Noblemen, and hated of no man, not so much as of his Enemies; because he was a Brutus centle marvellous lowly and gentle person, Noble-minded, and would never be in any rage, nor carried and fair conaway with pleasure and coverousness, but had ever an upright mind with him, and would never ditions. yeeld to any wrong or injustice; the which was the chiefest cause of his fame, of his rifing, and of the good will that every man bare him : for they were all perswaded that his intent was good. For Brutus intent they did not certainly believe, that if Pompey himself had overcome Cafar, he would have refigned good if he had overcome. his authority to the law, but rather they were of opinion, that he would ftill keep the foveraignty and absolute Government in his hands, taking onely, to please the People, the Title of Consull, or Dictator, or of some other more civil Office. And as for Cassium, a hot, cholerick, and cruell man, that would oftentimes be carried away from justice for gain, it was certainly thought that he made War, and put himself into fundry dangers, more to have absolute power and authority. then to defend the liberty of his Countrey. For, they that will also consider others, that were elder men then they, as Cinna, Marinne, and Carbo, it is out of doubt that the end and hope of their Victory, was to be the Lords of their Countrey, and in manner they did all confels, that they fought for the tyranny, and to be Lords of the Empire of ROME. And in contrary manner, his Enemies themselves did never reprove Brutm for any such change or desire. For, it was said that An-Antonius testitenies foake it openly divers times, that he thought, that of all them that had flain Casar, there mony o was none but Brutus onely that was moved to do it, as thinking the act commendable of it felf : Brutus. but that all the other Conspiratours did conspire his death for some private malice or envy, that they otherwise did bear, unto him. Hereby it appeareth, that Brutsu did not trust so much to the power of his Army, as he did to his own Vertue, as it is to be feen by his Writings. For approaching near to the instant danger he wrote unto Pomponine Atticus, that his affairs had the best hap that could be. For , faid he , either I will fet my Countrey at liberty by Battell , or by honourable death Bratus noble ridine of this bondage. And furthermore, that they being certain and affured of all things elfe, Country, this one thing onely was doubtfull to them : whether they should live or die with liberty. He wrote also that Antenius had hisdue payment for his folly. For where he might have been a partner equalby of the glory of Brutus, Cassium, and Cato, and have made one with them, he liked better to chule to be joyned with Octavine Cafar : with whom , though now he be not overcome by us, yet shall he shortly after also have War with him. And truly he proved a true Prophet, for so Bentus a true came it indeed to pass. Now whilest Brutm and Cassim were together in the City of SMYRNA, Prophet of Brutus prayed Caffius, to let him have some part of his Money, whereof he had great store; be- Antonius. cause all that he could rap and rend of his side he bestowed it in making so great a number of Ships, that by means of them they should keep all the Sea at their commandment Cassius friends hindred this request, and earnestly dissipaded him from it : perswading him, that it was no reason Bruens should have the Money which Cassin hath gotten together by sparing, and leavied with great evill will of the People their subjects, for him to bestow liberally upon his Souldiers, and by this means to win their good wils, by Cassius charge. This notwithstanding, Cassius gave him the third part of this totall fum. So Caffins and Brutus then departing from each other, Caffins Caffins Wanthe took the City of RHODES, where he too dishonestly and cruelly used himself: although when City of Rhodes,

the City of the XANTHIANS, within the which were shut up the cruellest and most warlikemen of Lycia. There was a River that ran by the Wals of the City, in the which many men faved themselves, swimming between two Waters, and sled : howbeit they laid nets overthwart the River, and tied little Bels on the top of them, to found when any man was taken in the nets. The XAN-THIANS made a falley out by night, and came to fire certain Engins of the battery that beat down their Wals: but they were presently driven in again by the ROMANS, so so so steey were discovered. The wind by chance was marvellous big, and increased the slame so fore, that it vio-lently carried it into the craneys of the Wall of the City, that the next houses unto them were ftraight fet on fire thereby. Wherefore Brut w being afraid that all the City would take on fire, he presently commanded his men to quench the fire, and to save the Town if it might be. But the LYCIANS at that instant fell into such a frenzy, and strange and horrible despair, that no man can well express it: and a man cannot more rightly compare or liken it, then to frantick and most desparate desire to die. For all of them together, with their Wives and Children, Masters and Servants, and of all forts of age whatforver, fought upon the Rampiers of their Wals and did caft down Stones and Fire-works on the ROMANS, which were very busie in quenching the stame of the fire, to fave the City. And in contrary manner also, they brought Faggots, dry wood, and Reeds, to bring the Fire further into the City as much as might be, increasing it by fuch things as they brought. Now when the Fire had gotten into all parts of the City, and that the flame burnt bright in every place : Brans being forry to fee it , got upon his Horle, and rod round about the Wals of the City, to fee if it were possible for to save it, and held up his hands to the Inhabitants, praying them to pardon their City, and to fave themselves. Howbeit they would not be periwaded, but did all that they could possible to cast themselves away, not onely men and Women, but also little Children. For some of them weeping and crying out, did cast themselves into the Fire solbers headlong throwing themselves down from the Wals, brake their necks: others also made their backs bare, to the naked Swords of their Fathers, and undid their cloaths, praying them to kill them with their ownhands. After the City was burnt, they found a Woman hanged up by the neck, holding one of her Children in her hand dead by her, hanged up also : and in the other hand a burning Torch fetting fire on her house. Some would have had Brutm to have seen her, but he would not fee so horrible and tragicall a fight: but when he heard it, he fell a weeping, and caused an Herauld to make proclamation by found of Trumper, that he would give a certain fum of Money to every Soulder that could fave a XANTHIAN. So there were not (as it is reported) above fifty of them faved, and yet they were faved against their wils. Thus the XANTHIANS having ended the revolution of their fatall destiny after a long continuance of time, they did through their desperation, renew the memory of the lamentable calamities of their Anceftors, who in like manner, in the Wars of the Persians, did burn their City, and defroyed themselves. Therefore Bratan likewise besigning the City of the Patar Relans, perceiving that they stoutly resisted him, he was also The Patarciairaid of that, and could not well tell whether he should give affault to it, or not, leaft they would fall into the despair and desperation of the XANTHIANS. Howbeit having taken certain of their Women Prifoners , he fent them back again , without payment of Ransome. Now they that were the Wives and Daughters of the nobleft men of the City, reporting unto their Parents, that they had found Bratus a mercifull, just, and courteous man, they perfwaded them to yeeld themselves and their City umo him; the which they did. So after they had thus yeelded themselves, divers other Cities also followed them, and did the like: and found Brutus more mercifull and courteous, then they thought they should have done, but specially far above Cassius. For Cassius, about the felf fame time, after he had compelled the RHODIANS every man to deliver all the ready Money they had in Gold and Silver in their Houses, the which being brought together, amounted to the sum of eight thousand Talents: yet he condemned the City besides, to pay the sum of five hundred Talents more. Where Brutus in contrary manner, after he had leavied of all the Countrey of Lycia but an hundred and fifty Talents onely, he departed thence into the Countrey of IONIA, and did them no more hurt. Now Brutus in all this journey, did many notable acts mency unto the and worthy of memory, both for rewarding, and also in punishing those that had deferred it: wherefore among therest, I will tell you of one thing, of the which he himfelf, and all the Noblemen of the ROMANS were marvellous glad When Pompey the Great (having loft the Battell a-

cale. They were not all of one mind in this confultation : for some thought it good to receive Pimery: others also, that they should drive him out of EGYPT. But there was a certain Rhetoriciancalled Theodorus, that was born in the Ille of CHIO, who was the Kings School-mafter to Theodorus born ancalled Theodorias, that was out in the first of the Council for lack of fufficient men, faid, That both in Chin, a Rhe-teach him Rhetorick. Cassing fell a laughing at him : but Branas shrult him out of the Chamber , and called him Dog. and counterfeit Cynick. Howbeit his coming in brake their strife at that time, and so they less each other. The felt Tame night Caffine prepared his supper in his Chamber, and Bratus brought his friends with him. So when they were fet at supper, Phaonine came to sir down after he had washed. Bratastold him aloud, to man feat for him, and bade them fet him at the upper end; menting indeed at the lower end of the bed. Phanning made no ceremony, but thruft in amongst the middeft of them, and made all the company laugh at him. So they were merry all Suppertime, and full of their Philosophy! The next day after, Brutus upon complaint of the SARDI-Airs, did condemn and note Lucius Pella for a defamed Person, that had been a Pratter of the Romann, and whost Brates had given charge unto: for that he was accused and convicted of robbery, and pillery in his Office. This judgement much millaked Cassius, because he himfelf had fecretly (not many days before) warned two of his friends, amainted and convicted of the like offences, and openly had cleared them; but yet he did not therefore leave to employ them in any manner of service as he did before. And therefore he greatly reproved Brutus, for that he would show himself so straight and severe, in such a time as was meeter to bear a little, then to take things at the worst. Beiters in contrary manner answered, that he should remember the ties of March; at which time shey flew Jakine Cefer, who neither pilled nor polled the fain at the Country, but onely, was a favourer and suborner of all them that did rob and spoil, by his cont. then the time he was driven to be alone, and when every body elfe took their reft. But now whileft he was in War, and his head over-bufily occupied to think of his affairs, and what would happen, after he had flumbered a little after supper, he spent all the rest of the night in dispatching of his weightieft Caufes; and after he had taken order for them, if he had any leafure left him, he would read fome Book till the third Watch of the night, at what time the Captains, petty Captains and Colonels, didule to come to him. So, being ready to go into Euro PE, one night very late (when all the Camp took quiet reft) as he was in his Tent with a little light, thinking of weighty matters, he thought he heard one come in to him, and casting his eye towards the door of his Tent, that he law a wonderfull strange and monstrous shape of a body coming towards him, and said never aword. So Brutus boldly asked what he was, a God or a man, and what cause brought him thinker. The Spirit answered him, I am thy evill Spirit, Bruins: and thou shalt see me by the City of Phi-LIPPES. Brutus being no otherwife afraid, replied again unto it: Well, then I shall see thee again. The Spirit prelently vanished away : and Bratus called his men unto him, who told him that they heard no notic, nor faw any thing at all. Thereupon Bratus returned again to think on his matters as he did before: and when the day brake, he went unto Caffins, to tell him what Vision City of Sardar, and manters as neural periode; and water through prace, newerthanto Cappus, to ten unit writer vision had appeared based him in the night. Cappus being in opinion an Epicurian, and reasoning the Vision, thus, In our feet, Brutus, we have an of Satisfies there exercise with Brutus, for the continue the Vision, thus, In our feet, Brutus, we have an of Satisfies the exercise with Brutus for the continue that the continue the Vision of the Cappus and the continue that the continue of Spirits after opinion, that we do not always feel, or fee, that which we suppose we do both see and feel, but the Epicarian that our fenses being credulous and therefore easily abused (when they are idle and unoccupied in section). their own objects) are induced to imagine they see and conjecture that, which in truth they do not: For, our mind is quick and cuinning to work (without either cause or matter) any thing in the imagination whatforeer. And therefore the imagination is refembled to clay, and the mind to the Potter: who without any other cause then his sancy and pleasure, changeth it into what fashion and formhe will. And this doth the divertity of our Dreams shew unto us. For our imagination doth upon a fmall fancy grow from conceit to conceit, altering both in passions and forms of things imagined. For the mind of man is ever occupied, and that continual moving is nothing but an imagination. But yet there is a further cause of this in you, For you being by nature given to melancholick discoursing, and of late continually occupied, your wits and senies having been over-labouted, doeafilier yeeld to fuch imaginations. For, to Jay that there are Spirits or Angels, and if there were, that they had the shape of men, or such voices, or any power at all to come unto us, it is a mockery. And for mine own part, I would there were fuch, because that we should not onely have Souldiers, Horses and Ships, but also the aid of the gods, to guide and further our honest and have Souldiers, Horses and Ships, but also the aid of the gods, to guide and further our honest and honest the stream. honourable attempts. With these words Cassim did somewhat comfort and quiet Bratm. When they raifed their Camp, there came two Eagles that flying with a marvellous force, lighted upon usey rance their camp, there came two Eagles that mying with a marvenus force, nighted upon gwo of the faremost: Enfigne, and always followed the Souldiers, which gave them Meat, and fixed them, sebillithey came near to the City of PHILLPPES; and there one, day onely before the Battell, they both flew away. Now Brutu had conquered the most part of all the People and National Company of the Company of the People and National Company tions of that Countrey: but if there were any other City or Captain to overcome, then they made all clear before them, and fo drew towards the Coaffs of Thanssos. There Norbanus lying in Camp in a certain place called the straights, by another place called CYMBOLON (which is a port in the Sea.) Caffin and Brum compatied him in fuch fort., that he was driven to for fake the place which was of great strength for him, and he was also in danger beside to have lost all his Army. For, Official Cafar could not follow him because of his sickness, and therefore stayed behind : whereupon they had taken his Army, had not Assessing aid been, which made fuch wonderfull speed, that Brutu could feant beleeve it. So Cafar came not thither of ten, days after and Antonius camped Caffur Camps against Caffur, and Brut m on the other fide against Cafar. The ROMANS called the Valley between before the Ci- both Camps, the PHILIPPIAN Fields: and there were never feen two fo great Armies of the ry of Philipes, ROMANS, one before the other, ready to fight. In truth, Brusus Army was inferiour to Offavisgiant Offavisg For the most part of their Armsturs were Sulver, and gilt , which Brans had bountfully given them: Braus Souldi-although in all other things be taught his Captains to live in order without excels. Now when they of Soulders, cause they fight to keep their armour and Weapon, as also their Goods and Lands. Now when they came to muster, their Armies, Ottavim Colar took the muster, of his Army within the Trenches of his Camp, and gave his men onely a little Com, and five filter, Drachma's to every man to factifice in their Atto the gods; and to pray for Victory. But Bruss scorning his safery and nigardlines, first of all mour and . Weapons. mustred his Army, and did purify it in the Fields, according to the manner of the ROMANS; and then he gave into every Band a number of Weathers to facrifice, and fifty filver Drachma's to every Souldier. So that Brutm and Caffins Souldiers, mere bener pleafed, and more couragiously bear to fight at the day of Battell, then their Enemies Souldiers were. Notwithflanding, being builty occu-Unlucky figns pied about the Geremonies of this purification, it is reported that there chanced certain unlucky figns unto Caffin. For one of his Sergeants that carried the Rods before him, brought him the Garland of Flosters turned backward, the which he should have worn on his head in the time of sa crificing. Moreover it is reported also, that another time before, in certain Sports and Triumph where they carried an Image of Cassius V. Ctory, of clean Gold, it fell by chance, the man stumbling that carried it. And yet further there was feen a marvellous number of Fowls of prey, that feed upon dead Carcaffes: and Bee-hives also were found where Bees were gathered together in a certain place within the Trenches of the Camp : the which place the Soothfayers thought good to thut out of the Precinct of the Camp, for to take away the superfittious fear and mistrust men would have of it. The which began somewhat to alter Cassim mind from Epicurus opinions, and Cassius and had put the Souldiers also in a marvellous fear. Thereupon Caffin was of opinion not to try this Britis opini-War at one Battell, but rather to delay time, and to draw it out in length, confidering that they battell were the fironger in Money, and the weaker in men and Armour. But Bruttes in contrary manner, did alway before, and at that time also, defire nothing more, then to put all to the hazard of Battell as foon as might be possible: to the end he might either quickly restore his Countrey to her former liberty, or rid him forthwith of this milerable world, being still troubled in following and maintaining of fuch great Armies together. But perceiving that in the daily Skirmifhes and bickerings they made. his men were always the stronger and ever had the better, that yet quickned his spirits again, and did put him in better heart. And furthermore, because that some of their own men had already yeelded themselves to their Enemies, and that it was suspected moreover divers others would do the like, that made many of Cassius friends which were of his mind before (when it came to be debated in Councill, whether the Battell should be fought or not) that they were then of Brutus mind. But yet was there one of Bruess friends called Atellius, that was against it, and was of opini- Atellius opinion that they should tarry to the next Winter. Brutus asked him what he should get by tarrying a year on for the Butlonger? If I get nothing elfe, quoth Atellim again, yet have I lived fo much longer. Caffin was tell. very angry with this answer; and Atellius was maliced and esteemed the worse for it of all men. Thereupon it was presently determined they should fight Battell the next day. So Bruttus all Supper time looked with a cheerfull countenance, like a man that had good hope, and talked very wifely of Philosophy, and after Supper went to bed. But touching Cassius, Messala reporteth that he supped by himself in his Tent with a few of his friends, and that all supper-time he looked very sadly, and was full of thoughts, although it was against his nature : and that after supper he took him by the hand, and holding him fast (in token of kindness, as his manner was) told him in Greek: Mssalat, I cassius words protest unto thee, and make thee my Witness, that I am compelled against my mind and will (as unto Messalat). Pomper the Great was) to jeopard the liberty of our Countrey to the hazard of a Battell. And yet the night bewe must be lively, and of good courage, considering our good fortune, whom we should wrong too fore the Bas-much to mistrust her, although we follow evill counsell. Messada writeth, that Cassius having spoken tell. these last words unto him, he bade him farewell, and willed him to come to supper to him the next night following, because it was his Birth-day. The next morning by break of day, the Signall of Battell was fet out in Brutes and Caffins Camp, which was an arming Scarlet Coat: and both the Chieftains spake together in the midft of their Armies. There Cassins began to speak first, and said: The Brutts and gods grant us O Brutus, that this day we may win the Field, and ever after to live all the rest of our Cassius talk life quietly one with another. But fith the gods have fo ordained it, that the greatest and chiefest things before the amongst men are most uncertain, and that if the Battell fall out otherwise to day then we wish or Battell. look for, we shall hardly meet again, what art thou then determined to do, to flie, or die? Bratus answered him, being yet but a young man, and not over greatly experienced in the world: I truft (I Brutus answer know not how) a certain rule of Philosophy, by the which I did greatly blame and reprove Case for to Cassing killing himfelf, as being no lawfull nor godly act, touching the gods: nor concerning men, valiant; not to give place and yeeld to divine Providence, and not constantly and patiently to take whatfoever it pleaseth him to send us, but to draw back and flie : but being now in the midst of the danger, I am of a contrary mind. For if it be not the will of God that this Battell fall out fortunate for us I will look no more for hope, neither feek to make any new supply for War again, but will rid me of this miserable world, and content me with my fortune. For, I give up my life for my Countrey in the Isles of March, for the which I shall live in another more glorious world. Cassing fell a laughing to hear what he faid, and embracing him, Come on then (faid he) let us go and charge our Enemies with this mind. For either we shall conquer, or we shall not need to fear the Conquerours. After this talk, they fell to consultation among their friends for the ordering of the Battell. Then Brutus prayed Coffins he might have the leading of the right Wing, the which men thought was far meeter for Caffine, both because he was the elder man, and also for that he had the better experience. But yet Cassing gave it him, and willed that Messala (who had charge of one of the warlikest Legions they had) at Philippes ashould be also in that Wing with Brutns. So Brutns presently sent out his Horsemen, who were excel- gainst Offavius lently well appointed, and his Footmen also were as willing and ready to give charge. Now Antonius men Casar and Andid caft a Trench from the Marrish by the which they lay, to cut off Caffins way to come to the Sea : tonius. and Cafar, at the least his Army ftirred not. As for Ottavius Cafar himself, he was not in his Camp, because he was fick. And for his People, they little thought the Enemies would have given them Battell, but onely have made fome light Skirmishes to hinder them that wrought in the Trench, and with their Darts and Slings to have kept them from finishing of their work : but they taking no heed to them that came full upon them to give them Battell, marvelled much at the great noise they heard, that came from the place where they were casting their Trench. In the mean time Brutus that led the right Wing, fent little Bils to the Colonels and Captains of private Bands, in the which he wrote the word of the Battell; and he himself riding a horse-back by all the Troops, did speak to them , and encouraged them to flick to it like men. So by this means very few of them under-

Legions were marvelloully featured and dispersed one from the other. For , first of all Messala's

fars Camp, out of the which (as himself writeth in his Commentaries) he had been conveyed away a little before through the counfell and advice of one of his friends called Marens Artorius: who dreaming in the night, had a Vision appeared unto him, that commanded Olfavius Cafar fhould be carried out of his Camp. Infomuch as it was thought he was flain, because the Little (which had nothing in it) was thrust through and through with Pikes and Darrs. There was great flaughter in this Camp. For amongst others, there were slain two thousand LACEDEMONIANS, who were arrived but even a little before, coming to aid Cefar. The other also that had not glanced by, but had given a charge full upon Cafara Battell, they eafily made them flie; because they were greatly troubled for the lofs of their Camp, and of them there were flain by hand three Legions. Then being very earnest to follow the chale of them that fled, they ran in amongst them hand over head into their Camp, and Brutus among them. But that which the Conqueroursthought not of, occasion shewed it unto them that were overcome; and that was, the left Wing of their Enemies left naked and unguarded of them of the right Wing, who were straied too far off, in following of them that were overthrown. So they gave a hot charge upon them. But, notwithstanding all the force they made, they could not break into the middest of their Battell, where they found them that received them, and valiantly made head against them. Howbeit they brake and overthrew the left Wing where Cassum was, by reason of the great disorder among them, and also because they had no intelligence how the right Wing had sped. So they chased them, beating them into their based, the which they spoiled, none of both the Chieftains being present there. For Antonius as it is reported, to flie the fury of the first charge, was gotten into the next Marish: and no man could tell what became of Ollavins Cefar, after he was carried out of his Camp. Infomuch that there Official Cafar were certain Souldiers that shewed their Swords bloudied, and faid that they had sain him, and did describe his sace, and shewed what age he was of. Furthermore, the Voward and the middest of Bruins Battell had already put all their Enemies to flight that withflood them, with great flaughter: fo that Brutus had conquered all on his fide, and Cassium had lost all on the other fide. For nothing undid them, but that Brutus went not to help Cassius, thinking he had overcome them, as himlest had done; and Cassius on the other side tarried not for Brutus, thinking he had been overthrown as himself was. And to prove that the Victory sell on Bruss side, Meffala confirmeth, that they wan three Eagles, and divers other Ensigns of the Enemies, and their Enemies wan never a one of theirs. Now Bratas returning from the chafe, after he had slain and sacked Cesars men, he wondered much that he could not fee Caffins Tent flanding up high as it was wont, neither the other Tents of his Camp flanding as they were before, because all the whole Camp had been spoiled, and the Tents thrown down, at the first coming of their Enemies. But they that were about Bruins, whole fight ferved them better, told him that they faw a great gliftering of harnels, and a number of filvered Targets, that went and came into Caffin Camp, and were not (as they took it) the Armours, nor the number of men that they had left there to guard the Camp: and yet that they faw not fuch a number of dead bodies, and great overthrow as there should have been, if so many Legions had been flain. This made Brutus at the first mistrust that which had hapned. So he appointed a number of men to keep the Camp of his Enemy which he had taken, and caused his men to be fent for that yet followed the chafe, and gathered them to gether, thinking to leade them to aid Coffins, who was in this state as you shall hear. First of all he was marvellous angry to see how Bruss men ran to give charge upon their Enemies, and tarried not for the word of the Battell, nor command-Brusts and his ment to give charge: and it grieved him beside, that after he had overcome them, his men sell ftraight to spoil, and were not carefull to compass in the rest of the Enemies behind: but with tarrying too long also, more then through the valiantness and forefight of the Captains his Enemies, Caffin found himfelf compafied in with the right wing of his Enemies Army. Whereupon his Hortmen brake immediatly, and fled for life towards the Sea. Furthermore perceiving his Footmen to give ground, he did what he could to keep them from flying, and took an Entign from one of the Entign-Bearers that fled, and fluck it faft at his feet: although with much ado he could scant keep his own Guard together. So Cassius himself was at length compelled to flie, with a few about him, unto a little Hill, from whence they might eafily fee what was done in all the plain: howbeit Cassium himself faw nothing, for his fight was very bad, faving that he faw (and yet with much ado) how the Enemis spoiled his Camp before his eyes. He saw also a great Troop of Horsemen, whom Bratim sent to aid him, and thought that they were his Enemies that followed him: but yet he fent Titinniut, one of them that was with him, to go and know what they were. Brusse Horfmen faw him coming afar off, whom when they knew that he was one of Caffins chiefest friends, they shouted out for joy, and they that were familiarly acquainted with him, lighted from their Horses, and went and embraced him. The reft compaffed him in round about on horfe-back, with Songs of Victory and great rushing of their The importance of error and militaking in Mart.

So the head was found fevered from the body: but after that time Pindariu was never feen more. Whereupon, Calling Il in by fome took occasion to say that he had slain his master without his commandment. But when he perceived by the cries and tears of his friends which tormented themselves, the missortune that had chanced to his Captain. Cassins. by miltaking, he drew out his fword, curfing himfelf a thousand times that he had tarried so long, and flew himselt presently in the field. Brueus in the mean time came forward still, and understood also that Cassius had been overthrown: but he knew nothing of his death, till he came very near to his Camp. So when he was come thither, after he had lamented the death of Cassium, calling him The death of the laft of all the ROMANS; being unpossible that ROME should ever breed again so noble and Tisinnins. fo valiant a man as he : he caused his body to be buried, and sent it to the City of THASSOS, fearing left his funerals within the Camp should cause great disorder. Then he called his fouldiers together, and did encourage them again. And when he faw that they had loft all their carriage, which they could not brook well, he promifed every man of them two thousand Drachmaes in recompence. After his fouldiers had heard his Oration, they were all of them prettily cheared again, wondring much at his great liberality, and waited upon him with great cries when he went his way, praifing him, for that he onely of the four Chieftains was not overcome in battle. And to speak the truth, his deeds shewed that he hoped not in vain to be coqueror. For with few Legions he had slain and driven all them away that made head against him: and if all his people had fought, and that the most of them had not outgone their enemies to run to spoil their goods, surely it was like enough he had flain them all, and had left never a man of them alive. There were flain of Bruttu fide a- The number of bout eight thousand men, counting the fouldiers slaves, whom Brutus called Brigas: and of the men slain at Enemies side, as Messala writeth, there were slain as he supposeth, more then twice as many moe; the battle of Wherefore they were more discouraged then Bruius, untill that very late at night, there was one of Philippes. Cassius men called Demetrius, who went unto Antonius, and carried his masters clothes, whereof he was stripped not long before, and his sword also. This encouraged Brutus Enemies, and made them fo brave, that the next morning betimes they stood in battle ray again before Brutus. But on Brutus fide, both his Camps stood wavering, and in that great danger. For his own Camp being full of prisoners, required a good guard to look unto them: and Cassius Camp on the other fide took the death of their Captain very heavily; and befide, there was some vile grudge between them that were overcome, and those that did overcome. For this cause therefore Bratus did set them in battle ray, but yet kept himfelf from giving battle. Now for the flaves that were prisoners, which were a great number of them, and went and came to and fro amongst the armed men, not without fuspicion: he commanded they should kill them. But for the free men, he sent them freely home, and faid, that they were better prisoners with his Enemies, then with him. For with them they were flaves and fervants: and with him, they were free men and Citizens. So when he faw that divers Captains and his friends did fo cruelly hate some, that they would by no means save their lives : Brue Brues clementhe himself hid them, and secretly sent them away. Among these prisoners, there was one Volumnius evand courtesse a jester, and Sacculio a common player, of whom Brutus made no account at all. Howbeit his friends brought them unto him, and did accuse them, that though they were prisoners, they did not let to laugh them to fcorn, and to jeft broadly with them. Brutus made no answer to it, because his head was occupied otherways. Whereupon Meffala Corvinus faid, that it were good to whip them on a scaffold, and then to send them naked, well whipped, unto the Captains of their enemies, to shew them their fhame, to keep such mates as those in their Camp, to play the fools, to make them sport. Some that flood by, laughed at his device. But Publius Cafea, that gave Julius Cafar the first wound when he was slain, said then: It doth not become us to be thus merry at Cassis sureries: and for thee Brutus, thou shalt shew what estimation thou madest of such a Captain thy compeer; by putting to death, or faving the lives of these bloods, who after will mock him and defame his memory. Brut me answered again in choller: Why then do ye come to tell me of it, Cufca, and do not your felves what you think good? When they heard him fay fo, they took his answer for a consent against these poor unfortunate men, to suffer them to do what they thought good; and therefore they carried them away, and flew them. Afterwards Brutus performed the promife he had made to the fouldiers, and gave them the two thousand Drachmaes a piece, but yet he first reproved them, because they went and gave charge upon the enemies at the first battle, before they had the word of battle given them: and made them a new promise also, that if in the second battle they sought like men, he would give them the fack and spoil of two Cities, to wit, THESSALONICA and LACEDEMON. In all Brutus life there is but this onely fault to be found, and that is not to be Brutus fault gain-faid: though Antonius and Offavius Cafar did reward their fouldiers far worfe for their victo- wilely excufed ty. Where in contrary manner they had so great an opinion of Brutus vertue, that the common voice and opinion of the world would not fuffer him, neither to overcome, nor to fave himself, otherwise then justly and honestly, and specially after Cassini death; whom men burdened, that oftentimes he moved Brutus to great cruelty. now, like as the Mariners on the fea after the rudder of their ships is broken by tempest, do feek to nail on some other piece of wood in lieu thereof, and do help themselves to keep them from hurr. as much as may be upon that instant danger: even so Brutus, having such a great Army to govern, and his affairs flanding very ticklish, and having no other Captain co-equal with him in dignity and auditority, he was forced to employ them he had, and likewife to be ruled by them in many things, and was of mind himself also to grant them any thing, that he thought might make them serve like noble fouldiers at time of need. For Cafius fouldiers were very evil to be ruled, and did fhew themfelves very stubborn and lusty in the Camp, because they had no Chieftain that did command them. but yet rankcowards to their Enemies, because they had once overcome them. On the other side. Oftavine Celar and Antonisa were not in much better ftate : for first of all they lacked victuals, And because they were lodged in low places, they looked to abide a hard and sharp Winter, being camped Brains victory as they were by the Marth fide, and also for that after the battle there had fain plenty of Rain about the Autumn, where through, all their Tents were full of mire and dirt, the which by reason of the Wonderfull fa cold did freeze incontinently. But beside all these discommodities, there came news unto them of mine among the great loss they had of their men by lea. For Brutus thips met with a great aid and supply of Cofor's foulding with the great loss they had of their men by lea. men, which were lent them out of ITALY, and they overthrew them in such fort, that there scaped but few of them; and yet they were fo famished, that they were compelled to eat the tackle and fails of their ships. Thereupon they were very desirous to sight a battle again, before Brutus should have intelligence of this good news for him: for it chanced so, that the battle was fought by sea, on the The ignorance felf fame day it was fought by land. But by ill fortune, rather then through the malice or negligence of the Captains, this victory came not to Brntus ear till twenty days after. Forhad he known of it before, he would not have been brought to have fought a fecond battle, confidering that he had excellent good provision for his Army for a long time; and besides, lay in a place of great strength, fo as his Camp could not be greatly hurt by the Winter, nor also distressed by his enemies : and further, he had been a quiet Lord, being a conqueror by fea, as he was also by land. This would have marvellously encouraged him. Howbeit the state of Rome (in my opinion) being now brought to that pass, that it could no more abide to be governed by many Lords, but required one onely absolute Governour : God, to prevent Brutus that it should not come to his Government, kept this victory from his knowledge, though indeed it came but a little too late. For the day before the last butle was given, very late in the night came Cloding, one of his Enemies into his Camp, who told that Cafar hearing of the overthrow of his Army by fea, defired nothing more then to fight a battle before Brutus understood it. Howbeit they gave no credit to his words, but despised him so much, that they would not vouchfafe to bring him unto Brutus, because they thought it was but a lie devised to be the better welcome for this good news. The felf fame night, it is reported that the monftrous spirit which had appeared before unto Brutus in the City of SARDIS, did now appear again unto him The evil spirit in the self same shape and form, and so vanished away, and said never a word. Now Publics Volumappeared again nim, a grave Philosopher, that had been with Brutus from the beginning of this War, he doth make no mention of this spirit, but saith: that the greatest Eagle and Ensign was covered over with a swarm of Bees, and that there was one of the Captains, whose Arm suddenly fell a sweating, that it dropped oil of Roses from him, and that they oftentimes went about to dry him, but all would do no good, And that before the battle was fought, there were two Eagles fought between both Armies, and all the time they fought, there was a marvellous great filence all the valley over, both Armies being one before the other, marking this fight between them; and that in the end, the Eagle towards Brains gave over and flew away. But this is certain, and a true tale, that when the gate of the Campwas open, the first man the Standard-bearer met that carried the Eagle, was an ÆTHIOPIAN, whom the fouldiers for ill luck mangled with their fwords. Now after that Brutus had brought his Army into the field, and had fet them in battle ray, directly against the Vaward of his Enemy, he pauled a Bruus second long time before he gave the signal of battle. For Brutus riding up and down to view the bands and companies, it came in his head to miftruft some of them; besides, that some came to tell him to much as he thought. Moreover he saw his horsemen set forward but faintly, and did not go luftly to give charge, but still staid to see what the sootmen would do. Then suddenly, one of the chiefelt Knights he had in all his Army called Camulatina, and that was alway marvelloufly efteemed of for his valiantness, until that time: he came hard by Brutus on horseback, and rode before his face to yield himfelf unto his Enemies. Brutus was marvelloully forry for it, wherefore partly for angu, and partly for fear of greater treason and rebellion, he suddenly canfed his Army to march, being pult three of the clock in the after noon. So in that place where he himself fought in person, he had the better: and brake into the left wing of his enemies, which gave him way, through the help of his horfmenthat gave charge with his footmen, when they faw the enemies in amaze and afraid. Howbeit, the other also on the right wing, when the Captains would have had them to have marched; they were afraid to have been compassed in behind, because they were sewer in number then their Enemies, and therefore did spread themselves, and leave the midst of their battle. Whereby they having weakened themselves, they could not withstand the force of their Enemies, but turned tail straint and fied. And those that had put them to flight, came in straight upon it to compass Brutus behind, who Brutus valiant- in the midst of the conflict, did all that was possible for a skilfull Captain and valiant fouldier; both for his wisdom, as also his hardiness, for the obtaining of victory. But that which wan him the victory at the first battle, did now lose it him at the second. For at the first time the Enemies that were put to flight, there were few flain: and they that faved themselves by speed, being afraid because they had been overcome, did discourage the rest of the Army when they came to joyn with them. and filled all the Army with fear and diforder. There was the fon of Marcus Cato flain, valiantly fighting The death of among the lufty youths. For, notwithstanding that he was very weary and over-harried, yet would he the valiant not therefore fly, but manfully fighting and laying about him, telling aloud his name, and also his fa- young man Cather same, at length he was beaten down among many other dead bodies of his enemies, which he had for the son of flain round about him.

So there were slain in the field, all the chiefest Gentlemen and Nobility that Marcus Care. were in his Army, who valiantly ran into any danger to fave Brutus life: amongst whom there was one of Brutus friends called Lucilius, who fee a troop of barbarous men, making no reckoning of all one of they met in their way, but going altogether right against Bruns, he determined to stay them with the hazard of life; and being left behind, told them that he was Bruns: and because they should The fidelity of believe him, he prayed them to bring him to Antonius, for he faid he was afraid of Cafar, and that he Lucilius unto did truft Antonius better. These barbarous men being very glad of this good hap, and thinking them. Brutus. felves happy men, they carried him in the night, and fent some before unto Antonius, to tell him of their coming. He was marvellous glad of it, and went out to meet them that brought him. Others also understanding that they brought Bruens prisoner, they came from all parts of the Camp to see him, some pittying his hard fortune, and others saying, that it was not done like himself, so cowardly to be taken alive of the barbarous people for fear of death. When they came near together, Antonius staid a while bethinking himself how he should use Bruens. In the mean time Lucilius was brought to him, who with a bold countenance faid : Antonius, I dare affure thee, that no enemy hath taken, or shall take Marcus Brutus alive: and I beseech God keep him from that fortune: but wheresoever he be found, alive or dead, he will be found like himself: and touching my felf, I am come unto thee. having deceived these men of Arms, making them believe that I was Brutus, and do not refuse to suffer any torment thou wilt put me to. Lucilius words made them all amazed that heard him. Antonins on the other fide, looking upon all them that had brought him, faid unto them: My friends, I think ye are forry you have failed of your purpole, and that you think this man hath done you great wrong: but I affure you, you have taken a better booty then that you followed. For, inftead of an Enemy, you have brought me a friend : and for my part, if you had brought me Brutm alive, truly I cannot tell what I should have done to him. For I had rather have such men as this my friends then mine enemies. Then he embraced Lucilius, and arthat time delivered him to one of his friends in cuftody; and Lucilius ever after served him faithfully, even to his death. Now Brutus having passed a Brutus flying, little River, environed on either fide with high Rocks, and shadowed with great trees, being then dark night, he went no further, but staid at the foot of a Rock with certain of his Captains and friends that followed him, and looking up to the firmament that was full of stars, fighing, he rehearfed two verfes, of the which Volumnius wrote the one, to this effect:

And faith, that he had forgotten the other. Within a little while after, naming his friends that he Applan mounhad seen slain in battle before his eyes, he fetched a greater figh then before, specially when he came eth this by to name Labio and Flavius, of the whom one was his Lieutenant, and the other Captain of the Pioners Antonius. of his Camp. In the mean time one of his company being thirsty, and seeing Brutus thirsty also, he ran to the River for water, and brought it in his Sallet. At the same time they heard a noise on the other fide of the River: whereupon Volumnius took Dardanus, Brutus fervant with him, to fee what it was : and returning straight again, he asked if there were any water left. Brutus smiling, gently told him, All is drunk, but they shall bring you some more. Thereupon he sent him again that went for water before, who was in great danger of being taken by the enemies, and hardly scaped, being fore hurt. Furthermore, Brutus thought there were not many of his men flain in battle : and to know the truth of it, there was one called Statilius, that promifed to go through his Enemies, for otherwise it was impossible to go to see their Camp: and thereupon if all were well, he would lift up a torch-light in the Air, and then return again with speed to him. The torch-light was lift up as he had promiled, for Statilius went thither : and a good while after Brutus feeing that Statilius came not again, he faid: If Seatilius be alive he will come again. But his evil fortune was such, that as he came back, he fell into his Enemies hands and was flain. Now the night being far fpent, Brutus as he fate bow- The death of ed towards Clitus one of his men, and told him somewhat in his ear: the other answered him not, Statistical but fell a weeping. Thereupon he proved Dardanus, and faid somewhat also to him: and at the last he came to Volumnius himself, and speaking to him in Greek, prayed him for the studies sake which brought them acquainted together, that he would help him to put his hand to his fword, to thrust it in him to kill him. Volumnius denied his request, and so did many others: and amongst the reft, one of them faid, there was no tarrying for them there, but they must needs fly. Then Bru- Brutus faying tus rifing up, faid, We must fly indeed, but it must be with our hands, not with our feet. Then ta- of flying with king every man by the hand, he faid these words unto them with a chearfull countenance: It re- hands, and not joyceth my heart, that none of my friends hath failed me at my need, and I do not complain with feet. of my fortune, but onely for my Countries fake: for as for me, I think my felf happier then they that have overcome, confidering that I leave a perpetual fame of vertue and honesty, the

Having so faid, he prayed every man to shift for himself, and then he went a little afide with two or three onely, among the which Strate was one, with whom he came first acquainted by the study of Rhetorick. He came as near to him as he could, and taking his sword by the hilt with both his hands, and falling down upon the point of it, ran himfelf through. Others fay, that not be. but Serato (at his request) held the fword in his hand, and turned his head aside, and that Brutus fell down upon it, and so ran himself through, and died presently. Messala, that had been Brutus great friend, reconciled afterwards to be Ollavisu Cafar's friend, and shortly after, Cafar being at good leifure, he brought Serate, Bratus friend unto him, and weeping, faid: Cafar, behold, here is he that did the laft service to my Brutus. Then Cafar received him, and afterwards he did him as faithfull fervicein all his affairs, as any GRECIAN elfe he had about him, untill the Battle of Ac-TIUM. It is reported also that that Meffala himself answered Cafar one day when he gave him great praife before his face, that he had fought valiantly, and with great affection for him at the Battle of ACTIUM (notwithstanding that he had been his cruel enemy before, at the battle of PHILIPPES, for Brutus fake) I ever loved, faid be, to take the best and justest part. Now Antonius having found Brutus body, he cauled it to be wrapped up in one of the richest. Coat-armors he had. Afterwards also, Antonius understanding that his Coat-armor was stoln, he put the thief to death that had stoln Percis, Brutes it, and fent the affices of his Body unto Servilla his Mother. And for Porcia, Brutes Wife, Nicolans the Philosopher, and Valerius Maximus do write, that she determining to kill her self (her Parents and friends carefully looking to her to keep her from it) took hot burning coals and caft theminto her mouth, and kept her mouth so close, that she choaked her self. There was a letter of Brunn found written to his friends, complaining of their negligence, that his Wife being fick, they would not help her, but fuffered her to kill her felf; chusing to die, rather then to languish in pain. Thus it feemeth that Nicolaus knew not well the time, fith the letter (at the least if it were Brutus letter) doth plainly declare the disease and love of this Lady, and also the manner of her death,

O come now to compare these two noble personages, it is certain that both of them having great gifts in them, namely this for the first, that by small occasions they made themselves great men : herein Dion of both deserveth the chief praise. For he had no co-helper to bring him unto that greatness, as Brutus had of Cassins, who doubtless was not comparable unto him for vertue and respect of Honour, though otherwise in respect of War, he was no less wise and valiant then he. For many do impute unto Cassius, the first beginning and original of all the War and enterprise : and faid it was he that did encourage Brutus to con-

Spire Cafar's death; whereas Dian furnished himself with armor, ships, and souldiers, and wan those friends and companions also that did help him to prosecute his war. Nor he did not as Brutus, who rose to greatness by his enterprises, and by War got all his strength and riches; but he in contrary manner, spent of his own goods to make War for the Liberty of his Countrey, and disbursed of his own money that should have kept him in his banishment. Furthermore, Brutus and Cassius were compelled of necessity to make Wars, because they could not have lived safely in peace when they were driven out of ROME, for that they were condemned to death, and purfued by their enemies. And for this cause thereby they were driven to hazard themselves in War, more for their own safety, then for the liberty of their Countrey: whereas Dion on the other fide, living more merrily and fafely in his banishment, when the Tyrant Dionysis himself that had banished him, did but put himself to that danger, to deliver SICILE from bondage. Now the matter was not alike unto the ROMANS, to be delivered from the Government of Casar, as it was for the Syracusians to be rid of Dionyfim tyranny. For Dionyfim denied not, that he was a Tyrant, having filled Sicile with fuch mifery and calamity. Howbeit, the domination of Cafar when it came to be established, did indeed much hurt at the first beginning thereof unto those that opposed against it: but asterwards, unto them that being overcome had received his Government, it feemed he rather had the name and opinion onely of a Tyrant, then otherwise that he was so indeed. For there never followed any tyrannical or cruel act, but contrarily, it feemed that he was a mercifull Physician, whom God had ordained of his speciall Grace to be Governour of the Empire of Rome, and to set all things again at quiet flay, the which required the counfell and authority of an absolute Prince. And therefore the ROMANS were marvellous forry for Cafar after he was flain, and afterwards would never pardon them that had flain him. On the other fide, the cause why the Syracusians did most accuse Dion, was, because he did let Diony sim escape out of the Castle of SYRACUSA, and because he did not overthrow and deface the Tomb of his Father. Furthermore, touching the Wars, Dion alway shewed himself a Captain unreproveable, having wifely and skillfully taken order for those things which he had enterprised of his own head and counsell, and did amend the faults others committed, and brought things to better state then he found them ; whereas it seemeth that Brutus did not wisely to receive the second battle, considering his rest stood upon it. For after he had lost the battle, it was impossible ever for him to rife again: and therefore his heart failed him, and so gave up all, and never durst strive with his evil fortune as Pompey did, considering that he had present cause enough in the field to hope of his fouldiers, and being besides a dreadfull Lord all the sea over. Furthermore, the greatest reproach they could object against Brutus, was, that Julim Cafar having faved his life, and pardoned fo many prisoners taken in battle, according to his request, taking him for his friend and honouring him above all his other friends, Brutus notwithstanding had imbrued his hands in his blood, wherewith they could never reprove Dion. For on the contrary fide, so long as Dion was Dionyfins friend and kinfman, he did alway help him to order and govern his affairs. But after he was banified his Countrey, and that his Wife was torcibly married to another man, and his goods also tala what things ken from him, then he entred into just and open wars against Dionysius the Tyrant. But in this point they were contrary together. For that wherein their chiefeft praife conflitted, to wit, the barred of Tyrants and wicked men, was most true and fincere in Bratus. For having no private cause of complaint or grudge against Cafar, he ventured to kill him, onely to fet his Countrey again at liberty: whereas if Dion had not received private caule of quarrell against Dionysing, he would never have made War It Dion nau not received payers to the EpiPles, where is plainly feen, that Dion being driven out with him. The which Plate proveth in his EpiPles, where is plainly feen, that Dion being driven out of the Tyrans Court against his will, and not putting himself to voluntary banishment, he drave our Dionysia. Furthermore, the respect of the Commonwealth caused Britis, that before was Pompey's enemy, 16 Beeinne his friend, and entemy unco Cafar that before was his friend, onely referring his chemy, to occome my ricin, any chemy unto Cejar that octore was his friend, onerly reterring his friendship and carnity into the confideration of justice and equity. And Dion did many things his Dionyjus fake and behefit, all the while he truthed him; and when he began to missivus him, then for anger he made was withhim. Wherefore all his friends believed, that after he had driven out Diotor anger the many watthans. The government on himself, abusing the people with a more courteous and gentle title then the Hame of a Tyrant. But for Brains, his very enemies themselves contessed, that of all those that conspired Cefar's death, he onely had no other end and intent to attempt his enterprise, but to reftore the Empire of ROME again to her former state and government. And furthermore, it was not a like thing to deal with Dionyfine, as it was to have to do with Julius (afar. For no man that was not a nice tuning to use a want James and the most part of his time in knew Dionysius, but would have despited him, considering that he spent the most part of his time in drinking, dicing, and haunting lewd womens company: but to have undertaken to destroy Julius Cefar, and not to have firunk back for fear of his great wildom, power, and fortune, confidering that his very name was dreadfull unto every man, and fuffered not the Kings of PART HIA and INDIA to be in reft for him : this could not but come of a marvellous noblemind of him that for fear never fainted, nor let fall any part of his courage. And therefore, fo foon as Dien came into Sicile, many thoulands of men came and joyned with him against Dianysius. But the same of Julius Cafar did set up his friends again after his death, and was of fuch force, that it raifed a young ftripling Offavius Cefar (that had no means nor power of himself) to be one of the greatest men of Nom E: and they ufed him as a remedy to encounter Amenium malice and power. And if men will fay, that Dion drave out the Tyrant Dion jim by force of arms, and fundry battles : and that in contrary manner Brutus flew Cafar, being a naked man, and without his guard : then do I answer again, that it was a noble part, and of a wife Captain, to chufe fo apt a time and place, to come upon a man of fo great power, and to find him naked without his guard. For he went not fuddenly in a rage and alone, or with a small company to affail him; but his enterprife was long time before determined of, and that with divers men, of all the which, not a man of them once failed him; but it is rather to be thought, that from the beginning he chofe them boneft men, or elfe by that his choife of them be made them good men. Whereas Dion, either from the beginning made no wife choife in truffing of evil men, or else because he could not tell how to use them he had chosen, of good men he made them become evil : so that neither the one nor the other could be the part of a wife man. For Plato himfelf reproveth him, for that he had chosen such men for his friends, that he was slain by them : and after he was slain no man would then revenge his death. And in contrary manner, of the enemies of Brutus, the one (who was Antonius) Bruzes nonoured of his eneof him. For at MILLAN (a City of GAUL on ITALY fide) there was an image of his in brafs, very likeumto him : the which Cefar afterwards passing that way, beheld very advitedly, for that it was made by an excellent workman, and was very like him, and fo went his way. Then he staid suddenly again, and called for the Governors of the City, and before them all told them that the Citizens were his enemies, and traitors unto him, because they kept an enemy of his among them. The Governors of the City at the first were associated at it, and stously denied it: and none of them knowing what enemy he meant, one of them looked on another. Of avoiss Cofar then turning him unto Bruss status, bending his brows, faid unto them: this man you fee flanding uphere, is he not our enemy? THE LIFE OF ARATUS.

Ann. Mund. 3677.

Hryfippus the Philosopher (my friend Polycrates) being afraid, as it seemeth. of the evil found of an ancient Proverb not rightly as it was spoken, and in use, but as he thought it best, he wrote in this manner:

What children do their ancestors commend, But those whom fortune favours to the end?

But Dionylodorus TRO EZENIAN reproving him, doth rehearse the proverb rightly as indeed it is:

what children do their ancestors commend,

But those whose life is vertuous to the end? Saying, that this proverb stoppeth their mouths, who of themselves are unworthy of praile, and yet are ftill boafting of the vertues of their ancestors, whose praise they highly extoll. But before those that (as Pindarus faith)

(As thy felf that conformeft thy life unto the examples and manners of thy vertuous ancestors:) it is no small good hap for them, often to remember the noble Deeds of their parents in hearing them spoken of, or otherwise for themselves oftentimes to remember some notable doings of their parents. For our ancestors, in them, it is not for lack of commendable vertues, that they report others praife and glory : but in wherein profijoyning their own vertues, to the vertues of their anceftors, they do encreafe their glory, as inhering their politics, they will be a challenging their defent by blond. Therefore, having written the life of destars its. their vertuous life, as challenging their descent by blood. Therefore, having written the life of Aratus thy Countreyman, and one of thy ancestors whose glory and greatness thou dost not blemish, I do fend it unto thee, not that I think but that thou hast more diligently then any man else searched out all his deeds and fayings : but yet, because that thy two sons, Polycrates and Pythocles, reading and still hearing something reported, might be brought up at home by the example of their ancestors, whose deeds shall lie before them to follow. For he loveth himself more, then he regardeth persect vertue, or his credit: that thinketh himself so perfect, as he need not sollow any others example.

rant of Sixyone flew Clinian, and put to death some of his parents and friends, drave away others, and sought also to put his fon Aratus to death, that was then but feven years old. But in this hurly burly and tumult. Arter; the son Arter Hying out of his fathers house, among them that ran away, and wandring up and down of cliniar, sea the City, being scared and afraid, finding no man to help him: by good fortune he got into a woped the hands of the tyrant mans house, called Sofo, which was Abantidas sifter, and wife unto Periphanua, his sather Cliniae brother. She being of a noble mind, and judging that the child Aratus by Gods providence fled unto her; hid him in her house, and in the night secretly sent him unto the City of ARGOS. Now Arans malice after that Arans had scaped, and was fafe from this danger : from that time there bred in him a veheagainst tyrants, ment malice against Tyrants, the which still encreated in him as he grew in years. So he was vertuously brought up in the City of Augos, with his fathers friends : and perceiving with himself that he waxed big and, ftrong, he disposed his body to divers exercises, and became so excellent in them, that he contended in five manner of exercises, and oftentimes bare the best away. And in his images Aratus favour, and statues, he appeared in face full and well liking, as one that fed well, and the majesty of his commenance arguerit that he used such exercise: and such commonly are large eaters. From whence if catine, that he did not give himself formuch to pleading, as peradventure was requisite for a Go-Arants wrote a vernour of a Commonwealth. Howbeit, some do judge by his Commentaries he wrote, that he book of Com- had an eloquenter tongue then feemed unto fome : because he wrote them in hafte, having other bufiness in hand, and even as things came first into his mind. But afterwards, Dinias and Aristotle Abanildas the Logician flew Abantidas, who did commonly use to fit in the Market-place, to hear their matters, Tyrant flain, and to talk with them. And this gave them good means and opportunity to work their feat they did. After Abantidas death, his father Pafeas possessed the Tyranny : whom Nicocles afterwards flew also by treason, and made himself Tyrant in his place. It is reported that this Nicocles did lively resemble the countenance of Persander, the son of Cypfelus, as Orontes Persian was very like unto Alemaon, the fon of Amphiarem: and another young LACEDEMONIAN, unto Helter of TROY, whom Myrsillus writeth, was troden under mens feet, through the over-great press of people that came to see him, when they heard of it. This Nicocles was a Tyrant four moneths together, in the which he did wonderfull great hurt to the City, and had almost loft it; the ÆTOLIANS coming on a sudden, who were like to have taken it. Now Aratus was come to the flate of a stripling, and was greatly eftermed for the noble house he came of, and also for the great courage they found in him, which was no fuch matter: and befides that, he had a majesty in his countenance, being wifer then was looked for in a young man of his years: therefore the banifhed men from the City of SICYONE, repaired unto him before any other man. Nicocles for his part also was not careless of his doings, but had an eye ever to see what Arasus intended, although he little miftrufted any fuch bold enterprife, nor fo dangerous an exploit of him : but did onely conjecture that he did ftir up the Kings which had been his dead fathers friends. And fo indeed Arans Army gooth took that courfe. But when he faw that Antigons filldelayed his promifes, and did always track over his Counting, and that the hope of aid from King Prolomy of ÆGYPT was fo far off, at length he determined trey from the to undertake to deftroy the Tyrant himself. So he first consulted with Aristomachus and Ecdelus; of the which the one was banished from SICYONE, and the other an ARCADIAN, from the City of In another MEGALIPOLIS, a Philosopher, and a valiant man of his hands and had been Scholar unto Areahim Ecleman, filans the Academick, in the City of ATHENS. Thele two men being contented to joyn with Ariftomichus Aratus, he practifed with other of the banished men also : of the which there were some that were and Essetur, do ashamed, not to be partakers of his hope and noble attempt, and so did also joyn with him. Howjoyn with det beit the most part of them did not onely refuse to enter into that practife, but further, went about to dissignate Arains from his enterprise, saying : that for lack of knowledge and experience, he understood not the danger in undertaking such a matter, altogether so unlikely. Now as Araiss was thinking in his mind to keep a certain place in the territory of SICYONE, from whence they might make War with the Tyrant, there came a prisoner unto them out of the City of ARGOS, that had broken prison from the Tyrant of SICYONE and was brother unto Xenocles, one of the banished men. He being brought by the same Xenocles unto Aratus, told that in the place whereby he saved himself, the ground within was almost as high as the top of the wall, the which in that part joyned unto high ftony places: and that without the wall the height was not so great, but that it was easily scalable with ladders. When Aratus heard that, he sent two of his men, Scuthas and Technon, with Xenocles to view the wall, being determined if it were true, rather to prove fecretly to execute his pretended enterprise, and quickly to put it to a venture, then to begin a long War, and to prepare an open Army, he being a private man, to go against the power of a Tyrant. Xenocles being returned again to Aratus, after he had measured the heighth of the wall, he reported that the place was not unscalable, but yet very hard to come to it undiscovered, because of certain little curst curs a Gardiner kept hard by the wall, which would never leave barking. Howbeit Aratus would not leave off his enterprise to. Now it was not strange to see every man prepare themselves of Armor and Weapon, because at that time there were great robberies and cruel murthers committed by highways, and one would affault another: but for the ladders, Euphranor that was a Carpenter and maker of Engines, did not flick to make them openly, because his common occupation did take away all suspition why they were made. For this Carpenter was himself also a banished man from SICYONE, as the relidue were. Furthermore, Arains friends he had in ARGOS, of those few men they had,

did every man of them lend him ten men, and armed thirty of his own men : belides them, Aratus himself also did hire some pretty number of souldiers, by the practise of Xenophilus, whom the Arteus prepa-Captains of the thieves did furnish. They were given to understand that they should be led to the ration to deliterritory of Sicyone, to take a prey of cattle and colts of the King, and they were fent before, ver his Counterritory of Sicyone, to take a prey or sattle and to meet together at the tower of Polygno-fome one way, fome another, with commandment; all to meet together at the tower of Polygno-ramy. tus, where they should tarry. So he sent Caphesias also before, without any weapons, with four companions with him: who should come to this Gardiners house in the night, like strangers and travellers, to lie in his house, and to lock him up and his dogs, because they had no other device to get in but that way. But in the mean time, there were certain fpials of Nicooles the Tyrant difcovered, that walked up and down the City (making no commenance of any matter) to fee what Arans did. Wherefore, Arans went out of his house early in the morning (as his manner was) and walked to the Market-place with his friends. Then he went to the shew-place (or place of exer. Aratus policy cifes) and there stripped himself, anointed him, and wrestled, and in the end took certain of the to deceive Niyoung Gentlemen home with him, that were wont to make merry, and to pass the time away with cocles spials. him: and immediately after, one of his fervants was feen in the Market-place, carrying Garlands of flowers, another allo was feen buying of Links and Torches, and another hiring of thefe common dancing and finging women, which follow feafts and banquets with their influments. Nicoeles spials seeing that, were deceived; for one of them laughing on another said, that they might easily fee by that, there was nothing more fearfull and timorous then a Tyrant : confidering that Nicocles being Lord of fo great a City, was afraid of a young stripling, that spent all that he could rap and rend to keep him in his banishment, upon vain banquets and feasts at noon days. And thus were the Tyrants spials finely mocked. Aratus self departed immediately after dinner out of Argos, and went unto the fouldiers, whom he had appointed before to meet him at the Tower of Polygnotus. and led them straight unto NEMEA. There he told them openly his full intent and purpose, having before made an Oration unto them to encourage them, and also made them marvellous fair promises. Then he gave them for their watch-word Apollo favourable, and so went directly to the City of SICYONE, marching with great speed at the first because of the going down of the Moon, and afterwards slacked his pace a little, so that they had Moon light all the way as they came, and the Moon went not down, untill they were come to the Gardiners house that was hard by the wall. So Caphesias, whom he had sent before unto the Gardiners house, came to meet with Aratus, and brought him word that he could not take the dogs, because they ran away; howbeit that he had made fast the Gardiner in his own house. This discouraged the most part of all the company, who would needs have him in any case to return back again. But Aratus then began to comfort them, and promifed that he would lead them back again, if it chanced that the dogs were too buse with them: and therewithall presently caused the ladder men to go before, whom Ecdelus and Mnasitheus led, and he himself came fair and sofily after. The dogs made a foul barking, and Aratus dangers were baiting about Ecdelus and his company. This notwithflanding, they came fafe to the wall, and in delivering did fet up their fealing ladders. But even as the first men gor upon them, the Captain of the watch from they the bed given place to him the flould ward in the greater was the first men they transfer the state of the s that had given place to him that should ward in the morning, came by chance, and passed hard by ny of Nicoles. them, visiting the fouldiers with a little bell, and there was a number of torches, and a great noise of men that followed him. They that were upon the ladders hearing them, ducked down, and ftirred not : and thereby the fouldiers that passed by them, could not see them. But now the new morning warch came toward them allo, which did put them in great danger to be discovered: but yet they once again scaped them, and were not discovered, because the second watch went beyond them, and stayed not. Then Ecdelus and Mnasirbem immediately scaled the wall, and sent Technon with all possible speed unto Aratm, to will him to make all the haste he could to come to them. Now there was no great distance between the Garden where the dogs were, and the wall, and a little Tower where they kept a great Greyhound to keep watch: but the Greyhound never heard their coming, either because he was a cowardly cur of nature, or else for that he had been over-coursed and wearied the day before. But the Gardiners little curs that bawled and barked beneath, had wakened the Greyhound with their barking, who at the first began to answer them with a fost girning; but when they came by the Tower where he lay, he barked out aloud, that all the place thereabouts rang of his barking. Infomuch that the Scout which was farther off, called aloud to the Hunt that kept the dog, and asked what he ailed, that he made fuch a barking, and whether there were any thing flirring or not, that angred him. The Hunt within the Tower answered, that it was nothing, but that his dog was naked, and fell a barking at the lights of the watch that paffed by, and at the noise of the bell. This made Aratus fouldiers a great deal the bolder: because they thought that the Hunt had been made privy to their enterprise, and that he went about to hide their secret attempt, and hoped also that there were many other within the City that would further their enterprise. When they came to get up upon the wall, it was of a great heighth and very dangerous, because the ladders shook and bowed, by reason of the weight of the men, unless they did come up fair and softly one after another. Furthermore, the time did put them in some perill, because the cocks began to crow, and the Countrey folk that brought things to the Market to fell, began to come apace to

into the City to his friends, to will them to come unto him. Thereupon they ran out of every corner to Aratus. Now the day began to break, and straight the Theatre was full of people that gathered together, because of the noise and fir they heard in the City, not knowing what the matter meant, untill at length an Herauld proclaimed with open voice that it was Arans the fon of Clinias who called his Countrymen and Citizens to the recovery of their liberty. Then they perfunding themfelves that the thing which they long withed and looked for, was now come to pais, they ran all in a troop together to the Tyrants houle, and fee it on fire. But the flame rofe fo high and great after the fire had taken it in every part, that it was feen to the City of CORINTH: infomuch that the CORINTHIANS wondering what the matter should be, were in mind to have gone to help it.

Now for Vicaeles, he saved himself, and got out of the City by secret vaults he had made under the ground. The fouldiers on theother fide quenching the fire with the help of the Citizens, did fack all they found in the Tyrants Pallace which Aratus hindred not, but did moreover make all the reft of the Tyrants goods common amongst them. So his enterprife had so good success, that there was none of his own company slain he brought with him, neither any of their Enemies that were within the City; fortune kept this exploit fo pure and clean from any bloodfred. Then of raths reftored fourfrore men unto their lands and goods again, whom the Tyrant Nicoeks had be nilhed: and others also, that had been banished by former Tyrants, to the number of five hundred aren, who had been well-near fitty years space banished out of their Countrey. Now the most of them being come home poor and needy, would have entred on their goods and lands they enjoyed before: and so entring again upon their lands in their Countrey, and their houses in the ry, they amazed Araus withall, seeing Antigoms on the one side practife all the means he could to win Signor being now free, and they all in an uproar and mutiny in the City. There-Aratus joyneth fore, following the best counsel he could think upon and devise, considering the danger of the prethe City of Si- fent time: he joyned the City in league and friendship with the ACHAIANS, and of them all made concurred but one body. And because the Citizens of Sicyone were Dorians, they were glad to submit themselves to be governed and protected by the name of the ACHAIANS, who were at that time of no great fame nor power. For they dwelt in little Villages, and had no great bounds of lands, neither were they very special good, for that they stood upon the sea side, where was no manner of haven nor port, but stones, and Rocks good store: and the sea beating upon them, did eat into the main land. This notwithflanding, they made their enemies know, that the power of GREECE when it was united and governed by good policy, was of great force and almost invincible. For the ACHAIANS being in comparison of the ancient force of GREECE, of no regard, and but a part of one City enfeebled with Civil and Poraign War; fo long as they could fubmit themselves to be ruled by the wisdom and vertue of their Captain, and not envy nor malice his prosperity and soveraignty: they did not onely maintain themselves as free men, in the midst of the servitude of to many great Cities, large and mighty, but did also deliver many other people of GREECE from Arausteletted their Tyrants. Now, for Mrattu manners: he was one that by nature loved Civil Government, and equity among Citizens in one felf City: he was nobly minded, and more painful about the affairs of the Commonweal, then carefull of his own business, and hated Tyrants to the death, and employed his good or evil will wholly for the fervice of the Commonwealth. And therefore he feemed not to be fo found a friend, as he was a gentle and mercifull enemy: framing himself in either of both, a stime served for the Commonwealth. To be thort, it was a generall and common voice among all the Cities Confederate, in private company, and at open meetings in the Theatres: that Aratus loved nothing but verue, and honefty; that in open Warshe was not fo valiant and couragious, as he was crafty and fibble to take a City on the fudden. Furthermore, though he was valiant to attempt many great things, the which men thought he would never have brought to pals : yet it feemeth he left many things polfible undone the which he might eafily have done, for that he durft not venture on them. For as Why Owls fee there be heafts whose fight is perfect by night, and by day they can fee nothing, because the substitute to of the human and maishure in their terms of the human and maishure in their terms. ty of the humor and moisture in their eyes is dried up, and cannot abide the bright light of the day: and not by day, even fo, men that otherwife by nature 210 very wife, are easily afraid of danger, when they must Men ignorant venture on it at noon days: where contrarily they are bold in fecret enterprifes, fuddenly to attempt of Philosophy any thing. Now this contrariety and difference in men well brought up groweth through ignorance biltered up. and lack of instruction in Philosophy, which of it felf doth nourish vertue, as fruit that springeth up without planting, or help of mans hand. But this is best discerned by examples. So Aratu having joyned himself and his City SICYONE unto the ACHAIANS, and serving in person as a man of Arms amongst the rest, he was marvellously beloved of his Generals, that saw him so obedient. For, notwithstanding, that he had made to large a contribution as the estimation of himself, and the force of his City unto the Commonwealth of the ACHAIANS: yet he was ready to obey and execute the commandments of the Generals, as the poorest and meanest fouldier, were he of DYMA or of TRITA, or of any other small village whatsoever. Furthermore, a great sum of money being fent him from King Prolomy for a gift, amounting to twenty and five talents, he took it, but forthwith disposed it amongst his poor Countreymen, both to relieve their wants, as also to redeem prisoners. This notwithstanding the banished men still vexed and troubled them that had

means. Their Commonwealth therefore being ingreat danger to fall into civil war, Aratus perceiving there was no other way to help this milchief, but by Prolomy's liberality: he determined to go unto him, to pray him to help him with money, to pacific this grudge and tumult. So he embarked at the haven of METRONA, above the foreland of MALEA, to fail from thence into EGYPT : howbein he had fuch a contrary wind, and the sea rose so high, that the master of the ship, was driven to draw taketh let her go whither she would to take sea room. So being driven quite from his direct course, with sea to go to great danger he got to the City of ADRIA, which was his enemy because Antigonus kept it, and King Ptolomy The had not gone far after he had left his ship, but the Captain of the Gatrison came, and sought for him. Notwithstanding, his servants had mocked him finely (being before instructed by Aratas what answer they should make) saying that he was gone, and sled into the Isle of Eurofa. Howbeit, the Captain of the Garrison stayed the ship, his men, and all things else she had in her, and took her for a good prize. Within few days after, Aratus being marvellously troubled, and at a straight with himself what he should do, there happily arrived a ROMAN ship hard by the place where he kept most, partly to hide himself, and partly also to see if he could discover any thing. This ship was bound for SYRIA. So he had dealt with the mafter of the ship in that fort, that he took him aboard, and promiled he would deliver him in CARIA, and so he did. But he was in as much danger this second journev again by fea, as he was in the first he made toward EGYPT. From CARIA, a long time after, Armus went into EGYPT, and spake with the King, who made very much of him : for Aratus fed him faill by fending him passing fair tables, and pictures of GREECE, of excellent workmanship. And The pictures indeed having a fingular good wit, he always got together, and brought the excellentest painted pictures and painted tahe could get, but specially the pictures of Pamphilus and Melanthus, to send them unto the King. For bles made in be could get, but spectany the pictures of t'ampoints and togetaments, to send them unto me range, ros the City of Sic y On E, and they effected the painting of tables in that City, the City of Sic to be the perfected for true colours and fine drawing, of all other places. Infomuch as Apelles (though all the other he was then of a marvellous fame for painting) went thither, and gave to these two excellent Painters a paintings in talent, to remain a while in their company : not so much to attain to the perfection of the Art, as there- Greece. by to win himself fame. And therefore when Arans had restored his City again to liberty, he caused The excellency all the Images of the Tyrants to be defaced and plucked down: howbeit he food doubtful a long time, of Ariffrans whether he should deface Ariffrans picture, or not, who reigned in the time of Philip. For he was painted with the hands of all the Scholars of Melanthus, being by a triumphant Chariot, that carried painted all by a victory, and as Polemon the Geographer writeth, Apelles hand was to it. This picture was a passing Melanthus piece of work to fee to, fo that Aratus at the first yielded, and was contented to fave it for the excel. Scholars and Abency of the workmanship: yet in the end, overcome with the extream hate he bare unto Tyrants, he relies help, and had it should be defaced. Now it is reported also, that Nealces the Painter, being one of Aratus tation for the friends, prayed him with the tears in his eyes to pardon fuch a notable piece of work. But when he defacing of it. faw Aratus io hard bearted that he would not grant it, he told him, it was good reason to make The saying of War with Tyrants, but not with their pictures. Let us then (quoth he) leave the Chariot of tri- Nesteer the umph and victory, and I will make theesee Aristratus, willingly to come out of the table. Aratus painter, touching Tytanus, was contented to let him have his will. Then Nealces defaced the picture of Aristratus, and in place thereof drew onely a Palm-tree, and durft add nothing elfe to it of his own device. Some fay, that under the Chariot were conveyed Aristratus feet defaced. So Aratus by means of these tables and pictures, was marvellously well beloved of King Prolomy. But after he was acquainted with him. and knew his conversation, he loved him then better than before. Infomuch that he gave him an hundred and fifty talents to keep his City withall : of the which he carried fourty away with him unto PE-LOPONNESUS, and the King afterwards fent him the reft at fundry times. Now this was a marvel- The great libeloss matter of him to get such a maffe of money together for his Citizens : confidering that the Ora-rality of Prolotors, Captains and Governors of free Cities, for a little fum of money onely which they have taken of tus. Kings and Princes, have been corrupted, and betrayed their Towns and Countrey. But this was a more wonder, that by means of this money he made peace and love betwirt the poor and rich : and furthermore, faved upright all the people of SICYONE, where he shewed himself marvellous wife and temperate, being of that great power and authority he was. For after they had chosen him Arabus temperates Arbitrator to judge, compound and absolutely to decide all quarrels and strife between the banished tance, men, he would never undertake it himself alone, but took fifteen other of the chiefest Citizens wah him; and with them, by great pains and trouble, at length he pacified all matters among his Chizens, and made them good friends one with another. Therefore not onely all the Inhabitants and Chizens of Sicyone together, decreed publick honors meet for him, but also the banished men themselves did privately cast his image in brais, and set it up, under the which they caused this inscriptigood turns he had done unto them. But then King Antigonus being angry with Aratus in his mind, and feeking either to make him his friend, or to bring him to be miftruffed of Prolomy, he did him many other great courtefies, Araus never feeking them at his bands. But one day specially above the rest, as he did facrifice unto the gods at CORINTH, he sent Arans part of his weathers he had facrificed, unto SICYONE. And at the fealt of his facrifice in the hearing of many noble men that were bidden gueffs, he faid openly of Arans: I did alway think that this young SICYONIAN could not but have a liberal mind, loving the liberty of his Country and Countreymen: but I perceive now he is a man that can judge of Princes manners and affairs. For heretofore he made no account of us, because his hope was out of his Country, and he greatly effected the riches of ÆGYPT, hearing talk of so many Elephants, of such a great Fleet of Ships, and of such a sumptious Court, as King Prolomies Court. But now that he knoweth by experience, that it is onely but a smooth and vain pomp, he is come to us: and for my part he is welcome to me, and I will have you all to take him for my friend. These words of King Antigonus, were straight taken at bound of certain envious men, and carried for lack of better matter unto King Prolomy, every man striving who should write all the evil they could against him: fo that Prolomy thereupon sent a messenger of purpose unto him, to reprove him for it. Thus fell there out much envy and malice, between the earnest love of Aratus doing these Princes and Kings, that contended with each other who should have Aratus. Furthermore, mere Princes and Lings, that continued want General of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, he forraged and spoiled the Countrey of LOCRIDE, which lieth directly over against ACHAIA, and CALY-DONIA allo. Howbeit he came not time enough to aid the BJEOTIANS, in the battle which they loft before the City of CHERONEA, against the ETOLIANS: where Abaserium, Governor of BOSOTIA was flain in the field, with a thousand other BOSOTIANS. Howbeit the next year following, he being the second time chosen Lieutenant General, he attempted to win the Castle of CORINTH again, being an enterptife which not onely concerned the private benefit of Sievona it felf, and the tribe of ACHAIANS, but also of all GREECE besides. For, he was fully beat to drive the Garrison of the MACEDONIANS thence, the which seemed even a very yoke that held all the GRECIANS noses to the grindstone. For like as Chares, Captain of the ATHENI-ANS, having in a certain conflict discomfitted the Kings Lieutenants, wrote unto the ATHENIANS, that had won a victory half fifter to the victory of MARATHON: even so methinks it were no difgrace to fay, that this execution was like (as one brother to another) to the killing of the tyrants, which was done by Pelopides THEBAN, and Thraspoulse ATHENIAN; faving that this last act was more famous, because it was not against GRECIANS, but amongst strangers and soraign power and government, upon whom it was executed. For the 18thmus or bar of PELOPONNESUS, which feparateth the fea Egeum from the fea Jonium, doth come and joyn the firm land of the reft of GREECE Prefete, an I. with the PRESCHE and Island of PELOPONNESUS. Even to likewife the mountain called Across rinth, on the which the Caffle frandeth, rifing up in the middeft of GREECE, when there is any Garrison of men of War in it, it cutteth off all traffick and passage by, of any Armies of them which in-habit within the straight, for them that are without the straight, both by sea and by land, and maketh him onely Lord of the Countrey that keepeth the Castle. So that it was not for (port, but for truth, and in good earneft, that Philip the young King of MACEDON was wont to call the City and Cafile of CORINTH, the flocks and gyves of GREECE. And therefore was this Caffle marvelloully withed and defired of every man, but specially of Kings and Princes, But the defire Ansigonus had of it was fo vehement, that it differed nothing from the passions of a frantick lover. For he did nothing elle continually but fludy and devife how he might win it upon the fudden, from them that kept it : because otherwise by open force, it was impossible to be had. Wherefore after the death of Alexander that kept that Caftle, being poisoned (as it is reported) by Antigonau practife, the Caftle being left in the hands of his wife Nicas, who governed the state of Corinth, and did carefully cause the Antigonus craft Acrocorinth to be kept, he immediately fent his fon Demetrise thither, and put Nices in good hope to marry her with this young Prince : a thing that pleafed this Lady well, though the was very old. So, for her self she was won straight, by means of his young son Demetrius, whom he used as a state to intrapher. Howbeit Nices for all this goodly offer, for sook not her Castle, but always made to make sumpusous facrifices, seasts, and plays to the gods, within the City of CORENTH for the marriage: as though he meant no other thing, but banqueting and jollity all that might be. When the hour was come to fee thefe sports, and that the Musician Amabem, began to sing, he himself made as though he would accompany Nices unto the Theatre, being conveyed thither in a sumpruous rich litter, as it had been for a Queen. She was very glad of this honour, and thought nothing lefs then of

At Oio rinth, RINTH there were four Brethren born in Syria, of the which, one of them being called Dio rinth, Arrays detercles, was a Souldier of the Caffle : and the rest having robbed the Kings Treasure, went straight mination for unto SICYONE, to Agias the Banker, whom Aratus employed in his Faculty. These three Bre- the taking of thren immediately fold him part of the Gold they had robbed : and afterwards, one of them (called the Acroco-Erginus) coming often to fee him, by little and little fold him all the reft. By this means Agias rinth. fell into familiar acquaintance with him, and talked with him of the Garifon of the Caffle of the Acrocorinh. Erginus told him, that going unto his Brother up thole freep and high Rocks, he found a path as it were cut out of the Rock, that went to a place of the Wall of the Caftle, which was very low. Agias hearing that, answered him smiling: Alas, my friend, what mean you to fleal a little piece of Gold to hinder the King, when in one hours space you can sell such a great male of Money together? For as well shall you die if you be apprehended for this selony, as if you were otherwise attainted for Treason. Erginus with that fell a laughing, and promised that he would feel his Brother Diocles mind in it, for he did not greatly truft his other Brethren. So returning shortly after, he bargained with Aratus to bring him to a place of the Wall that was not above fifteen foot high. promifing that he would help him to execute the rest, with his Brother Diocles. Aritus promifed then to give him fifty Talents, if he brought his Enterprize to pass: and if he failed, that he would then give either of them, a House and a Talent. Erginus would have the whole fifty Talents put into Agias the Bankers hands. Aratus had not fo much ready Money, and besides he would not rake, it up at ulury, for fear of giving caule to suspect his Enterprize. Wherefore betook all his Plate of Gold and Silver, and his Wives Jewells, and laid them to gage to Agian, to disburfe the faid fum. But Aratus had fo great and noble a mind in him, and was fo bent to do notable acts, that knowing how Phocion and Epaminondas had been efteemed for the justest and honestest men of GREECE, because they had refused great Gifts that were offered them, and would never sell nor flain their Honour for Money: he yet surpassing them, was contented to spend his own, to bring any good Enterprize to pals, and did put his life in danger for the common benefit of his Countrymen; they themselves knowing nothing of his Enterprize, which turned all to their benefit. What is he then, that will not wonder at the great magnanimity and courage of fuch a man, and that will not even now as it were, be willing to aid him, confidering how dearly he bought so great a danger of his person, and how he laid his Plate and all the Riches he had to gage, to be brought in the night among the middest of his Enemies, where he was to fight for his own life, having no other gage nor pledge, but the hope of fuch a noble Enterprize, and nothing elfe? But now, though the Enterprize of it felf was dangerous, an errour chancing through ignorance at the first, made it yet more dangerous. For Aratus had lent Technon, one of his men before with Diocles, to view the Wall. This Technon had never spoken with Diocles, howbeit he thought in his mind what manner of man he was, by the marks that Erginus had given him of him: that he had a black curled hair, that his face was black, and that he had no beard. Now Technon being come to the place where Erginus faid he would be with Diocles, he stayed before the Town in a place called ORNIS. So whileft he was tarrying there, the elder Brother of Diocles (called Dionyfus, who knew nothing of the Enterprize, nor was made acquainted withall, and looked very like his Brother Diocles) came that way by chance. Technon being moved by the marks he faw in him, like unto those he was told of, asked him if he were nothing a kin unto Erginus. The other answered him, he was his Brother. The error ot, asked him it he were nothing a kin unto Erginar. The other aniwered him, it was in Browner. Then Technon periwading himlelf it was certainly Diocles that fpake to him, without asking him his likeness of name, or making other inquiry of him, he took him by the hand, and began to talk with him of men one to anthe practice he had with Erginus, and to ask him of it. Dionyfus taking the matter upon him, other, and feeding on his error, returned forthwith into the City, holding him on ftill with talk, Technon mistrusting nothing. But even as Dionysus was ready to take hun fast by the collar, his Brother Erginus came. Who, perceiving how Technon had miffaken the matter, and the danger he was in, beckoned to him with his head to fly; and so they both ran for life unto Aratus, to save themselves. Howbeit Aratus was nothing the more discouraged for this, but fent Erginus straight to carry his Brother Diony fins Money, and to pray him not to be known of any thing : who furthermore brought him with him unto Aratus. But after they had him once, they made him fure for starting : for they bound him, and locked him up fast in a Chamber, whilst they went about their Enterprize. So when all things were ready, Aratus commanded the rest of his Army that they should tarry behind, armed all night: and he himself with four hundred of the best men he had (not knowing themselves whether they went, nor to what intent) went straight to the Gates of the City, passing by the Temple of Juno. This was about the middest of Summer, when the Moon was at the full, and the

Moon-light, and bewray them. But as the foremost of them came near unto the City, there arose clouds out of the Sea that darkened all the City and places thereabouts, and shadowed them.

Then all of them fitting down on the ground, plucked off their shoots, both because they should make less noise, as also for that their sooting should be surer, and that they should slip less upon the Ladders. But Erginus, and seven other companions with him, like men that travell, came secretly into the Gate of the City, and flew the Porter and Warders there. At that very inftant. Aratus caused the Ladders to be set up against the Walls, and made an hundred of his Souldiers get up on them: and fent also to command the reft, that they should follow him with all possible speed.

Then drawing up his Ladders after him, as fast as he could, he went through the City with his hundred men toward the Castle, with such a joyfull chear, as if he had it already in his hand; for that he faw he was not discovered. But as he went on, he saw four of the Watch coming with a light against them. They faw not Aratus and his Company, but the Enemies faw them plainly afar off. Aratus and his men therefore frood up close against the old Walls to tarry their coming, and at the first onler, flew three of them: but the fourth having a blow on his head with a Sword, ran away, making an out-cry, that the Enemies were in the City. The Trumpets forthwith founded the Alarm, all the City was in an uproar, the firees were fireight full of People running up and down, and of lights in every cornier, both beneath the City, and also in the Castle, and the noise was great every where. Aratus in the mean time forced to get up the high Rocks fair and foftly at the first, and with great sanger in ta-king of the Ca- pain and difficulty, being out of his path he should have found, which he missed being very deep into the Rocks, and with many crooks and cranks went to the foot of the Cattle : but fuddenly, even as it had been by miracle, the Moon appearing through the clouds, when they were in their worst way, it gave them light, and brought them to that part of the Wall where they should be and straight the Moon was shadowed again. Now the three hundred Souldiers whom Aratus had left by the Gate of the Temple of Juno, when they were come into the City being full of lights and in uproar, and besides could not find the path by the which their Captain Araus went before them: they stood close together under a Rock that shadowed them, forrowfully looking to hear fome news of Aratm: who was then fighting with the Garrison of the Caftle, the which made head against him, with all the force and power he could. Under the Castle there was a great noise heard of men that fought, but yet the noise was so confused by the sound rebounding against the Rocks and Mountain, that they could not devife whence it should come. So they being in this perplexity, not knowing which way to turn themselves, Archelaus, Captain of King Anticonus men, having a good number of Souldiers with him, went up the Hill with great cries and noise of Trumpers, to fet upon Aratsu and his Company behind. But after he was passed by these three hundred Souldiers of Aratu Band, they gave Charge upon him, as if they had been laid there in Ambuth of purpole, and thewathe first they encountred withall, and made the others to afraid, and Archelam himself, that they dispersed them, and made some fly one way, some another. So, as they were overthrown, Erginus came to these three hundred men, coming immediately from them that fought, and brought the news that Anatus and them of the Castle, were come to the Sword together, and valiantly defended themselves, lustily fighting for the Wall, and therefore it was time for them to help him quickly. Then the Souldiers bade him bring them thinker straight, and so he did. So they climbing up the Hill, did fignifie by their cries to their men, that they came to aid him. Furthermore, the Moon being then at the full, and shining on their Harness, made their Enemies in the Caftle think that they were a greater number then indeed they were, because of the long way they had to make to get up upon the Rocks; and also because of the found in the night, that made their cry feem to be of a greater number then they were. At length they joyned with Aratus, they fought it out to luftily, that they drave the Garrison out of the Walls, and by break Aratus taketh of day wan the Caftle. So that their Exploit was discovered by the rifing of the Sun, and befides, all the reft of their Army that came from the City of SICYONE: whom the CORINTHI-ANS very gladly received, and did fet open their Gates unto them, and aided them to take King Antigonus men. Afterwards, when they thought that all was fafe, then Aratus ran from the Cattle unto the Theatre of the City, whither repaired an infinite number of People, as well for the defire they had to fee him, as also to hear him speak unto the CORINTHIANS. So, having placed the ACHAIANS on either fide, at the coming into the Theatre, Aratus being armed went up into the Chair or Pulpit for Orations, having his face quite changed, both for the great pains he had taken, and also for lack of sleep: so that his body being over-wearied, his spirits were even done. Now when all the Affembly of the People (feeing him in the Chair) did humble themselves to shew him all the honour and kindness they could possible : he took his Spear out of his left hand into his right, and bowing his knee and body fomewhat, he leaned upon it, and fo ftood a great while in this manner before he spake, receiving the cries of joy and clapping of hands which the People made, praifing his valiantness, and bleffing his good hap and Fortune. Then when they had done, and were quiet again, he framed his countenance, and began to make an Oration unto them in the name of all the Tribe and Commonwealth of the ACHAI-Armus joyneth ANS, meet for the Enterprize from whence he came; and perfwaded them to joyn to the A-CHAIANS. So therewithall, they prefently delivered him the Keys of the City, the which were never before that time in their power, since the reign of King Philip. Now touching the other Captains of King Amigonus, Aratus having taken Archelam prifoner, he let him go, bur put Theophrastus to death, because he would not go out of CORINTH. Perfans (Captain of the Castle) feeing the Castlebut loft, he fecretly faved himfelf, and fled unto the City of CENCREES. Many Writers do report this faying of Perfeus. Furthermore, Aratus could not be a wan presently the Temple of Juno, and the Haven of LECHAEUM, where he took five and twenty good Captain, Ships of King Antigonus, and five hundred Horse of service for the War, and four hundred Syrai-ANS, which he fold every one of them. Now, the ROMANS wondring at the valiantness of Philopamen, they cal- to Zeno's opithe Watch of the Grecians. Even so might I also (in my opinion) say, that this act is the nion. Led him the last of the Grecians, and deferved to be equall, as well for valiantness, as Philogementate last and most famous of all the Grecians, and deferved to be equall, as well for valiantness, as a last famous also good success, with the greatest exploits of the most famous Ancients; as that which followed man of the immediately after, doth amply declare. For the MEGARIANS revolting from King Antigonus, Grecians. did straight joyn with Aratus: and the TROEZENIANS also with the EPIDAURIANS, did Aratus Power likewife enter into league and friendship with the ACHAIANS. So at the first invasion he made, he and Authority went to spoil the Countrey of ATTICA, and crossed over to the Isle of SALAMINA, and spoiled with and destroyed it, even as if he had delivered the power and force of the ACHAIANS out of prison. to ferve his own turn in any thing he thought good of. Howbeir, he fent home the ATHENIANS Prisoners without paying of ransom: and all of policy to make them desirous to rebel against the MACEDONIANS. Furthermore, he made King Ptolomy a friend and confederate of the ACHAI-ANS, with condition, that he should be Lieutenant General both by Sea and by Land. For these respects Aratus was of marvellous estimation and credit with the ACHAIANS : infomuch that where they could not yearly choose him their Generall, being contrary to their Law, they chose him at the least every second year: but in effect, all was done by his advice and counsell. For they saw plainly, that it was neither honour, nor riches, nor friendship of Kings and Princes, nor the private benefit of his own City wherein he was born, nor any other thing else that he preferred, before the glory and encrease of the Commonwealth of the ACHAIANS. For he was of opinion, that Cities themselves were but weak, and being joyned together with the chain of common benefit, they were a ftrength one to preserve the other. And in like manner, even as the parts that are in the bodies of brute Beafts. have life and fuftenance, being joyned and knit together, and straight so soon as there is any separation of them the one from the other, they live no more, but putrifie : even fo Cities also were brought to decay by them that did differfe their fociety among them; and in contrary manner did then again entreale, when joyning with any other great body and City, they were governed with wildom and good counsell. So Aratus seeing the chiefest Cities thereabours enjoy their Laws and Liberties, thought good countent so Marki teeing the thicket when you have been and bondage. Wherefore he practified to kill Aram goeth the Tyrant Arishomachus that governed them, both to shew himself thankfull to the City for his briggs a thicket. ang up there : as also to joyn that great and mighty City unto the Tribe of the ACHAIANS. Now to there were divers men, that had the hearts and courage to undertake to do it, of the which the chiefeft were Afchylu and Charimenes the Soothfayer, but they had no Swords : for they were ftraightly forbidden by the Tyrant, and grievous punishments ordained for them that should be found with their Swords. Aratus therefore caused little short Daggers to be made at CORINTH for them, Aratus prepawhich he fowed up in packs carried on certain Beatls loaden with other Baggage and ftuff. But the Daggers at Soothlayer Charimenes did impart this Enterprize unto a third man, and made him one of the Congainst the Tyliniary with them. Alchebula being very much of made with it have the being very much of made with it have the being very much of made with it have the being very much of made with it have the being very much of made with it have the being very much of made with it have the being very much of made with it have the being very much of made with it have the being very much of made with it have the being very much of made with it have the being very much of made with it have the being very much of made with it have the being very much of the Congaint the Tyline very muc spiracy with them. Afchylus being very much offended with it, began therefore to enter into pra- rants Decree dice by himself, and leti their company. Charimenes perceiving that, took such a toy in his head and Ordinance in a mad mood, that he bewrayed them as they went about to execute their Enterprize. This notwithflanding, the most part of the Conspirators faved themselves, and fled to CORINTH. So the Tyrant Aristomachus was slain shortly after by his own men. But then another Tyrant Aristipm, a crueller man then the first, made haste to take the Tyranny before he could be refisted. This notwithstanding, Araini with all the young men of the ACHAIANS able to serve in the Field, ty of Argot. went fuddenly thither with aid, hoping to find them of the City very glad to recover their liberty. Howbeit the People being acquainted, and of long time used patiently to bear the yoke of bondage, shere was not a man of them that would once take his part. So he returned back again and did nothing, faving that thereby the ACHAIANS were accused, because that in open Peace they had made War, and therefore they were put in fuit before the MANTINEANS, at Aristippus request, Tyrant of ARGOS. The matter was pleaded in Aratus absence, and the ACHAIANS were condemned to pay the film of thirty Mina's. After this proof and attempt of Aratus, Aristippus being altaid of A- Aristippus laid FAILS, and hating him to the death, fought waies to kill him, with the help of Antigonus, who did wait to kill rans, and having him to the deam, jought water to him him, that did nothing elfe but lie in wait to Arans, aid him in it: and there were spials almost in every corner, that did nothing else but lie in wait to Arans, execute Arishippu mind. Now, there is no furer guard unto a Prince, then the perfect love and good to a Prince, to a Prince, the perfect love and good to a Prince the perfect love and good to a Prin will of his Subjects. For after that the Nobility and Common People have been used to fear, not then the love him; but those that for him command them, he then feeth with many eyes, heareth with many ears, of his Subjects. and knoweth what is done far off. Here therefore I will a little digress from my History, to thew you the manner of Aristippus life the Tyrant, whereunto he was brought by this so much defired tyrannical Government, and smoak of Seigniory, so esteemed of all men. Now though The miserable Aristippus had King Amigonus his friend, and that he kept a Guard of Souldiers about him for life of Aristip. the fafety of hisperson, and that there was not an Enemy of his left alive in all the City: yet he made pus, the Tyrang

after supper turned all his men out of the doors, and then shut his Court Gates to him, and locked himself alone with his Concubine, in a little high Chamber with a trap-door, and fet his Bed upon it, and fo flept, as one that continually was afraid of himfelf. Then, after he was come up, his Concubines Mother came to take up the Ladder, and locked it in another Chamber: and so did let it down again the next morning, and called this trim Tyrant, that went down out of his Chamber, like a Snakethar should have crept out of her hole. Where Aratus in contrary manner, not having obtained by force of Arms, but lawfully through vertue, a continuall Government, being fimply apparelled with a poor Gown of small price, and shewing himself a mortall Enemy unto all forts of Tyrants, bath left a Race and noble Off-fpring among the GRECIANS, which remain yet untill this prefent day. Contrarily also, there are few Tyrants that usurp the Castles of free Cities, that keep fo many Souldiers in pay, that make fuch provision for Armour and Weapon, and have so many Gates and Draw-bridges for the lafety of their perfons; that in the end can keep themselves from violent death, no more then Hares : neither do leave also any Posterity, House or Grave, why their memory should be honoured after their death. So Aratus having divers ways made fundry attempts, both by open force, and otherwife fuddenly to take the City of Argos, and to thrust out the Tyrant Ariffippus, he ever failed of his purpose, but specially one night among the rest, when he entred the City very dangeroully, with a few Souldiers with him, and flew the Souldiers that came to give supply to them that fought. But after that day was broken, and that the Tyrant with all his Forces came to fet upon him, the ARGIVES stirred not at all ; as if Aratus had not fought for their Liberty, but as though they had been Judges appointed to fit to fee the Sports of the Games Nemee, to judge the Game unto the Conqueror without partiality, and with indifferency. Aratus in the mean time fighting like a valiant man, was thrust at with a Pike, and run through the thigh. This notwithflanding, at length he wan that part of the City where he fought, and was not thrust out till night, what force foever the Enemies made upon him. And if he could possibly have holden it out all night, he had undoubtedly obtained his purpole: for the Tyrant looked for none other but to fly, and had already fent divers of his Goods to the Sea. Howbeit no man once came to tell Aratus any news of it; besides also, lacking water, and for that he could not help himself because of his wound, he was driven to lead his men away, and failed of his purpole. So, defpairing that he could ever take it by stealth, he went thuber with open Wars, and spoiled and destroyed all the Countrey of ARGOS: and having fought a great Battle against the Tyrant Aristippus, by the River of Chares, they blamed Aratus much, that he forfook the Victory, and cowardly retired out of the Battle. For the reft of his Army doubtless had the better, and had followed the Enemies far in chase: when he fled being afraid, not compelled by his Enemies, but miftrufting his fortune, and retired to his lodging. So, when they that returned from the chase of their Enemies were offended, for that they having put them to flight, and also slain a great number more of them then they had lost of theirs; and yet for cowardlines should suffer their Enemies (whom they had overcome and put to flight) to fet up Marks of triumph in token of victory : Aratus being ashamed of it, determined to fight once again, for the Marks of triumph. Whereupon resting his men but one day, he led them againing the Field, and setting his Army in Battle-ray, offered to fight once more. This notwithstanding, when he faw a great supply coming to his Enemy, and that the Tyrantsmen came to fight more lustily, and with better courage then before, Aratus durft not abide them, but retired, and fent to demand leave to take away his dead men, to bury them; yet he could speak so courteously, and behave himfelf fo wifely, by the experience he had in Government, and also for the good will they bare him, that they forgave the fault he committed , and he wan the City of CLEONES unto the A-CHAIANS, where he caused the Feafts of the Games of Nemee to be celebrated, as belonging of great antiquity, rather unto the CLEONIANS, then unto the ARGIVES. This notwithstanding, the ARGIVES did keep it also, and then was the first time that the Sanctuary and Priviledge was broken, which was wont to be granted unto all them that came to play for the Games: because the ACHAIANS did make them Prisoners that fought in ARGOS, as they returned through their Countrey, and fold them as Enemies. So marrelloully did Armur and the A-CHAIANS hate all forts of Tyranis, without respect of person. Shortly after he was advertised, that the Tyrant Arifippus did lie in wait to fpy opportunity, to take the City of CLEONES from him : howbeit that he was afraid of it, because he remained at that time in CORINTH. So Aratus straight sent out commandment into every place, to assemble the Army of the Tribe of the ACHAIANS, and that they should bring Victuals with them for many days: and so craftily came down to the City of CENCHREES, to entice Ariftippus, by his going away to far off, that Aratus Stratt. in his absence he should attempt to set upon the CLEONEIANS, as indeed he did. For he gem, to introp failed not prefently to go thither with his Army. But Arms returning from CENCHREBS unto CORINAIH, very late in the night, and having layed good watch every way, he fuddenly brought the Army of the ACHAIANS Unto CLEONES with such speed and quietness, that they were not feen as they came, but entred into the City of CLHONES by night, and were ready to fight with the Tyrant, before he knew they were come. So the Gates of the City were fet open by break of day, and the fignall of Battle was given by found of Trumpers; and fo fetting Araus Victory upon the Tyrants men with great cries, they suspecting nothing, were presently put to slight. And because the place where the overthrow was given, had many turnings, Aratus, following the chase, thought the way which he took the Tyrant fled in. The chase continued to the City of MYCENES; there the Tyrant was overtaken by a CRETAN called Tragifous (as Dinian reporteth) who slew him: and there were slain of his men also above fifteen thousand. But now Aratus having won fuch a famous Victory, and lost never a man, he could not yet win the City of Aristippus the Argos, nor fet it again at liberty. For one Agias, and another Aristomachus, got into the Tyrant slain. Town with the Kings Army, and kept it: but notwithstanding, by this noble Victory Aratus did race out a great part of the reproach that they gave bim, and of the scoffs and slents the flatterers of the Tyrants devised of him : who to please them, reported, that when they should come to fight indeed, the Generall of the ACHAIANS had the wind-cholick in his belly, and a dimnels in his eyes, with a giddiness in his head, when he heard but the found of the Trumpets. And furthermore also, when he had fet his men in Battle-ray, and given them the Word of Battle, he asked the Generals if he should need to be there in person, because he was hurt in the heel; and then would get him as far off as he could, to fee the end of the Battle. This talk was fo common, that the Philosophiphers themselves disputing of it, to wit, whether to tremble and change colour in present danger cal question. and perill, be figns of a faint heart, or of an ill complexion and coldness of body: they alway whether tremvouched Aratus, that had been a good and valiant Captain, and yet when he began to fight, he bling and was ever in that taking. So when he had overcome Arifippus, he lought means allo to deftroy Ly changing of findas Megalifolita, who as absolute Lord and King of the Countrey, kept the City of Megalifolita. Notwithstanding he had no base mind in him, neither was he carried away with a ofcowardlines. cruel desire of Tyranny to live at his pleasure, nor through extream covetousness, as most Princes Lystadas Tybe: but being a young man, and pricked forward with defire of Honour and Fame, and having un-rant of Megaliadvifedly conceived in his mind (which was great and highly bent) the vain reasons he heard men talk of Principality, as of a state most blessed, and worthy of admiration; he found the means to make himself Lord of his Countrey. But afterwards he was soon weary of the dangers and troubles such manner of Government bringeth with it, and desired to follow Aratus, whom he saw profper, and of great honour. Furthermore also, fearing his secret practises against him, he took hold of a noble device : first to rid himself of the malice and sear of the Prison and Guard of his Souldiers; and laftly, to be a Benefactor to his Countrey. So he fent for Aratus, gave up his Go- Lyfialus Tyvernment, and delivered up his City to the Tribe of the ACHAIANS. They so extolled him for rant of Megathis act, that they chose him their Lieutenant General of all the Tribe. Wherefore, Lysadas stri- lipotis leaveth this act, that they chose him their Lieutenant General of an the Tribe. Wherefore, Lyjaana, ittithe Tyranny, ving at the first to excell Aratus in honour, attempted divers things which were not very needfull: and yielded as among others, to make War with the LACEDEMONIANS. But Aratus was very much against himself and him in that, though some think it was for envy. Thereupon they chose Lysiadas Generall of the his Dominion ACHAIANS the second time: although Aratus openly both spake and made what means he could unto the Ato the contrary, and would have had another to have been chosen. For he himself was every other chaians. year General. So Lyfiadas was choien again Generall of the Achaians the third time, with every bodies good will: and Aratus and he had abfolute Power and Government by turns, one after the other. But when they faw that Lysiadas became open Enemy unto Aratus, and did still accule him in all their Councils and Affemblies: they fell in foch milliking with him, that they rejected Diffention becule him in all their Councils and Atlemblies: they fell in such millioning with him, that they rejected twist Arants him. For they thought his but a counterfeit vertue, to contend with the perfectness of Arans and Lylishas. vertue, much like unto one of Afops Fables, faying, That little Birds did answer the Cuckow on a One of A time, asking them why they did fly from her: Because we are afraid (faid they) thou wilt be a Spar- fops Tales of hawk one day. Even so it seemeth, that there was a certain suspition in mens minds of Lysiadas the Cuckows Tyranny, which made them mitrust that he went not from his Tyranny with good will. Now A-little Birds. ratus on the other fide, wan as great praise and honour by his doings against the ETOLIANS. Aratus noble For when the ACHAIANS would needs have fought upon the Confines of the Territory of the counter against MEGARIANS, and that Agu King of LACEDEMON, being come with his Army to the Camp of the Etolians. the Tribe of the ACHAIANS, did perswade them hardily to give Battle: Aratus was stoutly against it, and did abide many mocks and taunts they gave him, saying, That it was for cowardliness he would not go. This notwithstanding, he would not leave his wife and safe determination, for all that open shame : but suffered the Enemies to pass over the Mountain Gerania , and to invade Gerania Mons PELOPONNESUS, and would never fight with them. But afterwards, when he saw that at their first coming they had taken the City of PALENA, he then changed his mind, and would deter time no longer, to tarry till all his Power were come together, but marched forthwith, with those few he had, against his Enemies, who marvellously weakened themselves by their insolency and disorder after their Victory, keeping no Watch nor Ward. For after they had entred the City of Arthus letteth Allena, the Souldiers ran into every house, one thrusting in anothers neck, and fighting for vious Enemies the Goods they found. The Captains also fell to ravishing of Maids, and the PALLENIANS Wives, and put their Burganets and Morrions upon their heads, that none other should take them: because that by the same the Souldiers should know whose they were, and to whom the Women belonged. So they being in this ruff and jollity, news came suddenly that Aratus was come. This made them quake for fear, when they faw they were like to be taken out of order. For before they all understood of the danger by their sudden setting on them, the ACHAIANS were fighting already within the Suburbs and Gates of the City, against the first that resisted, whom they flew. They being broken and put to flight, made the rest so afraid that were gathered together to aid them, that they wift not what to do. In this tumult and hurly burly, there was one of the Ladies a Prisoner, that was the Daughter of Epigethes, one of the noblest men of the City, and she a marvellous goodly woman, and passing fair: who being set in the Temple of Diana, whither a Captain that had chosen her for himself had brought her, and had put his Burganet on her head, when the heard the noise of them that fought, the fuddenly ran to the Gate of the Temple with the A woman with Burganet on her head, to fee them fight. The Citizens feeing her in that array, found her the gooda Burganet on lier to behold, and of greater Majerty, then any wordly creature. The Enemies on the other fide were so afraid to see her, thinking she had been some Spirit, that not a man of them durst once defend themselves. So the Palenians say, that the Image of Diana all the rest of the time is kept locked up, and no body touched it; and that when the Nun that keepeth it, doth carry it else-Diana with the where, no man dare look on it, but every man turneth his eyes away : because the fight of it is not onely fearfull and hurtfull unto men, but it also killeth the fruit of the trees it passeth by, and maketh them barren. This was the cause that then troubled the ETOLIANS minds so much, because the Nun removing the Image of the goddes Diana, she turned it towards them. Howbeit, Aratus in his Commentaries maketh no mention of this at all, but onely writeth, that when he had defeated the ETOLIANS, following them in chase, he entred hand over head with them that fled into the City, out of the which he drave them, and flew feven hundred of them. This noble Victory hath been efteemed amongst the chiefest afterwards: and the Painter Timanthes hath drawn and set it forth in Table very lively. This notwithstanding, because divers Princes and People did immediately prepare force against the Achaians, Aratus presently made Peace with the Etoli-Artus brings ANS by the practice of Pantaleon, who bare great fway and authority amongst them. Furtherein the ATHENIANS at liberty, he suddenly attempted to take the Haven of PIREA: for the which the ACHAIANS reproved him, because he had broken the Peace they had made with the MACEDONIANS. But Aratus in his Commentaries doth flourly deny that it was he, and layeth the fault upon Erginus, by whose means he wan the Castle of the teth to fet A. Acrocorinh: faying, that it was he, that of his own mind did fet a fealing-Ladder to the Wall, and that his Ladder breaking under him, he fled upon it; and perceiving he was followed nearby the Enemies, he ftill cried out, Aratus, as if he had been there, and by this policy mocked his Enemies, and faved himself. Howbeit, methinketh this answer is not true. For it is not credible, that Erginus a private Souldier, and a SYRIAN born, should have so great an Enterprize in his head, unless it had been by Aratus consent and commandment, who had given him men, time and means to undertake it. And this appeared plainly afterwards : for Arasm did not attempt it twice or thrice onely, but oftener then fo (as those that extreamly defire a thing) to take the Haven of PIR.EA on the sudden, not giving over for once failing, but rather emboldened him-felf again with good hope, because he missed it but little, and that he came so near the taking of it. And another time also amongst others, slying through the Plain of Thriasia, he brake his leg, and was driven to make many incisions to heal it: so that he was a long time together carried in his Litter unto the Wars. After that King Antigonus was dead, and that Demetriat his Son succeeded him in the Kingdom, he attempted then more earnestly then ever before, to set Aratus over the City of Athens at liberty, making small account of the MACEDONIANS. Aratus thrown by the therefore being overthrown in Battle near unto PHYLACIA, by King Demetries Lieutenant, called Bibbs, and the rumour running straight abroad, that Aratus was dead, or at the least that he was taken Prisoner: one named Diogenes, Captain of the Haven of PIREA, wrote a Letter unto CORINTH, and commanded the Garrison of the ACHAIANS that kept it, to deliver the Town, for Aratus was dead. But he by chance was at the felf-same time in CORINTH:

MACEDONIANS, exceeding all lightness of flattery, wore Garlands on their heads a whole day together, in token of common joy, when news was brought them of Aratus death. Attato the very Suburbs of the Academy. Notwithstanding at their earnest requests, he did no hurt there. And afterwards the ATHENIANS acknowledging his valiantness, when King Demetrius died, it took them in the heads to recover their Liberty again. So Aratus, though that year another man was Generall of the ACHAIANS, and that he kept his bed lying fick of a long difeafe: yet to further this, he was carried unto ATHENS in a Litter, and so perswaded Diogenes (Captain of the Garrison there) that for the sum of an hundred and fifty Talents (towards the which Aratus gave of his own, twenty Talents) he made him deliver to the ATHENIANS, the Haven of PIREA, the Castle of MUNICHIA, the Isle of SALAMINA, and the Castle of Su-NIUM. After this the ÆGINETES, the HERMIONIANS, and the most part of ARCADIA it felf, did prefently joyn with the ACHAIANS: fo that the MACEDONIANS being occupied with Wars at that time in other places against their neighbours, the Power of the ACHAIANS Arasus by per. marvellously encreased, having also the ETOLIANS their Confederates. Then Arasus to perfurfion delive- form his old promite, and being angry to fee the City of Argos (being fo near neighbour unto them) yet kept in bondage, he sent unto Aristomachus, to perswade him to be contented to set his City again at liberty, and to joyn it to the Tribe of the ACHAIANS, as Lysiadas had done his Town of MEGALIPOLIS : and rather to like to be made a General with Honour and praife of fo great and famous a State as the ACHAIANS, then Tyrant of one onely City, hated, and every hour of the night and day in danger of his life. Ariffomachus gave ear to his perfwafions, and fent unto Araus, telling him that he had need of fifty Talents to discharge the Souldiers he had about him. The Money was straight prepared. And Lyfiadas that was at that time fo that they which brought the Letters went home with a mock, without their purpose, and made all the company merry. Furthermore, King Demetrins himself fent a Galley out of Ma-CEDON, to bring Aratus bound unto him. The ATHENIANS themselves also, to please the General of the ACHAIANS, and that marvelloully defired this matter might be brought to pass by his means: he secretly sent unto Aristomachus to accuse Aratus, and shewed how he had been always a mortal Enemy unto Tyrants, and therefore counselled him rather to put himself into his hands, as indeed he did. For Lysiadas brought Aristomachus unto the Councill of the A-CHAIANS. There all the Council plainly shewed their good wills, and the considence they had The love and in Aratus: for when he spake against it, that they should not receive Aristomachus, they rejected sighof the him with great anger. But afterwards also when Aratus was won, and that he began to move Achaians unto the contrary to the Councill, they straight agreed to receive the ARGIVES, and the PHLIASI. Arasus. ANS in League with them; and also the next year following they chose Aristomachus Lieutenant Generall of all their Tribe. Aristomachus seeing himself in credit now with the ACHAIANS, would needs invade the Countrey of LACONIA with a main Army, and fent for Aratus being then at ATHENS. Aratus wrote unto him, and wished him in any wife not to meddle with that Tourney, because he would not have the ACHAIANS to deal with Chomenes King of LACEDE-MON, that was a couragious and front young Prince, and marvelloufly grown in fhort time. Howbeit, Aristomachus being self-willed in that point, Aratus obeyed him, and was there in person all that Journey. So Chomenes being come to them upon the sudden with his Army, near unto the City of PALANTIUM, Aristomachus would needs fight with him; but Aratus diffwaded him from it. Whereupon Lyfiadas afterwards accused him to the ACHAIANS, and the next year following he contended with him, fuing to be General; howbeit he was rejected by most voices, and Aratus chosen General the twelfth time. The self-fame year he was overthrown in Battle by Cleamenes, near unto the Mountain Lyczum, and being fled, wandred up and down in the night, that Aratm overevery man thought he had been flain, and it ran for good payment among all the GRECIANS, thrown in Bi Howbeit, he faved himself, and having gathered his men together again, not contenting him that Cleomene he had escaped with life, but wifely taking the opportunity and occasion offered, no man knowing it, hard by the nor miftrufting his coming: he fuddenly went to affail the MANTINEANS, which were Confede- Mountain rates of Cleomenes, and having taken the City of Mantinea, heleft a great Garrison in it, and Lycaum. made the strangers that were there, free of the City. Thus Aratus was he alone, that being over-the City of come, wan the ACHAIANS that which they themselves could scarcely have won if they had Mantines, been Conquerors. Afterwards, the LACEDEMONIANS invading the Territories of the MEGA-LIPOLITANS with a great Army, Aratus inddenly went thinker to aid them, but would hazard Bauleno more, nor give Chemenes vantage, who defired onely to fight, and ftill conftantly refifted the MEGALIPOLITANS, that provoked him to come into the Field. For befides that in nature he was not meet for a fet Battle, at that time also he was the weaker in men; and had to do with a vertuous young man, that was all fire: where his courage and ambition on the other fide was cool and quiet enough. Furthermore he confidered, that as King, Cleomenes fought honour by valiant venturing, which he had not before: even so it was his part wisely to keep that which he had long fince gotten, and to stand upon his guard and safety. This notwithstanding, the light armed men being pur out into the Field, and having chased the LACEDEMONIANS even into their Camp, and entring in with them hand over head : Arasus would never bring out his Citizens, but stayed them in a great Valley that lay between them both, and would not let them come on any farther. Where-withall Lyfiadas being mad with himself, and failling out with Aristis, he called for the Horfemen, and fail, that he would yet help them that followed the chase; and prayed them not to lose the Victory so cowardly, of the which they were so sure: nor to forfake him at a pinch, fighting for the defence of their Countrey. So having gotten a great number of choice Horsemen together, he went with a great fury and gave Charge on the right Wing of his Enemies Battle, and having dispersed them, and put them to flight, he unadvifedly followed them with great courage, into evil-favoured crooked ways, among Trees and great broad Ditcheo. Whereupon Cleomenes came, and fo luftily fet on him, that he slew him dead in the place, valiantly fighting and defending himself. The other The death of men of Arms flying also, rushed in again, into the Battle of the Footmen, and so disordered their Lyfiadas. ranks, that they made all their Army fly for fear. For this cause they greatly blamed Aratus, because he had forsaken Lysiadau: and being enforced unto it by the ACHAIANS that went without his kave, he followed them at length, and fled himself also unto the City of £GIUM. There the Arasus oncea-ACHAIANS fitting in Council, they decreed, that they would furnish Aratus with no more Mo-gain overney, neither would they pay his strangers any more : and bad him pay them at his own charge, if thrown by he would entertain them for the War. Aratus perceiving that they did him great wrong, flood even indifferent to deliver up his Commission of Lieutenancy, and to discharge himself of his Office : but after he had bethought himself better, he bare it patiently, and led the ACHAIANS directly to the City of ORCHOMENE. There he valiantly fought with Megistonus, King Chemenes Father-inlaw, and had the upper hand of him : for he flew three hundred of his men, and took Megistonus felf Prisoner. Furthermore, where before every second year they did use to choose him their Lieutenant-General, when his turn came about again, they called him to give him the Office; but he refused it, and Timoxenus was chosen in his room. Now the cause alledged for his refusal; was said to be, for that he milliked of the common People. But that foundeth like a lye: for the truth of it, to my feeming, was, for that he faw the State of the ACHAIANS to decline. For King Cleomenes proceeded no more fair and fofuly as he did at the first, when he was controlled and bridled by the Ephori: but having flain them, and equally divided the Lands through LACEDEMONIA, and made the strangers free Citizens of SPARTA, being then absolute Lord of LACEDEMON, he ARATUS. ftraight fer upon the ACHAIANS with all the Power he could, and fought to conquer them. And therefore Aratus deferveth just reproof, for that he forfook his Country in foch extream trouble and danger, that being as the Mafter of a Ship, he gave another the Stern to fteer, when it had been most honourable and meetest for him to have taken it in hand (though they would not have given it of a Common him) to have faved his Countrey. Or otherwise, if he had indeed utterly despaired of the good sucwest ought no man, to have taxed his Country. A country in the rather into Cleomenes hands, and not to have more to toriske, cels of the ACHAIANS, he should then have put it rather into Cleomenes hands, and not to have poyfoned PELOPONNESUS again with the manners of the barbarous People (bringing in as he did, the Garrison of the MACEDONIANS, filling the Caftle of the Acrocorinth with GAULS and ILdanger, then

Admit Cleomenes had been a Tyrant, and a cruel man (if I should so tearmhim) yet came he of the blood of Hercules, and was born in Sparta: from whence they fhould rather have chosen the meanest man Governour, then the greatest Kings of Ma-CEDON; and those specially that prefer the honour and glory of GREECE, before strangers. Yet King Cleoments required no more of all the ACHAIANS, but the name onely to be their Lieutenant Generall: and fo they would grant him that honour, he promifed he would be very good unto the the greatest Cities Consederates to ACHAIA. Where Antigonus notwithstanding, when they had chosen him their Lieutenant Generall, with absolute power and authority both by Sea and also by Land, refused the charge, unless they would let him have the Cafele of the Acrocorinth for his hire. The which was Esoprhamer even like to Appr Hunter, that bridled his Horse : for he would not get upon the ACHAIANS that requested him, and that by their Ambassadors and Decrees of Council, did refer all unto himself, before he had first fadled and bridled them, by the Garrison hemade them receive, and the Pledgeshe caufed them to give him; and yet he spake as much as might be to clear himself of the acculation a-Polybins Hillo-gainft him, bearing them in hand that he was forced to ir. Howbeit Polybins writeth, that long time before he was compelled, being afraid of Cleomenes valiantness, he had secretly practifed that with Anigonus, which he was openly feen in afterwards : and that he had enticed the MEGALIPOLI-TANS (who were the first that moved it to the Council of the ACHAIANS) to call King Anigonus to their aid, because they were nearest neighbours to the fire, and continually harried with Clasmenes War, that alwaies knocked at their Gates to come and spoil them. Thus much is affirmed Philambas the by Philambas in his Hiftory, who was hardly to be credited notwithstanding, had not Polybius con-Hilloriografirmed it. For he loved Chomenes fo well, that it feemed he was ravifhed with some spirit as often pher not greate as he feeled the was a feeled the was ravifhed with some spirit as often pher not great-ly to be credit- as he spake of him: and frameth his History, as a common Counsellor that did plead a Case in Law before the Judges, still accusing the one, and defending the other. The ACHAIANS lost the City of Cleomenes win-MEGALIPOLIS again, the which King Cleomenes took of them, and overcame them in a great neth the City Battle by Hecatomizeon. Wherewithall they were so amazed, that they sent Ambassadors prefently unto him, and prayed him to come to the City of Argos, and there they would make him their Lieutenant Generall. But when Aratus heard he came indeed, and that he was not far from the City of LERNA with his Army: being afraid, he fent other Ambassadors to tell him that he should fafely come with three hundred men onely, as unto his Friends and Confederates : and yet if he miftrufted craft and evil dealing, that then they would give him pledges for the fafety of his person. Claomenes answered him, That was a plain-mockery, and an injury they offered him: Wherefore he presently departed thence, and sent a Letter before to the Council of the ACHAIANS, full of foul words and reproaches he gave unto Araim: who likewife replied to him again, bitterly unniing each other, that they came to talk of their Marriage and Wives. After this Letter, Cleoments fent defiance by an Herauld unto the ACHAIANS, and proclaimed open War against them: infomuch as he had almost gotten the City of S12 YO ME by practice of Traytors. Howbeit, failing of his purposchereturned suddenly, and went unto the City of PALLENA, which he took, and drove out the Generall of the ACHAIANS thence, and immediately after he wan the Cities also of PHE-NEA, and PENTELION. After that, the ARGIVES and PHILASIANS willingly yielded unto him, so that of all which the ACHAIANS had conquered, and joyned unto their Tribe, they could reckon of nothing of certainty unto them. Then Aratus was marvellously troubled in his mind, to fee all Peloponnesus in tumult and uprore, and that all the Cities fell to open rebellion by those that practifed change and alteration. For no man was contented with the State and Government at that time, but divers of the SICYONIANS and CORINTHIANS both were bewrayed which had secretly practifed with Cleomenes, and that of long time maliced the Government of the A-Araus putteth CHAIANS, desiring themselves to be Lords and Governours of their Cities. Araus having full Commission and Authority from the Council of the ACHAIANS, to make enquiry of them, and to put them to death, without further triall of Law, he did execute them accordingly, whom he found faulty in the City of Sicvons. Furthermore, attempting to do the like at CORINTH, he made inquiry of them, and put them to death; whereby he made the common People very angry with him, who otherwife of themselves were weavy of the Government and subjection of the ACHAI-ANS. The CORINTHIANS, therefore gathering together in the Temple of Apollo, they fent for Aratus, intending to makehim Prifoner before they would openly enter into actual rebellion. Aratus went thither, to shew that he neither seared nor misstrusted them, but yet he held his Horse flancy in dan- in his hand following of him. Then many role up against him, and did both reprove and injurioully entreat him. But Aratus with stayed countenance and gentle words, prayed them to keep their places, and not to cry out in such rage upon their feet, and withall, caused them also to come in, that were at the Temple door. But as he spake unto them, by little and little he drew back out of the prease, as though he meant to have given his Horse to some body to hold. So being gotten Aratus subtility out of the preas, he gently spake without any fear unto the CORINTHIANS he met, and bad when he flee them go to the Temple of Apollo. When he was come to the Castle, he then suddenly took his Horse out of Corinih. back, and commanded Cleopater, Captain of the Garrison of the ACHAIANS there, to look well to the safe keeping of the Castle. Then he set spurs to his Horse, and galloped towards the Cuty of SICYONE for life, being followed onely by thirty of his Souldiers, all the rest having for faken him, The City of and dispersed themselves here and there. Shortly after, the CORINTHIANS understanding that Corinth yield-Aratus was gone, they followed after, but could never overtake him: whereupon they ftraight fent ed up unto for King Cleomeres, and delivered the City of CORINTH into his hands, the gain whereof pleafed Cleomeres. him not so much, as he was forry for the loss of Aratus, whom they had let go. So King Cleomenes joyning unto him all the People dwelling along the Sea Coaft, commonly called the River of CORINTH, who yielded up themselves, Holds and Towns into his hands, he then intrenched in the Castle of the Acrocorinth with a great Trench. Furthermore, when Aratus came to the City of SICYONE, many of the ACHAIANS gathered about him, and holding a Council and Affembly, he was chosen their Lieutenant Generall, having absolute Power and Authority to do what he would, and gave him of their own Citizens to guard his Person. So, having managed the Affairs of the State and Commonwealth of the ACHAIANS the space of three and thirty years together, and having all that time been counted of all men the chiefest man of power and authority in GREECE, he then found himself in poor estate, for saken, and in great milery, as in the Shipwrack of his Countrey beaten with from, and in great danger of himself. For when he sent unto Aratus ingreat the ETOLIANS for aid, they statly denied him, and would send him none. Furthermore, the danger for his ATHENIANS being very desirous to fend aid for Aratus fake, were diffwaded from it through Countrey. the practice of Euclydan and Micion. Aratus also had a House in CORINTH, where all his Money was: the which King Cleomenes at the first medled not withall, neither would suffer any other to King Cleometouch it, but sent for his Friends and Officers, and charged them to look to it, to give Aratus a good nes courtesse account of it afterwards. Furthermore, he privily fent Tripylus unto him, and his Father-in-law Megistronus, and offered him great gifts, and specially an annual Pension of twelve Talents, which was double as much as King Ptolomy Bave him, who lent him yearly fix Talents. Befides, he onely prayed the Achaians, that they would make him their Lieutenant Generall, and also that the Garison in the Castle of Acrocorinth, might be divided in common between them. Aratus made answer, that he had an absolute power in his hands, and that it was in the ACHAIANS, not in him. Cleomenes thinking this but a device and excuse of Aratus, he presently invaded the Country of the SICYONIANS, and destroyed all as he came, and continued the space of three Moneths. Aratus in the mean time flood doubtfull how to determine, whether he should receive King Antigona; or not; because Antigonus would not aid him before he delivered him the Castle of the Acrocorinth into his hands. So the ACHAIANS meeting at the City of ÆGIUM to confult upon it, they fent for Aratus thither. Howbeit, it was dangerous coming thither, because Cleomenes Camp lay hard by the City of SICYONE: befides also that the Citizens kept Aratus, and held him by force, faying. That they would not lethim venture himself in such apparent danger, their Enemies being so near unto them. Moreover, the Women and little Children, hung about him, weeping and compassing him about, as their common Father and Saviour. But Aratus comforting them, bad them not be afraid, and to took his Horfe, with ten of his Friends and his Son (that was a young stripling grown) and went towards the Sea, and imbarked in certain Ships that rode at Anchor. Thence The Achaians he failed unto ÆGIUM, where the Diet or Parliament was kept; and there it was refolved, that they do fend for should fend for Antigonus, and deliver the Castle of Acrocorinth into his hands. And so it was King Antigoperformed: for Aratus lent thither his own Son among the other Hoftages. The CORINTHI-ANS were fo fore offended withall, that they made havock of his Goods, and gave his House he had in CORINTH unto King Cleomenes. So King Antigonus being onwards on his way to come into PELOPONNE sus with his Army, bringing with him twenty thousand Footmen all MACE-DONIANS, and four hundred Horfemen: Aratus with the greatest States and Officers of the A-CHAIANS, unwitting to their Enemies, went to meet him as far as the City of PEGES, having no great truft nor confidence in Antigonus, nor the MACEDONIANS. For he remembred very well, that he came first to his greatness, by the injuries be had offered them : and how that the chiefest cause of his rising, was the malice he bare unto old Antigonus. Howbeit making vertue of necesfiry, and weighing the inftant occasion of their present extreamity (of Governours, to be driven to Governours of be Subjects) he put himself in adventure. So, when Amigonus was told that Aratus was come in bey necessity. person to him, having with good countenance after common fort saluted those that came in his company: to Aratus himself at his first coming he gave an honourable welcome and entertainment. Antigonus ho-Afterwards also, finding him a good and discreet man, he fell into inward friendship and familia- nourable enterrity with him. For Aratus was not onely skilfull to give directions in maners of State touching tainment to good order and Government : but moreover, his company and conversation was very pleasant, to Arasus. entertain a Princes leifure with. Wherefore though Anisgenus was but young at that time, yet feeing throughly into Aratus nature, and that he was a meet man to be well thought of, and efteemed about a Prince, he used his counsel and advice more then any other mans, in all matters, not onely

came to pals, which the gods had promifed in their Sacrifices. For in a Beaft that was facrificed, there were two galls wrapped in one felf caul: the which the Soothfayers interpreted did prognothewed Aratus. Ricate, that two which before were mortall Enemies, should now become affured friends. But Ararum made no account of their prediction, neither did he give any credit to the Sacrifices, but trufted rather to his own determination. So, the Wars afterwards having good fuccels, and Amigonus making a Feaft in the City of CORINTH, where he had bidden many Guefts, he would needs have Aratus lie upon him at the Table, and a little while after, commanded his men to bring him a Coverlet, and turning to him, asked him if he were not a cold. Aratus answered him, It treezed. Then Antigonus bad him come near him, and when the Servants brought a Coverlet for the King, they cast it over them both. Then Araus remembring the Sacrifice, fell a laughing, and told the King what a wonder he had feen in the Sacrifice, and what interpretation the Soothsayers made of it. This was long after. So Antigonus and Aratus being at that time in the City of PEGES, they were fworn Brethren together: and then went both with all fpeed against the Enemies. Thus there fell out hot Skirmishes between them, hard by the City of CORINTH. For Cleament was very well fortified, and the CORINTHIANS valiantly defended themselves. In the mean time, Arifforeles of Argos (Aratus friend) fecretly fent him word, that he would make the City rebell, if he came himself with any number of Souldiers. Aratus told it unto King Antigonus, who gave him fifteen hundred men, with the which he imbarked, and passed over with great speed from the 18thmus (or Bar in the Streight) unto the City of EPIDAURUM. Howbeit, the ARGIVES tarried not Aratus coming, but were all up before he came, and did fet upon King Cleomenes men, and had driven them into the Caftle. Cleamenes being advertised of it, and fearing left his Enemies (keeping the City of Argos) (hould cut off his way from returning into his Countrey again with latery, if he were driven to a streight : be forsook the Castle of the Acrocorinth, and went his way by night to help his men in the City of Argos. So he came thither in time, and overthrew certain of his Enemies. But shortly after, Aratus and King Antigonus both being come thither with all their aid, The City of Cleomenes was driven to fly to the City of MANTINEA. After the recovery again of the City of Argor revoked AR Gos, all the refidue of the Cities of Peloponnesus did again return to the Achalans, from Cleame and Artifanus took the Cable of the Arracorinth So Aratus being cholen Canacall but the Aand Antigonus took the Castle of the Acrocorinth. So Aratus being chosen Generall by the Ag-GIVES, he counciled them to prefent Anisonus with all the Tyrants Goods, and those that had been Traytors to the Commonwealth. And after they had cruelly tormented the Tyrant Ariflomachus in the City of CENCHREES, in the end they cast him into the Sea, and drowned him. drowned in the Aratus was marvelloully reproved for his death, that would fuffer the poor man to be so viely handled, that was a good man, and one that had done him great pleafure : who through his perfwa-Arms infamy from willingly refigned up his Tyranny, and delivered the City of Arcos unto the Achaians, for Arifona-But besides this, they blamed him for many other things else: for that the ACHAIANS through his means had put the City of CORINTH into Antigonas hands, as though it had been fome mean Village: for that when they had facked the City of ORCHOMENE, they fuffered him to place a Garilon of the MACEDONIAN'S there: for Mat they had enacted by Parliament, that they should neither write, nor fend Ambassadors any whither, without Antigonus privity and consent; surthermore, for that they were compelled to give pay to the MACEDONIANS: for that they made Sacrifices, Feafts, and Games unto Antigonar, as if he had been a god; following the example of Aratus Citizens, who were the first that began, and had received Antigonus into the City bythe persuasion of Aratus, that lodged and seased him in his own House. With all these faults they burdened Aratus, and confidered not, that after they had put the reins of the Government into Antigonus hand, Araus himself (whether he would or not) was compelled to follow the swinge of the unbridled Prince, having no other means to flay it, but onely the liberty of speech to admonish him: and that also was not to be exercised, without apparent and great danger. For it is most true, that many things were done greatly against Araus mind : as amongst others, that Anigonal caused the Tyrants Images of Argos to be set up, which he had before pulled down; and allo that he made them to be overthrown, which Araus had fer up for those that had taken the Castle of CORINIH, and onely left Araims one Statue, notwithftanding all the earnest entreaty Araims made to the contrary, yet he could get no grant of any thing to be requested. Besides also, it appeareth that the ACHAIANS dealt not fo friendly with the MANTINEANS, as became GRECI-ANS one to another. For they having the City in their hands by Anisgonus means, did put all the nobleft and chiefeft men of MANTINEA to death; others they fold as Slaves, and fent the reft into MACEDON with irons on their legs, and brought the poor women and children into bondage, and fold them for Slaves: and of Money they got by fpoil, they divided the third part among themselves, and left the other two parts unto the MACEDONIANS. Now furely it cannot be faid, but this was done for some cruel revenge. For though it was an over-great cruelty, in rage and passion of mind, to handle People of one self-blood and language in this lamentable fort; yet Simonides faith, When men are driven and forced to it, it is a gentle (no cruell) thing, to cale their great stomachs inflamed with rage and malice. But for that which was done afterwards unto the City, no man can excuse Arans, nor say, that he was either driven to it by necessity, or that he had otherwife any honest occasion to do it. For King Antigonas having given the City of MANTI-NEA unto the ARGIVES, they determined to make it a Colony, and chole Aratus their General: who made a Decree, that thenceforth the City should no more be called MANTINEA, but ANTI-GONIA, as it beareth name unto this day. Thus it feemeth that gentle MANTINEA (for fothe Poets called it) was utterly destroyed, and bare the name of another City through Aratus means. preferring the name of him that destroyed the City, and did put all the Inhabitants of the first to Mantinga cal-After that, King Cleomenes being overthrown in a great Battle by the City of SELLASIA, led Antizonit, he left the City of SPARTA, and fled into ÆGYPT. So Antigonus having used Aratus with all by Aratus Dekind of honourable courtefie, he returned again into MACEDON. There talling fick, he fent Thilip that should succeed him in the Kingdom (being a young stripling grown) into PELOPON-NESUS. and straightly charged him specially to follow Aratus counsell, and to employ him when he would speak unto the Cities, and become acquainted with the ACHAIANS. So Aratus having received him in that fort, made him fo well affected and loving towards him, that he fent him again into Macedon, being throughly determined to make Wars with Greece. So after the death of Antigonus, the ETOLIANS began to despile the carelefness and cowardliness of the ACHAIANS Checaule that they being used to be desended by strangers, and having been altogether governed by the Armies of the MACEDONIANS, they lived very idly and diffolutely) whereupon they took upon them to make themselves Lords of PELOPONNESUS. So they affembled an Army, and by the way as they went, they onely took some prey and spoil upon the Lands of the PATREIANS. and the DYMEIANS: but invading the Territory of MESSINA with all their Army, they destroyed the whole Countrey before them. Arans being very angry withall, and perceiving that Timoxenus (who at that time was General of the ACHAIANS) did still tract and delay time in vain, because he was upon going out of his year; he being appointed Generall for the year following, did anticipate his time five days before, to go and aid the MESSINIANS, Wherefore leaving an Army of the ACHAIANS, who were persons now neither exercised in Arms, nor yet had any defire to go to the Wars, he was overthrown by the City of CAPHYES. Now, because it was thought Aratus overthat he went too hotly and couragiously to the Wars, he fo extreamly cooled again, and left things thrown in Batin such case, that all hope being cast aside, he suffered the ATOLIANS in manner to tread PELO- the by the City PONNESUS under their feet before his eyes, with all the infolency and cruelty that might be poffi- of Caphyes. ble, notwithstanding that they fundry times gave him great advantages of them. Thus were the A-CHAIANS once again forced to pray aid out of MACEDON, and to fend for young Philip to The Achaians make Wars in GREECE: hoping, for the love he bare unto Aratus, and the great truft he had in fent for King him, that he would use them gently, and do as they would have him. But when first of all began Apelles, Megareus, and a few other Courtiers to accuse Arasus: unto whom King Philip giving easie ear, he procured that one Eparatus, of contrary faction unto Aratus, was chosen Generall by the ACHAIANS. Howbeit, this new Generall Eparatus being extreamly hard by the ACHAIANS, and Aratus also leaving to deal any more with matters of State, no act was done to any purpose. Whereupon King Philip finding his fault, returned again unto Aratus, and was ruled altogether by him : and when he found that his Affairs prospered in all things he went about, he then let him alone with all, as from whom came all his honour and greatness. Thereupon every man effected Aratus a wife Governour, not onely to rule a Commonwealth, but allo a whole Realm and Kingdom. For his manners, intent, and chiefest purpose appeared in the deeds of this young King, as a rich colour that did fet forth and beautifie them. For the clemency this young Prince used to the LACE-DEMONIANS that had offended him, the great courtese he shewed to the CRETANS, whereby in few days he wan all the Isle of CRETA: and the Journey he made against the ETOLIANS, which was a wonderfull great Exploit, wan the Prince great Fame, for following good counfell, and Aratus to be accounted a wife Governour, and of deep understanding. Now the Kings Aratus wife Flatterers envying Aratus more then before, and perceiving they got no good by secret back-biting Counsellor. of him, they then began with open mouth very infolently to revile him at the Table, and with Envythe Counsellor Corresponding Counsellor Corresponding Counsellor Corresponding Counsellor Corresponding Counsellor Counsello great derifion: infomuch as one night going home to his Tent after Supper, they pelted him with panion of Vergreat octions: all the way as he went. King Philip when he knew it, was 60 offended therewith, that he did condean them in the fum of twenty Talents; and afterwards also, because they troubled his Affairs, he did pur them to death. But King Philip in the end being pussed up with the good fortune and success of this War, which prospered as he would have it, he then grew to be coverous, and began to shew his naughty nature, and to bewray his distimulation wherewith he disguiled himself, and by little and little to make his vices plainly to appear. For first of all, he abused young Aratus Wife, which was kept secret a long time, because he lay in their House, and began daily to grow more severe and cruel to the Commonweals; and then the World and began daily to grow more levere and clust to the Commonwest, and beginning of the miltruth he had of Arassa, came for that which was done at Messina. For the Messini of dipleafures Ans being fallen together by the ears, and in great Civil Wars one with another, Aratus between Aratus went thither to make Peace between them. Howbeit, King Philip came thither the next day and Philip. following, and instead of pacifying the quarrell, he set them surther out together then they were before. First, he asked the Governours of the City, whether they had no Laws to bridle the infolency and stomach of the common People; and privately also talked with the heads of the Faction of the People, and asked them if they had not hands to defend themselves from mulation and Tyrants. So both the one and the other Faction trufting to King Philip, the Governours would double dealing have laved hold on the Orators of the City: but they rifing with the common People, flew of of King Philip. their Nobility and Magistrates, well near two hundred of them. Aratus that came soon after this Fact, shewed that he was greatly offended with King Philip, and caused his Son with open mouth shamefully to reprove him. Now it seemed that this young Arasus was in love with King

Philip before: but then he told him before all the People, that for this shamefull act he had done, he thought him now no more fair of face, but the soulest creature that could be. Philip made Antiferine in thought mill how no more rail of race, on the control and the rail of the control times as the other reproved him, he bir it in with his teeth : but yet as if he had not been offended at all with the big words his Son had fooken against him (for that he was a civil man, and mild of nature) he took Arains the Father by the hand, and carried him out of the Theatre where the Affembly was kept, to the Caftle of Ithome, to do Sacrifice there to Jupiter, and to fee the Fort. This Fort was of no lefs ftrength then the Castle of the Acrocorinth : and when any Garifon is in it, it keepeth all the Countrey about it in obedience: and befides it is very hard to drive themout of it. Now Philip being gotten up into that Castle, he did Sacrifice there: and when the Soothfayer had brought him the intrails of the Ox which they had facrificed, he took it himself with both his hands, and shewed them unto Aratus, and to Demetrius PHALERIAN, now turning with both his nands, and niewed them unto Arani, and to Demetrial Phalerian, now turing to the one, then to the other, and asked them what they judged of these signs of the Sacristice; whether he should keep the Castle to himself; or else deliver it to the Messinians. Demetrial smiling, andwered him: If thou beest of the Soothsyrers mind, then thou shalt deliver it metrials smilling, and wered him: up: but if thou haft a Kings mind in thee, thou shalt then hold the Ox by both horns. (By the Ox, he meant the Countrey of PELOFONNESUS: and moreover, that if he kept both thefe Caffles, of Ithome and the Acrocorinth, all PELOPON NESUS were wholly at his commandment.) Aratus ftill held his peace, and faid not a word. In the end, Philip praying him to speak, he faid: In CRETA, and in the Countrey of the BOBOTIANS and PHOCIANS, there are many ftrong Castles situated on high hills from the Valleys. Moreover, there are also many places of great frength in the Marches of the Acarmanians, both within main Land, as allo upon the Sea Coaft: of all the which thou haft not taken one of them by force, and yet they all do willingly obey thee notwithflanding. It is for Thieves to hide their heads in high Rocks and Mountains, but a King can have no ftronger Castle, then the love, saith, and good will of men. That is it, that opened the Sea of CRETA. That is it, that hath brought thee into Peloponnesus. Those unto King are the means which have made thee being fo young a man, fome of them to choose thee their Captain, rouch tain, and others also to make thee their absolute Lord and Master. Araus going on with his tale, in the latest Philip gave the intrails again to the Soothfayer that brought them, and taking Arass by the hand (as if by force he had caft him out of the Caftle, and had alfo taken the City of Messina from him) faid unto him, Come on then, let us even take that course. Bur after that time, Arafrom him faid unto him, Come on then, let us even take that course. Bur after that time, Arafrom him faid unto him, Come on then, let us even take that course. Bur after that time, Arafrom him faid unto him, Come on then, let us even take that course. Bur after that time, Arafrom him faid unto him, Come on then, let us even take that course. Bur after that time, Arafrom him faid unto him, Come on then, let us even take that course. when he went to make War in the Realm of Epixus, he was earneftly in hand with Aratus to go that Journey with him. But Aratus prayed him to hold him excited, and fo remained at home, being afraid to be brought into an evil name with Philips doings. For Philip afterwards having shamefully lost his Army by Sea against the ROMANS, and belides, having had also very ill successin all other his Assaurs, he returned again to PELOPONNESUS, and thought once more to have deceived the MESSINIANS. But when they found his practice, then he began with open force to fpoil their Countrey.

Aratus then flatly fell out with Philip, and utterly refused his friendship, for that he perceived then the injury he had done his Sons Wife, the which grieved him to the heart; but yet he made not his Son privy to it, because he could get no other amends then to know what injury had been done to him, confidering that he had no way nor means to be revenged. For King Philip was marvelloully changed, and from a courteous and chaft young Prince, courteous became a vicious and cruel Tyrant: the which to speak truly, was not a change or alteration in na-Prince became utre, but a manifert declaration (when he was no more afraid of any man) of his wicked and devilish mind, the which through fear had of long time been kept fecret. Now, to prove that Philips first love and good will he bare unto Aratus, was also mingled with fear and reverence, that whichbe did afterwards unto him did plainly thew it. For he being defirous to put Aratus to death, northinking himfelf free fo long as helived, neither King, nor Tyrant : he durft not go about to kill him himfelf, but procured one of his Captains called Taurion, and commanded him to make him away as ferrely Artus poyfon. as he could possible, and specially with poyson in his absence. This Taurion sell in friendship with ed by King Araus, and poyfoned him with no violent poyfon, but fo tempered and qualified it, as it did by little Philips means, and little heat the body, and procure a pretty cough which brought him into a confumption. Aratus knew he was poyfoned: but because he saw it booted not to bewray it, he bare it patiently, and made no words of it, as if he had had fome naturall disease about him. Yet on a time, one of his chiefest friends being in his Chamber with him, who wondred to feehim spir blood as he did: he told him, Friend Caphalon mine, this is the reward of a Kings Love. So he died of this poyson in the Ci-A Kings him, Friend Cephalon mine, this is the reward of a Anigs Love. So the data with which would have had friendflip danty of ÆGIUM, being the seventeenth time chosen Generall of the ACHAIANS, who would have had true honourshle Monument for him, worthy of him buried in the fell-fame place, and have made fome honourable Monument for him, worthy of his noble Life. But the SICYONIANS thinking themselves dishonoured, if his body were buried any where else but in their own City, they so perswaded the Council of the ACHAIANS, that they fuffered them to take Aratus body with them. Yet was there an ancient Law that forbad buriall within A Law for but the Walls of the City, of any manner of perfon what foever: and befides that Law, they had a certain the wansor the Cay, or any manner or perion what over a mortise function that fact of Apollo's Temple strending. at DELPHOS, to ask counsel of his Nunthar gave the Oracles; who made them this answer:

Thou happy foil of Sicyon , Aratus native place , Whereas thou askelt counsell in that noble Captains case. For keeping of a year-mind, and for making feastfull days In honour of that worthy wight , to last henceforth always : If any hinder your intent , through fondness or through spite Both Sea and Land, and Heaven it felf will punish that same wight.

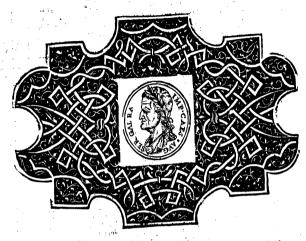

This Oracle being brought, all the ACHAIANS were marvellous glad of it, but the SICYONIANS fpecially: who prefently changing their mourning into publick joy, they carried the Body from the City of ÆGIUM, and brought it home as in manner of procession, in white Robes, and Garlands of Flowers on their heads, finging Hymns and Songs of joy, and dancing, till they came to the City of SICYONE. And there they chose out the chiefest place, and buried him as their Founder. Father, and Saviour of their City: and the place is called at this present time, ARATIUM. There Father, and Saviour of their City: and the place is called at this pretent time, ARATION. There arises, they yearly make two folemn Sacrifices, the one the fift of November, at which time he de-Yearly factification. livered the City of Sicyone from tyranny; and they call this Sacrifice Soteria, as much to fay, ces appointed as the Feast of health: and the other on his birth day, as it is reported. For the first Sacrifice, that to honour Awas done by the Priest of Jupiter the Saviour. The second Sacrifice also was done by Aratus Son , ratus memory. who was girt about with a cloath, not altogether white, but mingled with Purple colour. So during the Sacrifice, they fung Hymns upon the Harp in praise of him; and the Master of the Muficians made a procession round about, being accompanied with Boys and young men of the City, after whom followed the Senate crowned with Garlands of Flowers, and other Citizens that were disposed to go to a Procession : Howbeit the most part of the honours that were appointhat were informed to go of a control of the state of the done unto him; were left off by process of time; and change of things that followed afterwards. Thus you fee what the Life of Aratus the Father hath been, as we find in Histories. How Philip being a wicked man, and crueil of nature, caused his son Aratus also to be positioned, tast the Son. not with a deadly Poison, but with such a Poyson as troubled a mans wits so, that through their Strange kinds divellish receit, he becometh a stark fool without any wit at all, and maketh him to attempt strange of poyloning. and abominable things, and to have certain shamefull and detestable defires : infomuch as his death (though he died in the prime of his youth) could not be thought miferable, but rather a happy deliverance to him out of all his miferies and milhaps. But Philip afterwards, fo long as he punished for lived, payd unto Japiter (Protectour of all justice and friendflip) the punishment his wicked life his wicked. deserved. For, after he was overcome in Battell by the ROMANS, he was compelled to yeeld ness. himself to their mercy; by whom he was deprived from all the rest of his Lands and Dominions he had, and of all his ships, but five onely; and condemned besides to pay a thousand Talents for fine, and to give his Son in hoftage : and they onely left him for pities fake, the Kingdom of Macedon, with all the Appurtenances. And there he daily putting to death the chiefeft of his Nobility, and nearest of bloud unto him, he filled his Realm with cruelty and mortall hate against him. Furthermore amongst such a heap of evils, having but one onely joy, to have a vertuous Son, he put him to death , for fpite and malice that he faw the ROMANS honour him ; and left his other Son Perfeus Succeffour of his Realm: who as it is reported, was not his lawfull begotten Son, and born Perfeus King of a Taylours Wife called Gnathenium. It is that Terfeut, whom Paulus Amylius overcame, and Philips Son, also led in Triumph in Rome: and at him the Race of the Kings descended from Anigona, failed, Amylius Triwhere the iffue and Off-spring of Aratus continueth yet untill our time, in the Cities of Sicyone, umphed for in and PALLENA.

Æmylius fay ing of Soul-diers.

Phicrates the ATHENIAN Captain faid, that a mercenary Souldin should be covetous, a lover, and voluptuous: that to get wherewith to maintain his pleasure, he should be the valianter, and readier to put himself into any danger. But most men think, that Souldiers should be as one entire strong body, that stirreth not of it self without the moving of the Generall. And to approve this opinion, it is faid that Paulus Amylius arriving in MACEDON, and finding the Souldiers full of words and curiofity (every man medling with the affairs of the Generall) he made open proclamation, No man fo hardy to meddle with his Office and affairs; but every man onely to keep his Sword fharp, and to be quick of hand againft the Enemy; and for the reft, to refer all to him, who would rake fufficient order for things of his charge and Government. Plus's faying ment. Therefore Plato faith, that it little availeth to have a good and wife Captain, if the Souldiers also be not wise and obedient; thinking it as requisite for the vertue of obedience, to have men of a noble mind and good education, as otherwife it is meet for a Captain to know how to direct and command well; confidering it is that which with lenity and mildness doth mitigate all fury and choler. He hath divers other examples and fufficient proofs to prove his words true, and namely the great miferies and calamities which came to the ROMANS after the death of More, do plainly shew, that nothing is more dangerous nor dreadfull in an Empire, then a great Army living Demailer lay- licentioully and diforderly. For Demailer after the death of Alexander the Great, compared Alexander ing of Alexan- anders Army unto Cyclops Polyphemus after his eye was put out : confidering how blindly and loofly they were governed. Howbeit the Empire of ROME being divided into fundry factions at one felf time and rifing against it felf in many places, it fell into the like missortunes and calamities faigned by the Poets of the TITANS : not so much through the ambitiousness of the Emperours, as by means of the coveroulness and infolency of the Souldiers, who drave the Emperours out of their Imperiall Seass one after another, as one nail driveth out another. And Dionyfius also the Tyrant of Sicile, was wont to call Phereus (who had been Tyrant of THESSALIA Onely ten moneths space) a Tyrant in a Play, deriding his so suddain change of State. But the Imperiall House of the Cafare at Rome, received four Emperours, in less then ten Moneths space, the Souldiers now putting in one, and then taking out another, as it they had been in a Play on a Scaffold. So that the ROMANS being thus grievoully oppreffed, had yet this comfort: that they needed not to feek to be revenged of them that did oppress them. For they saw one of them murther another, and him first and most justly of all other murthered, that had first of all corrupted the Souldiers, in teachnum into and more party of a considering the most of the change of the Emperours: and so depraying a worthy deed of it self, which was their forsaking of New; and mingling it with bribery, made it plain treason. For Nymphidius Sabinus, being Captain of the Emperours Guard, which are called the Pratorian Nymphidius Nymphidisus Sahinus, being Capitani of the Emperious Charles, which are cannot the Previous Sahine, and Souldiers, together with Tigedinus, when he saw Nero despair of himself and of his estate, and Tigedinus, be-Sounders, rogener want 1 Tigellians, be that he was ready to flie into Egypt: he perfwaded the Guard they should call Galla Emperour, trayed Nero. as if Nero had not been at ROME, but fled and gone; and promifed every one feven thousand five hundred Drachma's apiece : and to the rest of the Souldiers that were dispersed up and down in Garrison upon the Provinces, twelve hundred and fifty Drachma's a man. For the leavying of which fum, they could not possibly do it, but they must needs commit ten thousand times more extortion on every body, then Nero had done. This large promife made them presently put Nero to death, and shortly after him, Galba himself also. For the Souldiers forfook Nero, for the hope they had to receive this promifed Gift : and shortly after they slew the second, which was Galba, becausethey received not their Gifts in time to their contentment. Atterwards also, in seeking who fhould ftill feed them with like Gifts, before they could obtain their wished hope, one of them destroy- The hope of ed another by treason and rebellion. But how to set down all things particularly which hapned at Gifts deltroythat time, it were to write one whole entire Hiftory : and therefore, I will content my felf, not to ed the Empire pass over with filence the notablest deeds, and lamentable calamities, which hapned at that time un- of Rome. It is manifestly known to all men, that Sulpitims Galba of a private man, was the richest and

So Galba thereby was somewhat a kin unto Livia the Wife of Angustus Cafar, and therefore for her take he came out of the Emperours Pallace, when he went to take posseition of his Consulship. Moreover it is reported, that when he had charge of the Army in GERMANY, he did valiantly behave himself. And in the Government of Lybia also, where he was Vice Consull, he did as Emperour : because the practise of sober and temperate diet which he would have brought in use, was then fo raw a thing, that it was taken for a new and strange device. He was sent Governour also into SPAIN by Nero, before he had learned to be afraid of the Citizens of great authority : howbevex and torment the Provinces, and that it lay not in Galba any way to help them : yet was it some comfort to them, which were judged and fold as flaves by the Officers, to fee that Galba did lament the miferies and calamities they endured, as if they had been done unto himfelf. So when any flanderous Rimes were made against Nero, which were sung up and down in every place, he would neither forbid them, nor yet was offended as Nero's Officers were. Therefore he was marvelloully beloved in the Countrey, of them that were acquainted with him: because he was then in the eight year of vers others which were Governours of Armies and Provinces did : who fent Vindex Letters unto Nero which be himfelf had written unto them, and fo did as much as in them lay to hinder the enterprife, who afterwards being of the confpiracy did confeis they were Traytours to themfelves, as much as

again unto Galba, and praied him to take the imperiall Crown upon him, and to become the head of a ftrong and mighty body (which were the GALLS) that lacked nothing but a head and Governour, being a hundred thouland fighting men ready armed, and might also leavy a great number more of them. Then Galba confulted thereupon with his friends, and among them some were of opinion that he should stay a while, to see what change and alteration would grow at ROME upon this ftraight abroad, he gathered a great number of Souldiers together, that were very willing to rebell: and he was no sooner gotten up into the Tribunall or Chair of State, but all the Souldiers did falute him by the Name of Emperour. Howbeit he was not content with this Name at the first, but accusing Nero, and Lamenting the death of the noblest men whom he had cruelly put to death, he pro-

Moreover, though the Senate had judged Galba an F. nemy, yet Alero to be pleasant with his friends, made as though he was nothing afraid of it, and said. This news made all for him, because he ftood in need of Money, and also that it was a happy occasion offered him to help him withall. For faid he, we shall soon have all the GAULS goods, as the fpoil of a just War, after we have once again overcome and conquered them: and moreover, Galbis goods also would quickly be in his hands; that he might fell them, confidering that he was become his open Enemy. So he prefently commanded Galba's goods frould be openly fold to them that would give most. Galba understanding that , did also by found of Trumpet iell all Nero's goods he had in all the Province of SPAIN, and did also find more men readier to buy, then there were goods to fell. Daily men role against Ners in every Countrey, who took Galba's part, Clodina Macer onely excepted in AFRICK, and Verginium Rufu in GAUL, both of them having charge of Legions appointed for the fafe keeping of GERMANY: and both of them did follow feveralldi-Claling Macer, rections by themselves, varying in mind and intent. For Cloding Macer baving robbed much, and put divers men also to death through his cruelty and coverousness, shewed plainly, that he swambe-Africk.

This at the first somewhat amazed Galba. But when both the Armies of Vindex and Verginius, in spite of their Captains (who could not stay nor keep them back, no more then Coach-men can keep back the Horse with their bridles) where joyned in a great Battell together, where were slain twenty thousand GAULS in the Field, and Vindex also slew himself shortly after: it was given out, that the Conquerours after fo great a Victory obtained, would compell Verginism to take upon him to be Emperour, or elfethat they would take Nero's part again. Then Galba being not a little perplexed, wrote unto Verginism, and perswaded him to joyn with him to hold up the Empire and Liberty of the ROMANS, and there-Colonia a City upon fled ftraight into a City of SPAIN , called * COLONIA , rather repenting him of that he had done, and withing for his wonted peaceable and quiet life wherein he was brought up, then otherwife occupying himself about any necessary or profitable thing for the surtherance of his enterprise, Now it was about the beginning of Summer, and one day towards evening, there came to Galba one of his Slaves enfranchifed, a SICILIAN born, that was come from ROME in feven days : who understanding that Galba was alone, went prefently to his Chamber door, and opened it, and coming in against the wils of the Grooms of the Chamber, that flood at the door , he told him that Nevo being yet alive, but feen no more, first the People of ROME, and then the Senate had proclaimed him Emperour, and that immediatly after, news came that Nero was dead : the which he hardly beleeving notwithftanding, went thither himself, saw his body laid out upon the ground, and then made towards him with all speed to bring him these news. The news marvellously revived Galba, and a multitude of men thronged straight about the door, which began to be couragious, feeing him lively again, although the speed of the Messenger seemed incredible. Howbeit two days after , Titm also arrived, with certain others of the Camp, who told Galba particularly what the Senate and decreech in his behalf. So this Titue was called to great honour : and the Slave infranchised had priviledge given him to wear Rings of Gold, and he was called Martianus Vicellus, who afterwards of all the entranchifed bondmen , became the chiefest man about his Master Galba. In the mean time, Nymphidins SABINB began at Rome, not coverily, but with open force, to take upon him the absolute Government of the Empire, perswading himself that Galba was so old, that he could hardly be brought in a Litter unto ROME, being at the least seventy three years old: besides also, that the Army of the PRETORI-ANS which were in ROME, did bear him good will of long time, and then acknowledged no other Lord but him onely, for the large promite he had made them, for the which he received the thanks, and Galba remained the Debter. So he preferrly commanded Tigellinus, his Companion and Captain with him of the Army of the PRETORIANS, to leave off his Sword : and disposing himself to banqueting and feafting, he fent for all those that had been Confuls, Prators, or Pro-confuls of Provinces, and made them all to be invited in the Name of Galba. So, there were certain Souldiers gave out this rumour in the Camp, that they should do well to fend Ambassadours unto Galba, to pray him that Nymphidins might be their onely Captain still, without any Companion joyned with him. Furthermore, the honour and good will the Senate bare him, calling Nyamphidian their Benefactor, and going daily to vifit him in his house, procuring him to be the Author of all their Decrees passed in Senate, and that he should authorife them : this made him high-minded, and the bolder by much ; infomuch that shortly after, they that came to honour him in this fort, did not onely hate and millike his doings, but more over he made them afraid of him. Furthermore, when the Confuls had given to common Pursivants any Commissions under Seal, or Letters Patents signifying the Decrees of the Senate, to carry them to the Emperour (by Vertue of which Letters Patents , when the Officers of the City do fee the Seal , they straight provide the Pursivants of Coaches and fresh Horses to further their speed and hasty journey:

Ny mphidisse was very angress the them, because they did not also come to him for his Letters, scaled by him and his Souldiers, to fend likewise to the Emperour. But besides all this, it is also reported that he was like to have deposed the Consuls: howbeit they excusing themselves unto him. and craving pardon, did appeale his anger. And to please the commons also, he suffered them to put any of Nero's friends to death they could meet withall. Among other, they flew a Fencer cal- Nero's friends led Spicillus, whom they put under Nero's Statues, which they dragged up and down the City. A. by Nombhidius nother also called Aponius, one of Nero's Accusers, they threw him to the ground, and drave Carts commandover him loaden with Stones. And divers others allo, whom they flew in that manner, of the ment. which fome had done no manner of offence. Hereupon one Maurifeus, one of the noblest men of the City, and so esteemed, faid openly in the Senate: I fear me we shall wish for Nero again, before it be long. So Nymphidim being come in manner to the fulness of his hope, he was very The Parentage glad to hear that some repined at him, because he was the Son of Caim Cafar, that was the of Nymphidius.

next Emperour after Tiberius. For this Caims Cafar, when he was a young man, had kept Nymphidius Mother, which had been a fair young Woman, and the Daughter of one Calliftus, one of Cafars enfranchifed Bondmen , whom he had gotten of a Laundress he kept. Howbeit it is found contrary, that this Nymphidius was born before Caim Cafar could know his Mother: and men thought that he was begotten of a Fencer called Martianus, with whom his Mother Nymphidia fell in fancy, for that he had a great Name at that time in Rome; and indeed Nymphidisu was liker to him in favour, then unto any other. So, he confessed that he was the Son of this Nymphidia. howbeit he did alcribe the glory of the death of Nero unto himself, and thought himself not sufficiently recompenced with the honours they gave him, neither also with the goods he enjoyed, neither for that he lay with Sperus, whom Nero loved fo dearly, whom he fent for to Nero's Funerals whileft his body was yet a burning, and kept him with him as if he had been his Wife, and called him Poppans. Furthermore, all this did not content him, but yet fecretly he aspired to be Emperour, partly practifing the matter in ROME it felf, by the means of certain Women and Senatours which were fecretly his friends: and partly also through one Gellianus, whom he fent into SPAIN, to fee how all things went there. Howbeit after the death of Nero, all things prospered with Galba, faving Verginius Rufus onely, who stood doubtfull yet, and made him forely mistrust him; for that he was afraid (befides that he was Generall over a great and puiffant Army , having also newly overthrown Vindex, and fecretly ruling the best part of the Empire of ROME, which was all GAUL, and then in tumult and uproar, ready to rebell,) left he would hearken unto them that perswaded him to take the Empire to himself. For there was no Captain of ROME at that time so famous, pergining a faand of fo great estimation as Verginius: and that deservedly, for that he had done great service to mous Captain, the Empire of Rome in time of extremity, having delivered Rome at one felf time from a cruell tyranny, and also from the danger of the Wars of the Gauls. This notwithstanding, Verginius perfifting still in his first determination, referred the Election of the Emperour unto the Senate: although, that after the death of Nero was openly known, the common fort of Souldiers were earnestly in hand with him, and that a Tribune of the Souldiers (otherwise called a Colonell of a thousand men) went into his Tent with a Sword drawn in his hand, and bad Verginius either determine to be Emperour, or else to look to have the Sword thrust into him. Yet after that Fabins Valens , Captain of a Legion , was fworn unto Galba, and that he had received Letters from ROME. advertifing him of the Ordinance and Decree of the Senate: in the end, with much ado, he perswaded the Souldiers to proclaim Galba Emperour, who fent Flacens Ordeonius to succeed him, unto whom he willingly gave place. So, when Verginias had delivered up his Army unto him, he went to meet with Galba, on whom he waited, coming on still towards ROME. And Galba all that time neither shewed him evill countenance, nor yet greatly esteemed of him, Galba himself being cause of the one who feared him, and his friends of the other, but specially Titus Junius: who for the malice he bare unto Verginius thinking to hinder his rifing, did unwittingly indeed further his good hap, and delivered him occasion to draw him out of the civill Wars and mischiefs (the which lighted afterwards upon all the other Captains) and to bring him to a quiet and peaceable life in his age. Furthermore, Ambassadours were sent from the Senate, and met with Galba at NARBONA, a City of GAUL: where after they had prefented their humble duty, they perfwaded him to make all the hafte he could possible to shew himself to the People of Rome, who were marvellously defirous to fee him. Galba received them very graciously and courteously, and made them great chear, howbeit very modefily. For notwithstanding that Nymphidius had lent him divers Officers, and store of Nero's moveables: yet he would never be served with any of them, at any Feasts or Banquets he made, nor with other then his own stuff; wherein he shewed his noble mind, and how he could Mafter all vanity. But Titus Junius shortly after told Galba, that his noblemind, and civill moderation, without pride or pomp, was too lowly a matter to flatter the People, and that it was a certain respect of honesty that knew not it self, and became not his greatness and majefty. So, he perswaded him to use Nero's Money and stuff, and to be sumptuous and Princely in his Feafts, without niggardliness. To conclude, the old man Galba began plainly to shew, that he would be ruled by Titus Junius: who above all other was extream coverous, and besides too much given to Women. For when he was a young man, the first time he went to the Wars to the Calculfus SARINE, he brought his Captains Wife (which liked good fellowship) diffguired one of Time he was a work of the was a work of the was a work of the work of like a Souldier into the Camp, into his Generals Tent (Which the ROMANS called Principle) and there was somewhat bold with her. Wherefore Cains Casar committed him to Prison, but he

GALBA escaped at his death. Another time, when he supped with Classic, he ftole a filver Pot. Clodin hearing of it, bade him again to supper the next night: but he commanded his men they thould give him drink in an earthen Crufe. Thus this theft (through Ce/ars pleafantness) fremed rather a matter of sport, then of anger : howbeit the faults which he committed afterwards through extream covetoufnets of Money (at what time he ruled Galba, and bare all the fway about him, gave unto him some just cause, and unto others apparent colour of tragical mischieis, and grievous calamities. For Nymphidius, fo foon as Gelliannus was returned out of Spain, whom he had fent thinher to fee what Galba did, informing him that Cornelius Lacon was Captain of the guard and house of the Emperour; and that Titus ganing did all in all about him, and that he could never be suffered to come near Galba, nor to speak with him apart, because those which were about Galba did miftrust him, and never had an eye to him to see what he did; he was marvellouly perplexed withall. Thereupon he called for all the Centurions, Captains, and petry Captains of the Camp of the Pratorian Arthy, and perfwaded them that Galba touching his own Perfon, was a good old and diferent man, howbeit that he did not follow his own advice and counfell, but was ruled altogether by Jamins and Lacon, who marred all : and therefore, that it were good (before they came to be of greater power, and to have fuch great authority in managing the affairs of the Empire, as Tigellinus had before) to fend Ambassadours to the Emperour, in the name of all the Camp, to tell him that in putting those two men from about him, he should be the better welcom to Rome, and to all men else befides. The Captains utterly missiked this device. For they thought it too ftrange, and beyond all reason, to feem to teach an old Emperour, as if he were but a Child that did not know what it was to govern: and to appoint him what Servanie and Friends he should keep, and whom he should trust or mistrust. Nymphidian perceiving this, took another course, and wrote Letters unto Galba to terrifie him; one time sending him word that he was marvellous evill beloved of many in ROME, and that they were ready to rebell against hm: another time also that the Legionsof Germanie were revolted, and that he underitood the like from the Legions of JURIS and SYRIA: and another time also that Cleding Maerr in Africa stayed all the ships fraughted with Corn that were bound for Rome. But in the end finding that Galba made no account of him, and that he gave no credit to his words nor writings, he determined first of all to set upon him. Howbeit Cloding Celling, born in the City of ANTI-OCH, a wife man, and his faithfull friend, diffwaded him marvelloufly not to do it: declaring unto him, that he thought there was no one house nor family in Rome that would call Nymphidiss, Cafar. Howbeit in contrary manner, divers others mocked Galba, and specially one Mitbridatt of the Realm of PONT, that faid he was a bald writhen man. For the ROMANS (faid he) have him indeed now in some estimation ; but when they have once seen him , they will think it a perpetual shame and reproach to our time, that he was called Cafar. So they thought it good to bring Nymphidius about mid-night into the Camp, and there openly to proclaim him Emperour. "Howher the chief Tribune of the Souldiers called Antonius Honoratus gathered his Souldiers together in the "night, and before them all did first openly reprove himself, and then them, for that they had so of Antonius Souldiers, un. "often turned and changed in 60 (hort time, without any wit or difcretion, having no judgemento "choose the best way, but to be pricked forward and carried headlong in that fort by fome wicked nous Souldiers. " Spirit, which brought them out of one treason into another. And yet (aid he) our first changehad "fome countenance of reason, to wit, the horrible Vices and faults of Ngro: but now wherein an "we accuse Galba, to have any countenance to falsifie our faith unto him? hath he slain his Mo-"ther? hath be put her to death? hath he shamefully played the tumbler or common player upon " a Scaffold in the Theater ? And yet for all these vile parts, we never durk once begin to forlike " Nero, but gave credit to Nymphidian words , who told us that Nero had first for faken us and that "he was fled into ÆGIPT. What shall we do? shall we kill Galba after Nero? what shall we kill "him that is a kin unto Livia , to make the Son of Nymphidia Emperour, as we have already flain the Son of Agrippina? or shall we rather kill him that hath rashly entred into this enterprise "and thereby to revenge the death of Nero, and to flew our felves faithfull Souldiers unto Galbat All the Souldiers yielded ftraight to the Colonels words, and therewith went to their other Companions to perfuade them to keep their faith and promife they avowed unto the Emperour: so that they made many of them revolt again from Nymphidiat. Thereupon the noise and cries being Nymphidius as great, Nymphidish fuppofing (as fostet thought) that the Souldiers did call for him, or elle hoping betimes to quench this tumult, to flay such as were yet wavering : he went thirder himself with great ftore of Torch-light, an carried an Oration in his hand, the which Ciconius Verro had made for him, and the which he had learned without book to speak unto the Souldiers. But when he found the Gates of the Camp thut, and faw divers men armed upon the wals, he began to be afraid: and coming nearer, asked them what they meant by it, and by whose commandment they had armed themselves as they did. Answer was made him by them all, that they acknowledged no other Emperour but Galva: the which he feemed to like of , and also commanded them that followed him to do the like, and therewithall drew nearer. Whereupon certain of the Souldiers that warded at the Gate, did open him the Gate, and fuffered him to come in with a few men with him. Howbeit as foon as he was come in, first there was a Dart thrown at him, the which one Septimiss that went before him received upon his shield; and then others also came with their Swords drawn in their bands to fet upon him , and followed him as he fled into a Souldiers Cabine, where they flew him. Then they layed his body in an open place, and railed it about, that every man that would, might

the next day fee it. So My that being flain in this fort, Galba understanding of his death, com-manded that all Nypophadus triends and Confederatours that had not been slain at that time, should The cruely of for his fake be put to death, as indeed they were. Amongst them they slew Ciconius that had made Galba. the Oration for Nymphidius, and Mithridates also of PONT. Howbeit, though indeed they had deserved it, yet men thought it a very cruell part to command these men to be put to death in that fort, which were men of fuch quality and calling as they were, without due form and order of Law. For every man stood in good hope upon the coming in of this new Emperour, to have seen another manner of Government then they had yet feen : howbeit they were deceived of their hope at the first chop. But yet they misliked this most of all, when he commanded them to kill Petronius Tertullianus, that had been Confull, because he was Nero's faithfull friend. But now for the Cornelius Tadeath of Clodins Macer, whom Trebonianus flew in Africk by his commandment, and for cites calleth Pontius that was also flain in GERMANIE by Valens, he had some reason to fear them because him Turpiliathey were in arms, and commanded great Armies. But for Tertallianus, that was an old man, nut. naked and unarmed, truly he should have put him to his Triall by Law, if he would have ministred inflice, the which he promifed to keep at his first coming to the Imperiall Crown, Herein they greatly reproved Galba. Now when he drew near to ROME within five and twenty Furlongs, he was compassed about with a multitude of Mariners and Sea-faring men, that kept the high-way on every fide, wandering up and down in every place. These were the men whom Noro had gathered together into one Legion, and had taken them from the Oar, and made them Souldiers. So they were come thither to be Suiters to him , that he would allow them still to be Souldiers and they pressed so arrogantly upon him, that they would not suffer those which came to the new Emperour, to fee him nor speak with him, but they fell to tumult and uproar, crying out to have Enfigns for their Legion, and to be appointed a place to lie in, in Garrison. Galbo referred them over to another time, and bade them they should therefter him understand their demand. They told him again, that this delay was a kind of deniall, and thereupon fell to plain mutiny, and followed him with great cries: infomuch that fome of them fluck not to draw out their Swords. Then Galbe commanded the Horsemen he had about him , to set upon them. So there was not a man of them that refifted, but some of them were overthrown and troden under their Horse seet, and others alfo flain as they fled. This was a very evill fign and prelage for him, to enter into Rome with Galha entred fuch bloudshed, upon so many poor dead mens bodies as lay slain on the ground. Howbeit, where Rome with some before did despite and mock him for an old feeble man, every man then was afraid of him . and murther. quaked for fear. Furthermore because he would shew a great change and alteration from the unreasonable vain gifts and expences of Mero, it feemeth he did many uncomely things. As when one Canns Galla. an excellent Player on the Recorder, had plaied all supper-time, because it was marvellous sweet Musick to hear, he praised and commended it marvelloully, and commanded one to bring him his Casket, out of the which he took a few Crowns, and put them into his hand, faying; that it was not Money of the Common-Treasure, but of his own. Furthermore, he gave straight commandment that they should require and call back again the Gists Were had given and bestowed upon common Players, Minftrels, Wreftlers, and People of fuch kind of faculty and Profession, and to leave them onely the tenth part. But he got little by this device. For the most part of those that had Gifts given them, had spent and consumed it all, as men that lived without any rule or order, and Spent at night that which they got in the day: and besides, they were to hunt after them that had either taken or bought any thing of them, and to make them restore it again. But this was an endlefs work : for things had been to conveyed from man to man, that in the end it came to an infinite number of mens hands. But of all this, the shame and dishonour returned to Galba himself, though the malice and hatred lighted on Titus Junius: who onely made the Emperour straight-laced to all

But Tunius perceiving Galba to be old and feeble, would wifely take his fortune and time while time ferved, supposing it almost to be at an end so soon as he began to enter into it. So in the mean time he did much dishonour the poor old man, overgreatly abusing (under cloke of his Authority) the chiefest and weightiest matters, in reproving, or altogether hindering those, the which the Prince himself had a good desire to deal uprightly in, as to punish the Officers of N. 10. For he Gallak killeth put some of them to death, among the which Elins was one, and certain other, as Pely, livus, Pe- Nero's Serrims, and Patrobius: whereat the People marvelloully rejoyced, and cried out, as they went to vants and Ofexecution through the Market-place, that it was a goodly and bleffed praceifion and semined T ficets. execution through the Market-place, that it was a goodly and bleffed proceffion, and required Tigellinus of the gods and men, that had been chief Master and guide of all Nero's tyranny. Howbeit the trim man had gotten the vantage, and had largely fed Junius before: for afterwards he put poor Tertullianus to death, who had neither betrayed nor hated Nero, being as he was, and had never offended , nor was partaker of any of the wicked parts he played when he was alive. Whereashe that made Nero worthy of death, and that afterwards had also betrayed him, was let alone. and nothing faid unto him; being a manifest proof to all others, that they should not doubt to hope to obtain any thing at Titus Junius hands, so they fed him with Gifts. For the common People of Rome never defired any thing so much, as to see Tigellinus to be carried to execution :

and they never left crying out to demand him in all Affemblies of the beater or shew-place, until fuch time as the Emperour Galba did forbid them by proclamation, the which declared that Tigellims would not live long, because he was fick of a confumption of the Lungs, which by little and nus would not live long; occasion of alba prayed the People that they would not make his Empire tyranicall and bloudy. The People were much offended with this, but yet they feemed to laugh at it: and Tigellinus did facrifice to the gods for his health and fafety, and prepared a fumptuous Feafi. Where Jamins rifling from Supper, being fet by the Emperour, went unto Tigellinus to be merry with him, and took his Daughter, being a Widow, with him, unto whom Tigellinus drank, and offered her a Gift of five and twenty Myriades of Silver : and commanded one of his chiefeft Concubines to take from her neck a Carcanet the wore, being worth fitteen Myriades, and to give it the other. After he had handled the matter thus, those things that were done uprightly and with juflice, were reproved and taken in evill part: as the thing that was granted to the GAULS, because they did rebell with Vindex. For men thought that they were not discharged of the Subsidies and Taxes they were wont to pay, nor that they were made free of Rome, so much through the bounty and liberality of the Emperour, as it was by Junius means, of whom they had bought it. For these causes the People hated the Emperour Galba. Howbeit the Souldiers still lived in good hope. for the Gift that was promifed them at the beginning, thinking that though they had not as much as was promifed them, yet they should enjoy as much as Nero had given them. But Galba underflanding that they complained of him, spake a word meet for so noble and worthy a Prince as he was: that he used to choose Souldiers, not to buy them. This word being reported to the Souldiers, it bred a marvellous mortall batred in them against him : because they thought it was not onely to take the Gift away from them which they hoped prefently to have received, but that it was also president to teach the Emperours that should come after him, what they should do. Howbeit the rebelling minds of the Pratorian guard at Rome appeared not yet, but was fecretly kept in for the reverence they bare unto the Majethy and person of Galba, who kept themethat were definous to rebell, becaule they faw as yet no beginning of any change or alteration. This did fomewhat fmother and keep in the shew of their wicked intent. But they which had before served under Vargivins , and were at that time under Flaceus in GERMANIE , thinking themselves worthy of great reward for the Battell they had won against Vindex, and having nothing given them in recompence, they would not be pleafed with any thing their Captain faid unto them, neither did they make any account of Flacens, because he could not fir himself, he was so plagued with the Gout, and besides that, he had no manner of experience in Wars. So one day when certain Sports were made, at the bringing in of the which, the Colonels and Captains (according to the manner of the Ro-MANS) made prayers unto the gods for the health and prosperity of the Emperour Galba: there were divers of them that made a noise at the first, and afterwards when the Captains continued on their Prayers, in the end the Souldiers answered: If they be worthy. The Legions in like manner under Tigellinns charge, did offentimes ule such insolent parts : whereof Galba's Officers did advertile him by Letters. Wherefore Galba being afraid, and miftrufting that they did not onely despile him for his age, but also because he had no Children, he determined to adopt some young Gentle man for his Son, of the nobleft house of the City of ROME, and to proclaim him his Succession in the Empire. At that time there was one Marcus Otho, of a noble house, but ever given to safuality and pleasure from his cradle, as much as any ROMAN could be. And as Homer ofteniums doth call Paris the Husband of the fair Helen , naming him by the Name of his Wife, because he had no other commendable Vertue in him: even fo Otho came to be known in Roms, by marrying Poppea, whom Nero loved when the was Crifpinu his Wife: howbeit, bearing some respect to his Poppas, Oth's Wife, and being afraid also of his Mother, he had inticed Otho to be his band unto her. Nerolord Wife. Othodearly, and much delighted in his Company, because he was so good a sellow and free of his flesh: and was very glad sometime to hear how he mocked him, calling him Niggard. The report went, that as Nero on a time was anointing himself with precious Oyls and Perfumes, he calt a little upon Otho as he went by : who the next day made him a Feaft in his house, where suddainly were thrust into the Hall, divers Vessels of Gold and Silver full of this perfumed Oyl, tharran out of them like Conduit-water, and did wet all the Hall. So Otho having first possessed Poppas, and a bused her under hope of Nero's love, he perswaded her to be divorced from her Husband. The which the did, and he received her home to his own house, as his lawfull Wife: not being so well pleafed to have part, as he was forry and angry also to let another enjoy her. Now Poppas her self (as it is reported) did not missike this his jealousie, for sometimes she would shut her door against Nero, though Otho were not within: either because she would keep Nero in breath, and in love-liking ftill, or as some thought, because the would not have Cafar to her Husband; and likewise that the would not refuse him for her friend because he was wantonly given. But so it is, Otho was in danger of his life by marrying of Poppes : and fo was it also a strange thing , that Mero having put his Wife and Sifter to death, onely to marry Poppes, he did pardon Otho, and faved his life. Howbeit it was for Seneca'; take that was his friend, through whose perswasion he was sent to the surtheft part in SPAIN along the Ocean Sea, to be Governour of Lusttania. And there he governed fo wifely, that he was nothing chargeable nor troublesome unto the Countrey: knowing that this honourable charge was given him onely to mitigate and hide his banishment. Afterwards when Galba had rebelled, he was the first of all the Governours of the Provinces that joyned with him, and bringing with him all his plate, both Gold and Silver, unto the Mint-mafter, he gave it him to put into bullion, and fo to be converted into currant Coin. Moreover, he gave of his Officers unto Galba, those which he thought the meetest men to serve a prince; and otherwise when he was tried, he shewed himself as faithfull and skillfull in matters of State, as any one that followed the Emperours train. Infomuch as all the way he went many days journey in Coach, other credit as with Gaiba himself, and did marvellously curry savour with Titus Junius, bestowing great Gifts bout Galba. mon him. and also entertaining him with pleasant speeches; but specially, because he willingly gave him the upperhand, whereby he was affured to be the second person in credit about Galba. So in all that he did, he far excelled Junius, for that he granted mens fuits frankly and freely without one penny taking, and was besides easie to be spoken with of every man that had any suit to him: but specially of the Souldiers, whom he did greatly help and surther, and caused divers also to be called to honourable Office, he himfelf partly moving the Emperour for them, without any labour or full made unto him, and partly also obtaining them at Junion hands, and of the two enfranchised hondmen of Galba, Icellus, and Asiaticus. For these three men did bear all the sway and credit othe's practice about the Emperour in the Court. Moreover, always when he invited the Emperour to his house, aspiring to the he bribed the Prætorian Guard that waited upon him, and gave every Souldier a Crown. Now this Empire. in fight, feened chiefly to be done to honour the Emperour with : though indeed it was a fine device to overshrow him, to bribe the Souldiers in that fort as he did. So Galba confulting whom he should make his Successour, Tiens Junion preferred Othe unto him : the which he did not simply of himself, nor without reward, but onely with promise that Otho should marry his Daughter if Galba did adopt him his Son, and proclaim him fucceffour in the Empire. Howbeit, Galba did alway specially regard the Common-wealth before his private liking, and fought to adopt such a one. as should not so much please himself, as otherwise should be profitable and meet for the Empire. But furely in my opinion Galba would not make Otho Heir of his goods, confidering what an unreasonable spender he was, and how sumptuous in all his things, and besides, far gone in debt: for he ought above five thousand Myriades. So when he had heard Junius counsell about this adoption, he gently without other answer, did put over his determination until another time, and made Otho onely Confull at that time, and Titus Junius Confull with him : whereby it was straight suppofed, that at the beginning of the new year, he would proclaim him his Succeffour in the Empire. Which was the thing the Souldiers most defired of all other. But now, delaying still his determination, the Legions of the ROMANS in GERMANY, did rife and rebell against him all at an inflant. For he was generally hated of all his Souldiers, because he paid them not the Gift he had pro- in Germany mifed them. So they particularly to cloke their malicious intent, alledged for their cause of rising, that rebell against he had dishonourably rejected Verginim Rufus : and that the GAULS which had fought against Galba. them were rewarded with great and rich Priviledges, and they that took not part with Vindex had been grievously punished and put to death. Moreover, that Galba did onely honour Vindex death after he was dead, as acknowledging his good will unto him, offering publique Oblations and funerall Sacrifices for him, as by him onely he had been proclaimed Emperour. Now fuch speeches and rumours can through the Camp amongst them, when the first day of the year came, which the ROMANS call the Calends of January; on which day when Flacens had called the Souldiers together, to swear them to the Emperour according to the custom, they plucked down Galba's Images, and Iware onely in the Name of the People and Senate of ROME. The Captains feeing what course they took, were as much afraid of the danger to be without a head, as they stood doubtfull of the mischief of their rebellion. So there stept up one amongst them and said : "My fellows in arms, what do we mean? we neither chuse any other Emperour, nor yet The Souldiers "do allow of him that is Emperour at this present: whereby we shew plainly, that we do not onely do rebell a "refuse Galba, but also all other to be our head and Emperourthat may command us. Now for gainst Galba. "Flacens Ordeonism, that is but Galba's shadow and Image, I would wish we should let him alone "there as he is. And for Vitelliss, Governour of the lower GERMANY, he is not far from us. "but one days journey onely, whose Father was Censor at ROME, and thrice also Consult, and "that was in a manner a Peere and Companion of Cledine Cafar in the Government of the Empire : "whose poverty if any man mislike in him, is a manifest proof of his goodness and magnanimity, "Him therefore let us chuse, and let the world know that we can tell how to chuse an Emperour bet-"ter then the SPANIARDS OF LUSITANIANS. Some of the Souldiers that flood by, confirmed thele words, but others milliked of them: infomuch that amongst the rest there was an Ensignbearer that stole secretly out of the Camp to carry Vitellins news hereof, who that night made a great supper, and had great store of good company with him. These news running straight through his Camp, Fabius Valens Colonell of a Legion, came the next morning with a great number of Horsemen, and was the first man that named Visellius Emperour, who before seemed to resule that Name, as one that was afraid to take the charge of fo great an Empire upon him: but after dinner, being full of Wine and Meat, he came out among them, and accepted the Name of vitellius ac-Germanics which they gave him, and refused the Name of Ca/ar. But therewithall incontinently cepted the after, Flacens Souldiers leaving their goodly popular Oath which they had fworn in the Name of Name of Gerthe People and Senate, they all then took their Oaths faithfully to do what it should please the manicus but Emperour Vitellim to command them. Thus Vitellim was chosen Emperour in GERMANY. So Vitellimsnamed Galba hearing of this new change, thought it not good to defer time longer for the adoption he had Emperour by intended : wherefore certainly understanding that those whom he trusted most about him, were par- the Souldiers, ties in this matter, Some taking part with Colabella, and the most part of them with Ocho, neither liking the one nor the other, fuddainly without any word spoken to any man, he sent for Pilo (that Galba adopted was the younger Son of Craffin and Pifo, whom Nero had put to death) a young man fair conditioned, and shewed by his grave and modest countenance he had by vertue, that he was endued with many noble vertues. Galba came down prefently from his Pallace, and went straight to the Camp to proclaim Pifo, Cafar, and his Successor in the Empire Howbeit at his setting out of his Pallace, there appeared many great figns in the Firmament which followed him. And moreover when he was also come into his Camp, and that he began to say without book part of his Oration, and parrly also to read it, it lightned all the while he spake, and there sell such a great shower of rain upon it, and a marvellous thick Mist in the Camp, and over all the City, that men might easily see the gods did not like this adoption, and that it would not prosper. The Souldiers themselves shewed their discontentment by their heavy looks, and the rather, because at that time there was no speech of reward or liberality. And furthermore, they that were present also marvelled much (for that they could gather by the countenance and words of Pifo) that Pifo nothing rejoyced at this great favour, although he lacked not wit and understanding otherwise to acknowledge it. And on the other fide allo, they found eafily by Otho's looks, many figus and proofs that he was marvelloully offended in his mind, to fee that he was thus deceived of his hope. For he being the man that was first spoken of, and thought most worthy of all other, and being come also so near unto it, now to see himself thus whipped out of it, he supposed that it was a plain proof that Galba had no good opinion of him, and that he maliced him in his heart, fo that after that time he still stood in sear of his life. For he being afraid of Pife, hating also Galba, and being grievously offended with Time Junius, he went his way full of divers thoughts in his mind. But the Soothfayers, Aftronomers, and Chaldeans, which he ever kept about him, did perfuade him not to be discouraged for this, nor to cast all hope aside: and specially one Ptolomy, in whom he had great confidence, because he had oftentimes before fore-told and affured him, that Nere Prolomy's Pre- should not put him to death, but contrarily, that Nero should die first, and he himself survive him, this source of Rome. Whereby Prolomy having proved his first Prediction debt specific source. true unto him, he bade him be bold, and fear not that to come. But now besides him, those that fecretly complained unto him, did prick him forward the more, fighing to fee him so evil dealt with by Galba, and divers of them chiefly, which bare great authority and credit about Tigellinus and Nymphidius: who being then caft off, and discountenanced, came all unto him, and stirred him up the more. As amongst others, Vetwins and Barbins chiefly, of the which the one had been Opio, and the other Tesserania, why to and the other Tesserania; (for so the ROMANS call those that be their Messengers, Spials, and tendence of the ROMANS call those that be their Messengers, Spials, and the other Tesserania, why to another the tesserania, and the other tesserania, and the tesserania tesserania. Officers to the Captains) who with an enfranchifed bondman of his called Onomaftus, went unto the Camp, and there corrupted fome Souldiers with ready Money, and other fome with fair words, called by the Onbobibed the being of themselves evil inclined, and expected but occasion to utter their malice. For otherwise had the Souldiers been all of one mind, it had not been an enterprise to have been brought to pass in four days space (being no more betwint the adoption and murther) to make a whole Camp rebell in that fort. For they were flain the fifteenth day of January, on which day Galba did facifice in the morning within his Pallace, before his friends. But at that time the Soothfayer called Ombricial, when he had the Intrails of the Beafts facrificed in his hands, and had looked upon them, he spake not doubtfully but plainly, that he faw figns of great tumult and rebellion, and that the Emperour touching the treation prefers danger of great treation. Whereby it plainly appeared, that the gods had put Galba into Otho's hands: for he frood at that time behind Galba, and both heard and faw all that the

Soothfayers did. So he feeming to be grieved withall in his mind, and his colour changing of for the fear he was in , his enfranchiled bondman Onomastus came and told him, that the Masons and chief Carpenters were come to speak with him, and tarried for him. This was the watch-word agreed upon between them, at which time Otho (hould then go unto the Souldiers. Then Otto faid, that he went to look to an old house he had bought, which was falling down, and in decay, and that he should shew it unto the workmen. So he went his way, and came from the Pallace, by the place they call Tiberius house, into the Market-place, where the golden Pillar standeth, where also the greatest high-ways of all ITALY do meet together. There certain met him that first called him Emperour, which were not in all above threeand twenty Perfons. Thereupon, though Osto was not unconstant, as it appeared (notwithstanding he was so fine and esseminate a man) but rather resolute and ftour in instant danger: yet sear so oppressed him at that time, that he would faine have left his enterprife. Howbeit the Souldiers would not fuffer him, but compaffing his Littr Othe received round about with their Arms, and their Swords drawn in their hands, they commanded the Litter of the Przio-tian Soulders. men to go forward. So Otho as he went haftening on his drivers, he often muttered to himfelf, I an but dead. Some hearing him as they passed by him, rather wondered, then that they were otherwise troubled, to fee such a small number of men about him, that they durst venture upon so hard an enterprise. Now as he was carried through the Market-place, he was met withall by certain others, and alterwards by others, by three and by four in a company : all which came and joyned with him, and cried Cafar, Cafar, having their Swords drawn in their hands. Now the Colonell appointed for that day to guard the Field of Mars, knew nothing of this conspiracy, but being amazed and afraid with their fuddain coming, he fuffered them to come in. So when Otho was come in, he found no man that relifted him. For they that knew nothing of the practife, being compassed in with those that were made privy to it, and had known it of long time, being found straggling here and there, by one and by two, they followed the reft for fear at the first, and afterwards for good will. This was brought straight to Galba to the Pallace, the Soothsaver being yet busie about this Sacrifice: insomuch that they which before gave no credit to those Divinations began then to marvell much at this heavenly fign. Then there ran immediately a great number of People from the Market-place, unto the Pallace. Thereupon Jumius and Lacon, and certain other of Galba's enfranchised bondmen, stood to Guard Galba's person with their Swords drawn in their hands. Pife also went out to speak unto the Souldiers that guarded the Emperours perion. Moreover, because the ILLIRIAN Legion lay out of the Camp in a place called Vipfanus, they dispatched away Marins Celfus with all speed, a very honest man , to get that place. Galba in the meantime flood in doubt whether he should come out of the Pallace or not : for Junius would not let himgo, but Celfus and Lacon perswaded him to go out: insomuch as they fell at great words with A shamefull Justian that went about to diffwade him from it. In this stir there ran a rumour that Otho was die of flun in the Field. Immediatly after came Julius Atticius, one of the nobleft men of all the imperours guard, and shewed his Sword drawn, crying that he had slain Calars Enemy : and thrust through the press, and got to Galba, and shewed him his Sword bloudied. Galba looking him in the face, asked him who commanded him to do it. The Souldier answered him: the Faith and Oath he had made unto him : therewithall the People that flood by cried out, it was nobly done of him, and clapped their hands for joy. Then Galba taking his Litter, went out of his Pallace to do Sacrifice to Jupiter, and also to shew himself openly. Howbeit he was no sooner come into the Market-place, but he heard contrary news, that Otho was Lord and Mafter of the whole Camp Tumult for and Army. Then as it happeneth in fo great a press of People, some cried out to him to return Galba. back again, others would have him to go forward: others bade him be afraid of nothing, and others willed him to look to himself. So his Litter being thus turmoiled to and fro, as toft upon the Sea, sometime born back, other-while carried forward, first of all they saw certain Horsemen, and then Footmen also armed, coming from Panles Pallace, all of them together crying out with loud voice, Hence, hence, private man. Then all the People fet upon a running, not flying dispersedly, but in heaps, upon Porches and Stals in the Market-place, as it had been to have feen some fight or sport. Then one called Actilius * Sarcello, overthrew one of the Images of Galba, which was * Tacinus doth as it were a beginning of open Wars. Others round about threw Darts on every fide of him a- call him Virgainst his Litter. But when they saw they could not kill him, then they came nearer to his Litter gilio. with their Swords drawn in their hands, and never a man of his left with him to offer to defend him, faving one man onely, whom the Sun faw that day, amongst so many thousands of men, worthy of the Empire of Rome : and he was called * Sempronius. He having received privately no man- * Cornelius Taner of pleasure at Galba's hand, but onely to discharge his Oath and duty stepped before the Litter, citus doth call him Densus. and lifting up a Vine Branch he had in his hand (with the which the ROMAN Captains do tife to beat their Souldiers that have offended) he fell out with them that did fet upon him, and prayed them to hold their hands, and not to hurt their Emperour. But in the end when he saw they would The valiantnot leave, but that they fell to it in good earnest, he then drew his Sword, and bare off the blows lity of semas well as he could, untill they hought him, that he fell to the ground. Then Galba's Litter being pronise in difoverthrown right in the place called Curtim Lake, Galba lay on the ground armed in his Curaces, charge of his The traiterous Souldiers flew upon him, and gave him many a wound : and Galba holding out his Oath to the neck unto them, bade them strike hardily, if it were to do their Countrey good. So he had many Emperour wounds on his Arms and his thighs, as it is reported: howbeit the Souldier that flew him was called Camurius, of the fifteenth Legion. Others do report that it was one Terentius, other also say Sempronius, Arcadius: and some other do call him Fabius Pabulus: who having stricken off his head, wrapped The death of it in the lap of his Gown, because he could not otherwise take hold of it, for that he was all hald. Galba: and his Howbeit his fellows and Conforts would not fuffer him to hide it, but rather that his notable fact he words at his had done should be seen. Therefore he set it upon the point of his Lance, and so shaking the sace of death, this poor old man, (a wife and temperate Prince, and chief Bifhop, and Confull) he ran up and down (like mad Women possessed with the spirit and sury of Bacchus at the Feasts of Bacchus) bowing down his Launce being all of a gore bloud. When his head was brought to Otho, it is faid he cried out aloud: Tufh, my fellows, this is nothing, unless you bring me also Pifo's head. So not long after, they brought him his head also. For the young man being hurt, sled, and was followed by one called *Marcus, who slew him hard by the Temple of Vesta. So did they also kill Titus Innius: who *Others do openly confessed that he was one of the conspiracy against Galba, and cried out to them that slew him, read Murcus. that Otho did not know that they did kill him. This notwithftanding, the Souldiers strake off his head The murther and Lacons also, and brought them both to Otho to receive the reward. Howbeit, as the Poet Ar- of Pife, and chilochus faith :

> Of leven peradventure flain dead on the ground, A thousand will say, that they all gave the wound.

So there was divers men at that time, who being no partakers of this murther, had bloudied all their hands and Swords, and so shewed them bloudied to have reward also: but Vitellus notwithflanding made enquiry of them afterwards, and caused them to be put to death. There came into the Field also, one Marius Celsus, whom divers men accused to have persuaded the Souldiers to aid Galba, and the common People cried out, and bade he should be put to death. Howbeit Other would not fuffer them to kill him: and yet being afraid to contrary the Souldiers minds, he told them they should not kill him so rashly, because he was first to learn some things more of him.

Alterwards the Senate was prefently affembled: who as if men had been fuddamly hanged from terwards the Senate was pretently another med gods, they all fware by the Name of Othe, (the them they were, or as if there had been new gods, they all fware by the Name of Othe, (the which Oath he himself had before fworn unto Galba, and did not keep it) and called him befides, Augustus and Cafar; the bodies of them that were flain lying yet headles on the ground penges, Augustu and Calar ; in Confuls Robes. And as for their heads, the Souldiers ther they in the Market-place, an in their commiss rootes. Join as for men means, and committees there they could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with them the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what to do with the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what the head of Titum Junium unto his Dughter, could tell no more what the head of Titum fold at Rome intreaty begged it of one Veranius. On the other fide, for Galba's head, they gave it unto Intri-bius and Virtulius Servants: who, after they had used it as vilely as they should devise, they throw it at length in a place where their bodies are cast, whom the Cafers put to death, the which they call Sesternum. Now for his Body Helvidim Prifem, through Otho's sufferance, carried it away, 2d Argim, one of his enfranchied bond men, buried it by night. Thus have you heard the Hifter of Galba, a man that in nobility and wealth was inferiour to few ROMANS, and in them both was the chiefest man of all his time, and had alway lived in honourable fame and estimation, in the Reign of five Emperours. So that he overcame Are by his good Name , and the good opinion men had of him, and not through his own force and power. For of them that strove to make themselves Emperours at that time, fome found no man that thought them worthy of it; others did put forth themselves, as thinking themselves worthy of it. Howbeit Galba was called unto it, and obeyed them that called him, using his Name against Vindex boldness: whereby he procured, that his rifing (which before was called innovation and rebellion) was then called civil War, after that his faction came to have a man to be their head, thought worthy to be their Emperour. And therefore he did not so much desire to be Emperour for himself, as to do good to his Countrey and Common-wealth. But yet he erred, in feeking to command the Souldiers, whom Tigellinus and Nymphidius had spoiled by their flatteries: even as in old time Scipio , Fabricius , and Camillus did command the Souldiers of the Empire of ROME at that time. So he being now a very old man, fhewed himself a good Emperour and after the old fort, in his behaviour towards the Souldiers onely: but in all other things elle, being carried away with the coverounnels of Tirns Innin and Laco, and of other his enfranchiled bondmen, he left none defireus to be governed by him, but many that were forry for his death.

Ann. Mund. 4020.

Poft. Christ.

He next morning, the new Emperor by break of day went unto the Capitol, and Othe's moderafacrificed, and there fent for Marius Celsus to come unto him, whom he courtion at the beteoufly faluted, and prayed him rather to forget the caufe of his imprisonment, ginning of his then to remember his delivery. Marius Celfus made him a wife and noble an-reign. fwer again, and faid, that the matter for the which they would have accused him unto him, did witness his behaviour, shewing himself faithfull unto Galba, who never did him any pleasure. These words of them both did marvellously please the People: and fo did they like the fouldiers also wonderfully well. Moreover, after he had very favourably and graciously taken order for matters in the Senate, the rest of the time he had to be Confull, he employed partly about Verginius Rufus; and did also establish them Confulls in their place and degree, which had been called unto that dignity by Nero, or otherwise by Galba: and he also honoured the oldest Senators and of greatest estimation, with certain Priesthoods. Besides all this, he reftored unto all those Senators that were banished by Nero and called home again, all their goods yet unfold. Whereupon the chiefest Magistrates and Noblemen of the City that quaked before for fear, supposing that he was not a man, but rather a devil or sury of hell that was come to be Emperor, they all became glad men, for the good hope of this smiling and gracious reign they were so lately entred into. Moreover, nothing pleased all the ROMANS together more, nor wan him the good will of all men so much, as that he did unto Tigellinus: for it was punishment enough for him, if he had no more but the fear of the punishment every man threatned him withall, as a thing due to the Commonwealth, and also by reason of the incurable diseases his body was infected withall. Now, though the Noblemen thought his unreasonable insolency and lust of the flesh (following naughty-packs and common Strumpets, burning still in filthy concupiscence) an extream punishment, comparable to many deaths; and being also no better then a dead man in a manner, still following pleasure and sensuality as long as he could: this notwithstanding, all men were offended with him, that they should see such a wicked creature as he live, that had put so many Noblemen to death. So Otho sent for him, who lived very pleasantly at his houses in the Countrey, by the City of SINUESSA, and had ships ever ready upon the Sea Coast, to fly if necessity drave him to it. Thereupon he first fought to bribe him with money which was fent with Commission to apprehend him, and perswaded him to let him escape: but when he saw he could not frame him to his mind, yet he refrained not to give him gifts, and prayed him to give him leave to shave his beard. The other granted him. Then Tigellinus took a razor, and did cur his own throat. So Otho having pleafed the people thus well , he fought not otherwise to be Tigelliau kill- revenged of his private injuries. Moreover, to curry favour with the common people, he refufed not to be called N_fro, in any open Affemblies at the Theatres. Also when certain private men had fet up Nero's images in open fight, Otho was not offended withall: but moreover, Clodim Rufus writeth, that the letters Patents and Commissions were sent into Spain by Posts, Other the be. Subscribing the goodly name of Nero, with the name of Other. Howbeit: when it came to his cars ginning of his that the Noblemen of Rome mishiked of it, he left it off, and would write it no more in his let-reign took up ters. So Otho having begun in this fort to establish his Empire, the fouldiers marwellously on him the troubled him. For they continually perfwaded him to take heed to himfelf, and to beware how Noblemen and Gentlemen came near unto him: which they did, either for that indeed they bearing him good will, were afraid fome treachery or treason should be secretly practiced against him; or else it was some reigned device to set all together by the ears, and to bring it to Civil War. For when Otho himself had sent Crippinus with his seventeenth Legion to bring him certain prisoners, and that Crifpinus was ready before day, going to perform the effect of his Commission, having loden Carts with Armour and Weapon for the Souldiers: the desperatest and boldest men a-Tumult against mong them, began to cry out, and said, that Crissinus meant no good in his heart, and that the Przorian the Senate went about to make some change and strr, and that his Armour and Weapons were not for Cefar but against him. These words moved many mens consciences, and made them to rebell: fo that fome laid hold upon the Carts to flay them, others flew two Centurions out of hand, and Crifpinus himself also, that would have stayed them. Thereupon all of them together, one encouraging another, went directly to ROME, as meaning to aid the Emperor. But when they came thither, understanding that there were fourfcore Senators at Supper with the Emperor, they ran straight to the Pallace, crying out, that it was a good occasion offered them to kill all Cefar's Enemies at a clap. Hereupon all Rome was straight in Arms, looking immediately after to be facked and spoiled of all that ever they had : and the people ran up and down the Pallace, here and there, Otho himself also being in great fear and diffres. For men might easily fee he was afraid, because of his guests he had bidden, not for himself, seeing them all amazed with the matter, for fear not speaking a word unto him, but staring on him still, and specially those that came and brought their Wives with them to Supper. So Otho suddenly sent the Captains unto the fouldiers, and commanded them to speak with them, and to pacific them as well as they could: and therewithall he made them take away the board, and conveyed his guests out of his Pallace by secret Posterns. So they saved themselves, passing through the souldiers, a little before they entred into the Hall where the feast was kept, crying out, and asking, what was become of Cefar's Enemies. So the Emperour rifing from his bed, he pacified them with gentle words, the tears standing in his eyes, and thereby at length he fent them all away. Otho's liberall- The next morning he liberally bestowed upon every souldier a thousand two hundred and fity ty to the foul Drachma's and then he went into the Market-place, and there gave great commendation under the common people for their ready good wills they shewed unto him; howbeit, he said there to the common people for their ready good wills they shewed unto him : howbeit, he said there were some among them, that under colour and pretext of honesty, did commit many leud paris, and made his goodness and grace towards them to be evil spoken of, and their constancy and faith also to be disliked of , and prayed them his grief might be theirs , and that the offenders might be punished. They all confirmed his words, and bad him aloud he should do it. So 0the thereupon caused two of them onely to be apprehended, supposing no man would be greatly offended with the punishment of them , and then went his way. Those that loved and trufted him, marvelled much to fee this change. Other were of opinion, that it ftood him upon so to do, to win the Souldiers hearts, because of the War at hand. Now news came Vitellius rebel- flying to him out of all parts, that Vitellius had taken upon him the authority to be Emperor, and posts came to him one in anothers neck, to tell him that numbers of people came in daily to submit themselves unto Vitelliss. Others told him also, how the Legions remaining in PANNONIA, DALMATIA, and Mysia, had chofen Otho. Immediately after, friendly letters were brought him also from Mutianus and Velpasianus, the one of them being in Syria, and the other in Jud. A., with great and mighty Armies. Whereupon Otho giving credit unto them, wrote unto Vitellius, and bad him beware how he medled with any deeper enterprize then became a private Souldier: and that he would give him gold and filver enough, and a great City, where he might live quietly, and take his pleasure. Fitelling gently answered him at the first, and sported with him : but alterwards the falling out one with another, spitefull letters were sent betwirt either parties, one rence between of them reproaching another, nor fallly, but fondly, and foolifhly detecting each others vices. For indeed it was hard to judge, which of them two was most licentiously given, most effeminate, leaft skilfull, poorer, or most indebted before. Now at that time they talked of wonderfull figns that Wonders feen had been feen: howbeit they were but flying tales, and there was no man to justifie them. But in the Capitol there was the image of Vittory fet up in a triumphing Chariot, the which every body The wonderful faw did let flack the reins of the bridles of the Horfes which she had in her hands, as though she could not ftay them any more. The ftatue of Caim Cafar also within the Island, which standeth in the midft of the River of Tyber at ROME, without any Earthquake or storme of wind, though of it felf from the West to the East: the which (as it is reported) chanced about the time that Volpassan began to take upon him to be Emperor. Many also took the overflowing of the River of Tyber for an ill sign. For indeed it was at that time of the year when Rivers do swell most, yet infomuch that they fuffered famine many days after in ROME. In all this ftir news came that Cecinna and Valens (two of Vitellina Captains) had taken the mountains of the Alpes: and moreover in ROME. Dolabella a noble man, was suspected by the Prætorian souldiers, that he practised fome treason. Now Otho, either because he was afraid of him, or of some other, he fent him to the City of AQUINUM, promiting him he should have no other hurt. Then chusing the choicest Gentlemen which he would take with him, among others he took Lucius, the brother of Vitellim and did not deprive him of any jot of his honour and dignity. Moreover, he was very carefull to fee his Wife and Mother fafe, that they should not be afraid of themselves. Besides all this he appointed Flavius Sabinus, Vespasians brother, Governour of Rome in his absence; and did it for Nero's fake, who had before given him the fame honour and authority, the which Galba had taken from him; or elfe to make Velpalian fee, that he loved and truffed him. So he tarried behind at BRESSELLES, a City standing upon the River of Po: and fent his Army before under the conduct of Marius Celsus, of Suctionius Paulinus, and of Gallus and Spurina, all noble and great personages: howbeit they could not have their wills to rule the Army as they would, because The frowardof the infolency and stubbornness of the souldiers, who would have no other Captains but the ness of Otho Emperour onely, faying, that he and none other should command them. Indeed, the enemies and Vitellius fouldiers also were not much wifer, nor more obedient to their Captains, but were brave and lufty upon the felf fame occasion: howbeit they had this advantage over the other, that they could tell how to fight, and were all well trained in the Wars, and could away with pains and hardness, and never shrunk from it : whereas the Prætorian fouldiers that came from Rome, were fine meal-mouthed men, because they had been long from the Wars, and had lived at ease in ROME, and taken their pleasure in banqueting and plays: and therefore in a bravery and jollity, they would needs have men think, that they distained to do what their Captains commanded them, as men that were too good to do it, and not that they were fine fingered, and loth to take pains. So that, when Spuring would have compelled them, he was in danger of death, and efcaped very narrowly that they flew him not. For they stuck not to revile him, and give him as foul words as they could, calling him Traitor, and curfing him, faying, that he marred all Cafar's affairs. Yea, and there were some of them, that having their full cups, went in the night to his Tent, to ask him leave to depart, faying that they would go to the Emperor, and complain to him of him. But the flout they had given them by their Enemies about that time, hard by the City of PLACENTIA, did stand Spurina and his affairs to great purpose. For Vitellius foul- Placentia, the diers coming hard to the walls of the City, did mock Othe's men that were at the crannies of the fame, and called them fine dancers and goodly Stage-players, that had feen nothing but plays and feafls: and that for feats of Arms, and battles, they knew not what it meant: and that the greatest act they ever did, was that they strake off the head of a poor naked old man, meaning Galla is and that to come to fish? a battle in the field before more than the strain of the strain Galba: and that to come to fight a battle in the field before men, their hearts were in their heels. These vile words galled them to the heart, and made them so mad withall, that they came of themselves to pray Spurina to command them what he thought good, promising that from thenceforth they would never refuse any pains or danger he would put them to. Thereupon there was a hot affault given to the City of PLACENTIA, with great store of fundry Engines. Howbeit Spurina's men had the better, and having with great flaughter repulled the affailants, they faved one of the goodlieft, the greateft, and most flourishing Cities of all ITALY. So Otho's The praise of Captains were far more familiar, courteous, and civil to deal with Cities and private men, than otho's Cap-Vitellius fouldiers were. For, of Vitellius Captains, Gecinna was neither for person nor manners toins, and difaccompaniable for the people, but strange, monstrous, and troublesom, to see him onely a mighty praise of Vistmade man, wearing Gally Gascoignes, and Coats with sleeves, after the sashion of the GALLS, and spake in this attire unto the Ensign-bearers and Captains of the ROMANS. Furthermore,

with his choice men of Arms, and did not follow them over rashly, but compassed in the place where the Ambush lay, the which he raifed, and in the mean time tent to his Camp with all possible speed to his footmen to make hast thitherward : and it seemeth, that if they had come in time they had not left one of their Enemies alive, but had marched upon the bellies of all Cecima's Army, if they had followed the horfemen in time, as they should have done. But Paulinus being come too late to aid them, for that he came fo flowly, he was burdened that he did not the duty of a Captain that bare the name and countenance he carried. Furthermore, the common fouldiers accused him of treason unto Otho, and stirred up their Emperor against him, and spake very big words of themselves, faying, that they had overcome for their own parts, had not the cowardlines of their own Captains been, who put them by the victory. So Otho did not trust him so much, that he would not make him believe but that he miltrusted somewhat. Therefore he sent his brother Titianus to the Camp, and Proclus with him, Captain of the Przetorian Guard, who indeed commanded all; but in fight, Tisianus had all the honour, as bearing the name of the Emperors Lieutenant. Marius Celfus and Paulinus followed after, bearing the name of Counfellers and friends onely: howbeit otherwise they medled with nothing, neither had any authority given them. On the other fide, the Enemies were in as much trouble as they, and those specially whom Valens led. For when news was brought of the conflict that was between them in this Ambush, they were angry with him, because they were not at it, and for that he had not led them thither, to help their men that were flain: infomuch that they had much ado to pacific and quiet them, they were fo ready to have flown upon him. So Valens at length removed his Camp, and went and joyned with Cecinna. Howbeit Otho being come to his Camp at the Town of Bebriacum, which is a little Town hard by CREMONA, he consulted with his Captains whether he should give Battle or not. So Proclus and Titianus gave him counsell to mont. fight, confidering that the fouldiers were very willing to it, by reason of the late victory they obb's conful-had won, and wiffled him not to defer it: for thereby he should but discourage his Army, which was now willing to fight, and also give their Enemies leifure to flay for their Chiefiain Vitellius, who came himfelf out of Gaul. But Paulinus in contrary manner alledged, that the Enemies had all their force and power present, with the which they thought to fight with them, and also to overcome them, and that they wanted nothing: whereas Otho looked for another Army out of Mysia and Pannonia, as great an Army as his Enemies had already, fo that he could tarry his time, and not ferve his Enemies turn; and alfo, that if the fouldiers being now but a few in number were willing to fight, they should then be much more encouraged, when they should have greater company, and should also fight with better fafety. Furthermore be periwaded them, that to delay time was for their avail, confidering that they had plenty and ftore of all manner of provision: where the Enemies on the other fide, being allo in their Enemies Countrey, their victuals would quickly fail them. Marins Celfus liked very well of the persuasions; and so did Annius Gallus, who was not present at this Council (but gone from the Camp, to be cured of a fall he had from his horse) but he was written to by Otho to have his opinion alfo. So Annius Gallus returned answer, that he thought it not best to make half, but to thay for the Army that came out of Mys1a, confidering they were onwards on their way. However, the which were alledged divers occasions. But the chiefest and likeliest cause of all was, that the fouldiers which are called the Pratorian (being the daily guard about the Emperous perfon) finding then in effect what it was to profes to be a fouldier, and to live like a fouldier, they lamented their continuing in ROME, where they lived at eafe and pleasure, feasting and banquering, never feeling the discommodities and bitter pains of War: and did therefore to earneftly cry pleasant life at out to fight, that there was no flaying of them, as if they should at their first cry and sening for Rame, notifed ward, have overthrown their Ememies. Moreover, it fremed also that Otho himself could no more away with the fear and doubt of the uncertain fuccess to come, neither could any longer abide the grievous thoughts of the danger of his effate, he was so effeminate, and unacquainted with forrow and pains. This was the cause that carried him on headlong, as a man that shutteh his eyes falling from a high place, and so to put all at adventure. The matter is thus reported by Secandas the Orator, and Otho's Secretary. Others also do report, that both Armies had divers de-Orator, Secreterminations and minds: as to joyn all together in one Camp, and joyntly to chufe among them, tary unto 0160 if they could agree, the worthieft man of all the Captains that were there: if not, then to affemble Gaussian. the Emperor. ble the whole Senate in a place together, and there to fuffer the Senators to chiffe fuch a one Emperor, as they liked best of. And fure it was very likely it was so, considering that neither of them both which were then called Emperors, was thought meet for the place they had : and therefore that there countells and confiderations might easily fall into the ROMAN fouldiers heads (who were wife men and expert fouldiers) that indeed it was a thing for them justly to milike, to bring them felves into the like miferable time and calimity, which their predecessors before them had caused one another to foffer: firft for Sylla and Marias fakes, and afterwards for Cafar and Pompey; and now to beltow the Empire of Rome either upon Fitelling, to make him the abler to follow his drunkenness and gluttony: or else upon Othe, to maintain his wanton and licentious life. This was the cause that moved Cessas to delay time, hoping to end the Wars without trouble and danger: and that cauled Otho to make the more halt, being afraid of the lattie. Howbeit Otho returning back again into BRESSELLES; he committed thorter fault, not onely because he took his mens good-wills from them to fight, the which his presence, and the reverence they bare unto him did put in them : but because also he carried away with him for the Guard of his person, the valiant- The Town of eft fouldiers and most resolute men of all his host. About that time there chanced a skirmish to fall Bresselies is out by the River of Po, because Cecinna built a bridge over it, and Otho's men did what they could hard by the to hinder them. Howbeit when they faw they prevailed not, they laded certain Barges with Faggots River of Po. and dry wood, and rubbed them over with briniftone and pitch, and fetting them on fire, they fent them down the stream. When the Barges were in the midst of the stream, there suddenly arose a wind our of the River, which blew upon this Wood-stack they had prepared to cast among the Enemies works of this Bridge, that first made it smoak, and immediately after fell on a flame; which did fo trouble the men in their Barges, that they were driven to leap into the River to fave themselves: and for they loft their Barges, and became themselves also prisoners to their Enemies, to their great shaine and mockery. Furthermore, the Germans under Vitellium, fighting with Otho's Fencers, which of them fhould win a little Island in the midst of the River, they had the upper hand and flew many of the Pencers. Thereupon Otho's fouldiers which were in BEBRIACUM, being in a rage withall, and would needs fight, Proclus brought them into the field, and went and Camped about fifty furlongs out of the City; fo fondly, and to fo little purpole, that being the spring of the year. and all the Countrey thereabout full of brooks and rivers, yet they notwithftanding lacked water. The fext morning they raifed their Camp to meet with their Enemies the fame day, and were driven to march above an hundred furlongs. Now Paulinus perswaded them to go fair and softly, and not to make more half then needed; and would not fo foon as they should come (being wearied with their journey and travell) fet upon their Enemies that were well armed, and befides had leifore and time enough to fet their men in battle ray, whilft they were coming fo long a journey with all their carriage. Now the Captains being of divers opinions about this matter, there came a horfeman from Otho, one of those they call the Nomades, that brought them letters, in the which Otho commanded them to make all the haft they could, and to lofe no time, but to march with all fpeed toward the Enemy. So when the letters were read, the Captains presently marched forward with their Army. Cecinna understanding of their coming, was astonied at the first, and fiddenly forfook the work of his bridge to return to his Camp, where he found the most part of his fouldiers ready armed, and Valens had given them their fignal and word of battle. And in the mean time, whilft the Legions were taking their places to fer themselves in battle ray, they fent out before, the choice horsemen they had, to skirmish. Now there ran a rumour (no man knew how, nor upon what cause) that Vitellius Captains would turn on Otho's fide in battle, infomuch that when these men of Arms came near to meet with the vaward of Otho's Army, Otho's men did speak very gently to them, and called them companions. Vitellius men on the other fide took this falutation in evil part, and answered them again in a rage, as men that were willing to fight: Infomuch that those which had spoken to them, were quite discouraged : and the relidue also began to suspect their companions which had spoken to them, and mistruffed them to be traitors. And this was the chiefest cause of all their disorder, being ready to joyn battle. Furthermore, on the Enemies fide also, all was out of order; for the beafts of carriage ran in amongst them that fought, and so did put them marvellously out of order. Besides that also, the disadvantage of the place where they fought, did compell them to disperse one from another, because of fundry ditches and trenches that were between them, whereby they were compelled to fight in divers companies together. So there were but two Legions onely, the one of Vitellius, Battlebetwire called the Devourer: and the other of Otho, called the Helper: which getting out of these holes the Othorium and ditches apart by themselves, in a good plain even ground, fought it out so a long time together in and Vitellians. good order of battle. Otho's fouldiers were men of goodly perfonages, ftrong and valiant of Legions called their hands, howbeit they had never ferved in the Wars, nor had ever foughten battle but that, by pretty And Vitellius men on the other fide, were old beaten fouldiers, and had ferved all their youth, and ret, Helper. knew what wars and battles meant. But of their Captains, neither perswading Proflus nor Paulinius durst return back with them, but fled another way, being afraid of the fury of Vitellius. the fouldiers, that they would lay all the fault of their overthrow upon their Captains. Howbeit

Annium Gallum received them into the City of BEBRIACUM, that came together after this overthrow; and told them that the battle was equal betwist them, and that in many places they had the better of their Enemies. But Marin Celfus gathering the Noble men and Gentlemen together that had charge in the Army, he fell to confultation what they should do in fo great a calamity, and extream flaughter of the ROMAN Citizens. For if Otho himself were an honell man, he should no more attempt Fortune : considering that Cato and Scipio were both nert man, we mount no more than they were the cause of casting away of many men in Africk to no purpole (though they fought for the liberty of the ROMANS) and onely of felf-will, for that they would not yield to Julius Cefar after he had won the Battle of PHARSALIA. For though Fortune in all other things have power over men : yet extremities happening to good men, the cannot prevent them to determine the best for their fafety. These perswations straight carried away the Captains', who were prefendly to feel the minds of the private Souldiers, whom they found all of them defirous of peace. So Titianus perswaded them to fend Ambassa-Uthe's Captains do yield dors unto them to Treat of peace; and Gelfus and Gallus took upon them the charge to go themselves un- thither, to break the matter unto Cecima and Valens. But by the way they met with certain Centurions, who told them how all the Army of the Enemies were coming onwards on their way, to come directly to the City of BEBRIACUM, and that their Chieftains had fent before to offer Treaty of Peace. Celfus and his companion Gallus being glad of this, prayed the Centurions that they would return with them unto Cecimna. But when they were come near unto him, Celfus was in great danger of his life; because the men of Arms which he had overthrown certain days before in an Ambuth, coming before, when they fpied him, they flew upon him with great shouts. Howbeit the Centurions that were in his company, stepped before him, and cloted him in: and so did the other Captains that cryed unto them they should do him no hurt, Cecima understanding what the matter was, rode thither and pacified the tumult of these men of Arms, and then faluting Celfus very courteoully, he went with him towards Bebralacum.

But now Titianus in the mean time, repenting himself that he had fent Ambasadors unto the Enemies, he placed the desperately fouldiers he had upon the walls of the City, and encouraged the reft also to do the like, and to fland to the defence. But Cecinna came to the wall, and being on horseback, held up his hand unto them. Then they made no more resistance, but this that were upon the walls, falured the fouldiers: and they that were within the City opened the gates, and thrust in among Vitellius men, who received them, and did no man any hurr, but courteoutly embraced them, and faluted each other. Then they all fware and took their oaths to be true to Vitellius, and fo yielded themselves unto him, So do the most part of those that were at this Battle, report the fuccels thereof: granting notwithflanding, that they knew not every thing that was done, because of the great diforder among them. But as I travelled on a Men that fight time through the field where the Battle was stricken, with Merring Floras that had been Confull, he shewed me an old man that when the field was fought in that place, was young, and against his will was at the same battle on Otho's part. Who told us, that after the battlewas fought, he came into the field to furvey the number of those that were dead; and he found the dead bodies piled on a heap, of the height of those that came to view them. And faid more at the battle. over, that he made inquiry of the matter, but he neither could imagine it himself, nor be faished by others. Now indeed it is likely, that in Civil Wars between Countreymen of one felf City, where one of the two Armies is overthrown, that there should be a greater slaughter among them, then against the other Enemies, because they take no prisoners of either fide; for those they should take, would ferve them to no good purpofe. But after they were flain, one to be layed on heaps to by another, that is a hard thing to judge. But now to the matter. The news of this overthrow came first but obscurely upon Otho, a common thing in a matter of fogreat importance: but afterwards, when some that were hurt came and brought him certain news of it, it was no marvell then to fee Orbo's friends and familiars to comfort him, who prayed him to be of good chear, and not to be discouraged for that. Howbeit, the wonderful great love and good will which the private fouldiers shewed unto him at that time, did pals and The great file love and good will which the private fouldiers flewed unto him at that time, did pass and live of the following t diers, unto the themselves to their Enemies the Conquerors, neither took they any regard of themselves, to diers, unto the themselves to their Emperour in that despair: but all of them joyntly together went unto his lodging, and called him their Emperour. Then he came out, and they fell down at his feet, a smar reprefented in a triumph lying on the ground, and kiffed his hands, with the team running down their cheeks, and belought him not to forfake and leave them to their Enemies, but to command their persons whileft they had one drop of blood left in their bodies to do him ser-The wonderfull vice. All of them together made this petition to him. But amongst others, there was a poor fouldier who drawing out his fword, faid unto him: Know, O. Cafar, that all my companions fooldier of 0. are determined to die in this fort for thee, and so slew himself. But all these lamentable things did never melt Otho's heart; who looking with a front countenance round about him, and, cashing und never men of the seventh of the rageof Othobe "my fellows, then that in the which you first choic me Emperor: to see you love me so will forch in death, "and do me such honour, with so great shew of loyalty. So when he had made this Oration unto them, and put those by, that would have perswaded him the contrary : he commanded all the Senators and his friends that were prefent, to avoid. Then he wrote Letters to them that were absent, and allo unto the Cities where through they passed, to use them very courteously, and to see them safely conveyed. Then came his Nephew Cocceim to him, who was yet but a young The Emperor boy; and he did comfort him, and bad him not be afraid of Vitellius, for he had fafely kept Otho's words to his Mother, Wife, and Children, and had been as carefull of them, as if they had been his own : his Nephew and that he would not yet adopt him for his fon though he was defirous to do it, untill fuch Cocceius, time as he saw the end of this War: to the end that if he overcame, he should quietly reign Emperour with him; and if he were overcome, that for adopting of him, he would not be cause of his death. But this one thing onely I command and charge thee, my fon, even as the last commandment that I can give thee: that thou do not forget altogether, neither overmuch remember, that thine Uncle hath been Emperor. When he told him this tale, he heard a noise at his door; they were the Souldiers that had threatned the Senators which came from him and would kill them, if they did not remain with him, but would forfake their Emperour. Upon this occasion he came out once again among them, being afraid least the Souldiers would do the Senators some hurt, and made the Souldiers give back, not by entreating of them, nor speaking courteoully to them, but looking grimly on them, and in great rage: infomuch that they all fhrunk back, and went away for fear: So when night came, he was a thirft, and drank a little water: and having two fwords, he was a proving a great while which had the best edge. In the end, he put by the one, and kept the other in his Arms. Then he began to comfort his servants, and liberally to give out his money among them, to some more, to some less, not prodigally throwing it away without difcretion, as being another mans money: but difcreetly gave to every man according to his defert. Then, after he had dispatched them away, he laid him Othoin his down to fleep all the reft of the night, and the Grooms of his Chamber heard him fnort, he flept death, feemed fo foundly. In the morning he called one of his Enfranchifed bondonen, whom he had commanded to help to fave the Senators, and fent him to fee if they were all fafe, and gone. So when ed Cato Utican he understood that they were all gone, and that they had all they would : Come on, faid he then unto him, look to thy felf, I read thee, and take heed the Souldiers fee thee not, if thou wilt scape with life, for sure they will kill thee, thinking thou hast holpen me to kill my self. So, as foon as his Enfranchifed bondman was gone out of his Chamber, he took his fword with both his hands, and fetting the point of it to his breaft, he fell down upon it, feeming to feel Otho flew himno other pain, faving that he fetched a figh: whereby they that were without knew that he had felf. done himself hurt. Thereupon his friends made straight an out-cry, and all the Camp and City was incontinently full of tears and lamentation. The Souldiers suddenly ran with a great noise to his Gates, where they bitterly bewailed, and lamented his death, falling out with themfelves that they were such villains so slenderly to have guarded their Emperour, that they kept him not from killing himself for their takes. So there was not a man of them that left his body, though the Enemies were hard at hand : but having honourably buried him, and prepared a great stack of wood, they conveyed him armed to the fire of his Funerals, every man thinking himself happy, that could first set his shoulders to the Cossin to help to carry him. Others coming to it, kneeled down on their knees, and kiffed his wound. Others took and The Fenerals kissed his hands. Others that could not come near unto him honoured him, and did reverence Emperor. him a far off; and some there were also that after the stack of wood was set on fire, slew themselves hard by the fire : who had never received benefit by him that was dead (at the least to any mans knowledge) neither had they any occasion to be afraid of him that was Conquerour. And truely methinks, never King nor Tyrant was so ambitiously given to reign, as they vehemently defired to be commanded by Otho, and to obey him : confidering that their defire left them not even after his death, but was so lively rooted in their minds, that in the end, it turned to a deadly hate unto Vitellius. But of this we will speak more hereaster in time and place. Now, when they had buried Otho's ashes, they did set up a Tomb for him, neither for magnificence of building, nor for glorious Epitaph, fubject to envy. For I have feen his Tomb in the City of Bresselles a mean thing, and the Epitaph upon it translated.

The Emperor out of Latine, faith no more but this: This is the Tomb of Marcus Otho. He died being but feren Other stomb in and thirty years old, and was Emperor but three moneths : and there were as famous men that comthe City of Bregliets.

And unitry years old, and was emperor but three moneths: and there were a sample ment that compared his death, as they that reproved his life. For though he lived not much more honefter then mended his death, as they that reproved his life. For though he lived not much more honefter then come of the Captains would have Ners, yet he died far more honourably. Furthermore, when Poliso one of the Captains would have taken their oaths to be true to Vitellius, they fell out with compelled his fouldiers prefendly to have taken their oaths to be true to Vitellius, they fell out with him: and understanding that there were yet remaining some Senators, they would not meddle with them, but onely troubled Verginius Rusus. For they came to his doors armed, and called him by his name, and commanded him to take charge of them, and to go as Ambaffador to entrear for them. Howbeit he thought it were but a fond part of him to take charge of them that were already overcome, Howeith the thought it were but a tond part of nint to take charge of them that were arready overcome, confidering he refused it when they had overcome; and also he was afraid to go Ambassiador to the Germans, because he had compelled them to do things against their wills. Therefore he went out at his back door, and saved himself. So when the Souldiers heard of it, they were at length contented to be brought to be flower unto Visellius: and so joyned themselves with Cecinna's souldiers, so they might be pardoned for all that was past.

F we do call to mind the first Punick War the Carthaginians had with the Romans, we shall find many Captains who by the glory of their noble deeds, have left great fame and renown unto their posterity. However amongst all the Captains of the Carthaginians, none are found more worthy of fame, and so commended of all Greek and Laim Authors, then Hamilton, The parentage Hannibal's father, otherwise firmanced Barche, a valiant man doubtless, and of Hannibal, in his time a skilfull fouldier as any was. The fame Hamilton, first of all

made War with the ROMANS, a longer time in Sights then was looked for, who had done great hurt to his Countrey and Commonwealth. After that also in the Wars of Arrick (at what time the mercenary fooldiers through their rebellion did put the Countrey of Carthage in great danger) he did for saliantly appeare the inforrection, that to every mans judgement, he was reputed the onely preferrer of his Countrey. Then he was fent Governour and Captain into Spann, and carried with him at that time (as it is reported) his fon Hannibal, because the saliant of the saliant transfer of the saliant ing but a young boy, where he did noble fervice. In fine, in the ninth year of his abode there in that Province, he died fighting valiantly against the VETHEONS. After his death, Hafdrubal his Hannibal's Atagems.

This Hafarubal fent for Hannibal into Spain, after his father Hamilears death, against the minds of the chief of the contrary faction; to the end that as he had been trained from his youth in the difcipline of Wars, in his father Hamilears life: even to in like manner, that now being come to mans state, he should the better harden his body, to away with the pains and dangers of the Wars. Now although at the first, the remembrance of his father was a great help unto him to win the love and good will of the fouldiers: yet he himself afterwards, through his diligence and industry so handled the matter, that the old fouldiers forgetting all other Captains, they onely defired to choose him (and none other) for their Governor. For they found in him all the perfections that could be wished for in a noble Cappin or General. The had a prefent and ready wit to give counfell what was to be for in a noble Cappin or General. The had a prefent and ready wit to give counfell what was to be done, in greateft aftempts: and befides, he facked peither manhood nor industry to put it in execution, the had a valiant and invincible mind; even in greateft dangers and advertities of body; the which are wont to fray others from performing their endeavours and duty. He would watch and ward as any private fouldier, and was quick and ready to to any kind of fervice, either like a valiant fouldier, or a good Captain. In this fort Hannibal continued in service in the Wars, the space of three years, under the conduct of Hafdrubal. In that time he fo wan the hearts of all the Army, that immediately after Hafdrabitis death, he was chosen to be Lieutenant General, with the common consent of all Hamibal cho the fouldiers: and this honour was laid upon him without contradiction of any of the CARTHAGIten Litertransia.

General after NIANS, through the friendship and good will of the BANCINIAN faction. Hannibal was now fix and twenty years old, when the fouldiers made him their Lieucenant General. For at what time Haldrubal, be his father Hamilear brought him into Shabas, he was then but nine years old: and from that ing but twenty time unto Hafdrubals death (according to Polybiu declaration) it was feventeen years more. So he was no fooner made Lieutenant Generall of all the Camp, and his Countrey, but he bent himself to make War with the ROMANS : having long before determined it. For first of all, he chiefly maintained almost a common hate of all the CARTHAGINIANS against the ROMANS, because Divor causes of Hamilton's thing inheritable from his father Hamilton's without the Carthaginian's thing inheritable from his father Hamilton's without the Carthaginian's were had, was the mortallest enemy unto the Roman. Hamilear made his preparation to go into SAAN, he compelled Hamibal (being but a boy) to fwear in a farrifice he made, that he would be a mortal enemy to the ROMANS, alloon as ever he fwear in a facrifice he made, that he would be a mortal enemy to the ROMANS, alloon as ever he came to the frate of a man, $50; the remembrince of these things were still fresh in the young mass mind, as the idea (or Image), of his fathers hate, and still provoked him to spy out all the means he mind, as the idea (or Image), of his fathers hate, and fill provoked him to spy out all the means he father.

The Barcinias prick him far ward unto is, the cance by Wars he might ratis himself to greatness, and so encreasely prick him far ward unto is, the cance by Wars he might ratis himself to greatness, and so encreasely either.

The far was a ward of the father ward in the Romans a prophet a that time called the Saguntines, who consided in the control of the father ward were left free by the former peace concluded. These Saguntines and Care the Critical section of the free by the former peace concluded. Thee Society in the ROMANS and Care the Critical section of the free by the former peace concluded. Thee Society is the Romans of the legice that was made betwit them, the Romans of the legice that was made betwit them, the Romans was hard therefore thought with himself, he could not devide to make a better match to anger the Romans, with all, and re-time there free of his malice allo against them, then to make War will first SAGUN TINEs their Confederates. However, before he would be openly feen to fer upon them, he first determined to lead his Army against the Oleanes, and other people on the other sides of the River Ibera: and after he had overcome them; then to find occasion to molest the SAGUN TINES, to make it appears to the had overcome them; then to find occasion to molest the SAGUN TINES, to make it appears to the sagundary to the sagundary them. pear that the War was rather begun by them, then purposely intended by him. So after he had overcome the OLCADES, he did fer upon the VACOPIANS, Toolid their Countrey, befieged many Cities, and took HERMANDICE, and ARBOCOLE, great and rich Cities. Now he had in manner The conspiratiovercome all the whole Countrey, when divers sugitives from the City of HERMANDICE, encoucy of the Spar raging one another, conspired against him, levied men, and inticed the OLCADES that were fled, to take their part. Then they perswaded the CARTHAGINIANS their neighbours, that they would all agree fuddenly to fet upon Hamibal at his return. They being a people that defired nothing more then to fight, and confidering also that they had received injuries by Hannibal, did easily hearken unto that counsel 3, and thereupon levying a great number of men, to the number of a hundred thoufand, they went to affail Hannibal at his return from the VACCEIANS, by the River of Tagu. When the CARTHAGINIANS discovered their Army, they stayed upon it, and were marvellously afraid. And doubtless they, had had a great overthrow, if they had fought with those so fierce prople, being atraid of their fudden.coming, and also loden as they were with so great spoils: the which Hannibal deeply confidering, like a wife Captain as he was, he would not fight, but lodged his Camp in the place where they were. Then the next day following, he passed his Army over the River with as little noise as he could, leaving the passage where the Enemies might easiliest come over, unguarded : because under pretence of diffembled fear, he might entrice the barbarous people to pais o ver the River, to take the opportunity and occasion offered them. Now indeed as he was the subtillest Captain, and had the finest stratagems of any other Captain of his time: so his polity was not in vain, and his purpose to good effect, in abusing of the enemy t for the wild barbarous people repoling too great truft in the multitude of their men, supposing the CARTHAGTNIANS had been afraid, with great fury entred the River to pass over it. So they being greatly troubled, and out of order by this means, and specially before they could pass all over the River, they were set upon by the CARTHAGINIANS, first by certain horiemen, and afterwards with the whole Army; fo that there was a great number of them flain, and the refidue were put to flight. After this victory, all the people inhabiting about the River of Iberus, yielded themselves unto him, saving the SAGUNTINES: The Iberians who, though they faw Hannibal at hand coming towards them, trufting to the friendship of the Ro-yielded them MANS, they prepared to defend themselves against him: and therewithall sent Ambassadors presently to Rome, to shew the Senate in what great danger they were, and also to pray aid against their so great enemy, that made Wars to hotly with them. The Ambassadors that were fent to Rome, were feant gone out of SPAIN, when Hannibal made open War on them with all his Army, and pitched his Camp before the City of SAGUNTUS. When this matter was reported at ROME, and confulted Hannibal laieth of for the wrongs that had been done to their Confederates, the Senators dealt but flackly in it, and by fiege to the Cidecree onely sent P. Valerius Flaccus, and Quintus Bebius Pamphilus unto Hannibal, to will him to ty of Saguntus. raife his siege from SAGUNTUS: and if they found he would not hearken to them, that then they should thence repair to CARTHAGE, and to pray them to deliver their General Hannibal unto them, because he had broken the peace. Polybius writeth, that Hannibal did hear these Ambassadors, howbeit, that he made them a flender answer. Living writeth in contrary manner, that they were never heard, nor came at any time to his Camp. Howbeit, they both agree thus far, that they came into SPAIN, and afterwards went into Africk, and from thence came to CARTHAGE; where after they had delivered their meffage unto the Council, the BARCINIAN faction was fo much against them, that they dishonourably returned to ROME, and obtained not their desire. Now in the Senate of CARTHAGE there were two contrary parts and factions: of the which, the first took his Two contrary beginning from the Government of Hamilear, firnamed Barca, and so descended as it were by success factions in the from to his fon Hannibal, and grew afterwards unto such greatness, that that saction (as well abroad the secrete Buras at home) ruled all matters judicial. The second faction came of Hamo, a grave man and of great chains, and authority in the same Commonwealth: howbeit, a man more given to embrace peace and quietness, Hannonians. then otherwise disposed to war and trouble. It is he onely (as it is reported) who at that time when the Hamiltan Barea Ambassadors of the Romans came to Carthage, to complain of the injuries done to their counteller and Confederates, that did then in manner against the will of all the whole Senate, counsell them to keep governour in Peace with the ROMANS, and to beware of Wars, the which one day might peradventure utterly peace, destroy their Countrey. Doubtless, if the CARTHAGINIANS would have followed the grave A happy thing countel of Hanno, rather then to have given place to their defires, and had followed the author of peace, to follow good countell, and not to have been ruled by them that gave counsel to make Wars, they had not tasted of those miseries which their Countrey afterwards came unto: but giving place to the fury and ambitious mind of a young man, they heaped such mischiefs on their heads, as afterwards fell out upon them. Therefore it is very meet for wife Magistrates and Governors of Commonweals, always rather to have Wife counsel an eye to the beginning of any matters, then to the end : and ever to decide all matters by advice and for Governors counfel, before they should take any Wars in hand. Now the SAGUNTINES seeing themselves befieged by Hannibal, and that against all reason and equity he made Wars upon them, they notwith beginning, ftanding valiantly defended the frege many moneths together. Yet in fine, though Hamibal had ma-ny more men then they (having a bundred and fifty thouland men in his Camp) and that the most part of their Rampiers were battered and overthrown : they liked rather to abide the fack of their City, then to yield themselves to the mercy of their mortal enemy. So some do report, that SAGUNTUS was taken the eighth moneth after fiege was laid unto it. But Livy feemeth not to agree to that, neither to fet down any certain time of the continuance of the fiege. Now the taking of this so wealthy a City, was a great furtherance divers ways to Hannibals enterprifes. For many Cities taking example of the fack of SAGUNTUS, who before milliking to be subject to the CARTHAGINIANS, guntus. were ready to rebell, kept themselves quiet, and the souldiers also waxed lively and couragious: seeing the rich spoils that were divided in the Camp. So Hannibal sent great presents of the spoils of the SAGUNTINES, unto CARTHAGE, whereby he wan the chiefest men of the City, and made them like the better of Wars: whom he determined to lead with him against the ROMANS, not into Spain, as many supposed, but into Italy it self. Whilft these matters were in hand, the Ambassadors returned from CARTHAGE to ROME, and declared in open Senate, the slender answer they had received, in manner at the self fame time when they had intelligence of the sack of SAGUNTUS. Hereupon the ROMANS greatly repented themselves (though somewhat too late) for that they aided not their friends and confederates in fo great danger. Therefore all the Senate and people together, being very forry for it, and therewith also marvellously offended, they divided the Provinces unto the Confuls, to wit, SPAIN unto Publius Cornelius, and AFRICK P. Cornelius and SICILE also unto Titus Sempronius. Afterwards, certain of the noblest men of the City and T. Semwere fent Ambassadors unto CARTHAGE, to make their complaints in open Senate for breach of pronius Conthe Peace, and also to denounce unto them the cause of the War to come, and therewith boldly to Warsproclaimproclaim open War against them, after they had declared the occasion thereof to come of them- ed by the Rofelves. This was as bravely received of the CARTHAGINIANS, as luftily offered unto them : but mans, with the therein they were not fo well advised, as the success of that War in the end sufficiently proved it to Carthaginians, them. Now Hannibal being advertised how things were concluded in the Senate at CARTHAGE, and thinking with himself that it was time to go into ITALY, as he had determined from the beginning: he made all the possible speed he could to prepare his ships and things ready, and so requi-

ed aid of the Cities that were his best friends and consederates, and commanded that all the bands fhould meet him at new CARTHAGE. So when he came to GADES, he appointed good Garifons in places most convenient, in Africk and Sprin, which he thought above all things elle to be most necessary: because that when he should go into ITALY, the ROMANS would not win it from him. Therefore he fent into Africk twelve hundred horfemen, and thirteen thousand footmen, all Spaniards; and besides, he brought out of divers parts of A-FRICK four thousand fouldiers, and placed them in Garifon in CARTHAGE, obtaining both Hoftages, and Souldiers by this mean. drubal, and gave him an Army of fifty ships of War, two thousand horsemen, and twelve thou fand footmen. These were the Garifons he lest in both those Provinces. Now he thought them not fufficient to withfland the power of the ROMANS, if they bent their Wars into SPAIN or AFRICK: but he thought them ftrong enough to ftay the Enemy from over-running of the Countrey, untill that having brought his Army by Land, he had fet foot in ITALY. Moreover, he knew that the CARTHAGINIANS were strong enough to levy a new Army if they listed; and if need to required, to fend him aid also into ITALY. For, after that they had driven away this so dangerous a War, procured against them through the spight of the mercenary souldiers, having ever after obtained victory: first under the conduct of Hamilear: secondly, under Hasarabal; and lastly, under Hamibal: they were grown to such greatness and strength, that at what time Hannibal came into ITALY, their Empire and Dominions were marvelloully enlarged. For they had all the coast of Africk, which lyesh over against the sea Mediterraneum, from the Aluss of the PHILENIANS, which be not far from the great Syrte, unto Hercules pillars, and contained on of Africk.

of the PHILENIANS, which denotes they had paffed the straight which divided Africk.

This place is in length * two thousand paces. So after they had passed the straight which do divide they have been passed to the Mountains Pirenei, which do divide from Europe, they possessed almost all Spain, to the Mountains Pirenti, which do divide SPAIN from GAUL. Thus order being taken for all things in AFRICK and SPAIN, Hannibal returned again to new CARTHAGE, where his Army was ready for him, and well appoint ed. So, meaning to delay time no longer, he called his men together, and encouraging them with great and large promifes, he greatly commended the commodities of ITALY: and made great account unto them of the friendfhip of the GAULS, and in the end bad them be of good course, and fet luftily forward. Thereupon, the next day following he departed from CARTHAGE, and Hannibal debrought his Army all along the coaft, unto the River of Iberm. It is reported, that the next day following, Hannibal dreamed be faw a young man, of a marvellous terrible look and flature, who invade Italy. bad him follow him into IT ALY : but afterwards, that he faw a Snake of a wonderfull greatnes, making a marvellous noife: and being destrous to understand what the same might fignifie, that it was told him, that it betokened the destruction of ITALY. It is not to be marvelled at, though the river of Iberus. great care and thought he took in the day time for the War of ITALY, made his mind to m of fuch fancies in the night, as dreaming of victory or destruction, or fuch other calamities of War. For they are things that happen often, as Cicero the Orator faith: that our thoughts and words do beget such things in our dream, as Ennius the Poet writeth of Homer: to wit, like to those his mind most ranon, or that he talked of most. Now after Hannibal had passed over the mountains Pirenei, and that he had won the GAULS hearts with bountifull gifts, in few days he The head and came to the River of Rhone. The head of the River of Rhone, is not far from the heads of the River of Rhone. course of the vers of the Rhyne and Dannby, and running eight hundred furlongs, it falleth into Lacus Lemanus at river of Rhone. Geneva. Then it runneth from thence towards the West, and divideth the Gauls a pretty way: and then being encreased by the River of Arar (called in French, Saone) and with other Rivers, in the end it falleth into the Sea with divers heads betwixt the Volsces and the Cauri-ANS. The VOLSCES at that time inhabited both the fides of the River of Rhone, and were full people that in. of people, and the richeft of all other Gauls. They having understanding of Hannibal's composition ing, passed over the River, and armed themselves, and prepared on the other side to stop the CARTHAGINIANS, that they should not pass over. Now, though Hannibal had won all the other Gauls, yet those the could never win neither by gifts nor threats, to cause them rather to prove the friendship of the CARTHAGINIANS, then their force. Therefore Hamilton perceiving he was to handle such enemies rather by policy, he commanded Hanno the fon of Bimilear, secretly to pass over the River of Rhone, with part of the Army, and so to set upon the GAULS on the fudden. Thereupon Hanno (ashe was commanded) made a long journey, and ha ving paffed over the River at paffable foords, he shewed himself hard by the Enemies Camp before they faw him, or that they knew what he was. The Gauls hearing their shours and cries behind them, and having their hands full of Hannibal before them, who had many boars ready to puls over his men: they having no leifure to confult of the matter, neither to arm themselves to stand to defence, left their Camp and fled for life. So they being driven from the other fide of the River, the rest of the Army of the CARTHAGINIANS passed over it with facety. In the mean time, P. Cornelius Scipio, that but a little before was come unto MASSILIA, still heard news of Hami-chance with five hundred horsemen of the NUMIDIANS, whom Hannibal had also fent to bring him word of the ROMANS Army. So, they first suddenly gave charge upon the Numi Dians, and after a hot and valiant conslict between both the parties, in the end the ROMANS overcoming them, they made them fly, but with great loss of their men; howbeit the greatest loss and flaughter fell upon the Enemies. So Hannibal by this means found where the ROMANS lav. and ftood in a great doubt with himself; whether he should keep on his way into ITALY, or else lead Ambassadours, and done great mischief unto Mantins the Prator, and inticed the INSUBRIANS The Bolans alfo, they were revolted from the ROMANS, and took part with Hannibal, and onely because and Insubrians allo, they were revolted from the ROMANS, and took part with Frankier, and only occalle revolt from the the ROMANS had replenished the Cities of PLACENTIA, and CREMONA with People, and Romans and had made them Colonies to Rome. So Hannibal being ruled by their counsell, raised his Camp, take part with had made them Colonies to Robars. So Islamba Cong. the days he came to the place which Harnibal. the Galls do call the Island, the which the River of Arar and Rhodanus, coming from divers hour. Dugdanum the Galls do call the Island, the which the River of Arar and Rhodanus, coming from divers hour. rains . do make there. So at this present , there is the famous City of Lions in Gaul, which they cut Munativis. through the Countrey of the Castinians and Vocontians, to the River of Lurance. Druentia, A. Countries, as far as he could: howbeit, as he passed through them, he had great losses, as it is reported. Infomuch that fome that were living at that time, did affirm, that they heard Hannibal himself fay, that he had loft above thirty thousand men, and the most part of his Horsemen. For Hannibal made he was forced not onely to fight with the Inhabitants of the Mountains, but also compelled to make ways through ways through the Streights: fo that in certain places of the highest Rocks, he was driven to make the Rocks of paffages through, by force of fire and vineger. So when he had paffed the Alpes in fifteen days tains, by force fpace, he came down into the Valley, not far from the City of TURINE. Whereby it feemeth to of fire and vime, that he paffed over the Mountain they commonly called GENUA, the which on the one fide of neger it hath the River of Druentia , and on the other fide it goeth down to the City of TURINE. Now The Valley of it is hard to fay truely, what number of men he had when he was come into ITALY, because of the Hansibals codiversity of mens opinions. For some write, that he had a hundred thouland Footmen, and twenty ming into Itathousand Horsemen: others also write, that he had twenty thousand Footmen, and six thousand by by Piemont, Horsemen, all Africans and Spaniards. But others reckoning the Gauls and Ligu-not far from RIANS, do count fourscore thousand Footmen, and ten thousand Horsemen. Yet it is not crediconfidering that he brought into ITALY, the better part of fourfcore thousand Footmen, and ten thousand Horsemen, the which he had leavied in SPAIN: as it is manifestly known also, that Hannibals Ata great number of the LIGURIANS and GAULS came to joyn with him, for the great my in Italy. malice they bare unto the ROMANS, that gave no place nor ground unto the CARTHAGI-NIANS. So Hannibal being come from TURINE, into the Countrey of the INSUBRI-ANS, he was met withall by Publius Cornelius Scipio, who marching with wonderfull speed from MASSILIA, and having passed the River of Po and Tesin, he camped not far from the Enemy. So shortly after, both the Generals being come into the Field to view each others Camp, the Horsemen of either side grew to skirmish, which continued long, and was not to be discerned which of them had the better. Howbeit, in the end the ROMANS feeing the Confull hurt, and Hannibals first also that the Horsemen of the Numidians, by little and little came to compass them in, Conflict with they were driven to give ground; and fo prettily retired, defending the Confull the best they the Romans, and Victory, could to fave him, and so at length recovered their Camp. It is reported, that Publius Corne- P. C. Scipio lins Scipio was faved at that time through his Sons help, who afterwards was called AFRI- Conful hurt, CAN, and at that time was but a young ftripling: whose praise, though it was wonderfull in so and saved from green a Youth, yet is is likely to be true, because of the famous and valiant Acts that he did af- his Enemies by terwards. Now Scipio having proved how much his Enemy was stronger then himself in Horsemen, he determined to place his Camp so, as his Footmen might be in best safety, and also Fight called African. with greatest advantage. And therefore the next night following he passed the River of Po, and Fadus fl. made as little noise as he could, and went unto PLACENTIA. The like shortly after did T. Sem- P. Cornelius promin Longus, who had been reflored from banishment by the Senate, and fent for out of Ssiphia and CILE: because both the Confuls should govern the Common-wealth by one self-Authority. Longus Cou-Hannibal also followed them both with all his Army, and pitched his Camp near unto the River fuls, against of Trebia, hoping that because both Camps lay so near together, some occasion would be offer- Hannibal. ed to fight: the which he chiefly defired, both because he could not long maintain Warfor lack Trebia fl. of Victuals, as also that he mistrusted the fickleness of the Gauls; who like asthey soon fell in League and friendship with him, drawn unto it with the hope of change, and with the Fame also of his Victory obtained : so he mistrusted that upon any light occasion (as if the War should continue any long time in their Countrey) they would turn all the hate they bare unto the ROMANS, against him as the onely Author of this War. For these respects therefore, his Army against the Confull that then was, and so to prove his hap and success. At length debating many ways in his mind, and uncertain which way he should determine, the Ambassadours of the BOIANS perswaded him to leave all other devices, and to go on into ITALY. For before that Hannibal had passed over the Mountains Pirenei, the BOIANS having by crast taken the ROMANS fay was built long time after by Plancus Munatius. From thence he came to the Countrey of the ALLOBROGES, and having pacified the variance betwirt two Brethren for the Realm, he came The head of this River cometh from the Alpes, and from thence running with a fwift stream, falleth into the River of Rhone: and as it oftentiates changeth her courfe, fo hath it in manner no paffable foord. Yet Hannibal having paft it over, he led his Army unto the Alpes, through open and plain ble, that his Army was so great, as the first men report, and specially having passed through so many Countreys, and also received such losses as he had: neither also could his number be so small, as the second reporters do make it, if a man will consider the famous Exploits and great Enterprizes he did afterwards. So that I like their opinions best, which keep the mean between them both:

he devited all the means ne could to come to battern. In the mean time compression with confer Confull, met with a Troop of the Enemies, loaden with Spoil, ftragling up and down the Fields, whom he charged and put to flight. So, imagining the like fuccels of all the Battell, by this good fortune he had met withall, he had good hope of Victory , if once both the Armies might come to fight. Therefore being marvellously defirous to do fome noble Enterprize before Scipic were recovered of his furt, and that the new Confull should be chosen, he determined to joyn Batten against the will de like the state and Common-wealth in jeopardy, specially having all the whole Gaules in manner in the Field against him. Now Hannibal had seeret intelligence of all this variance, by Spials he had feat into the Enemies Camp. Wherefore, he being politick and fubtill as he was, found out a place ftraight between both Camps, covered over with Bushes and Briers, and there he placed his Brother Mago to lie in Ambulh, with a company of chofen men. Ambush lidd

Then he commanded the Horsemen of the Numidians, to scurry to the Trenches of the Ro-Ambum laid by Hannibal to MANS, to intice them to come to Battell : and thereupon made the refidue of his Army to eat, antrap Scompto- and so put them in very good order of Battell, to be ready upon any occasion offered. Now the Confull Sempromiar, at the first tumult of the Numidians, indeedly sent his Horsemen to encounter them, and after them put out fix thousand Footmen, and in the end came himself out of counter tieth, and rice them pas out is another in the middeft of Winter, and extream cold, and speci-his Camp with all his Army. It was then in the middeft of Winter, and extream cold, and specially in the places inclosed about with the Alpes, and the Mountain Appenine. Now the Numidians as they were commanded, inticed the ROMANS by little and little on this fide the River of Treba, until they came to the place where they might difeern their Enfigns : and then they fuddenly un-Suppressing the ned upon the Enemies , which were out of order. For it is the manner of the Numidians , often-Consult, at the times to flie of fet purpose, and to stay upon the sudden when they see time, to charge the Enemy more hotly and fiercely then before. Whereupon Semproniss incontinently gathered his Horsemen together, and did set his men in Battell-ray, as time required, to give Charge upon his. nemy, that flayed for him in order of Battell. For Hannibal had caft his men into Squadrons, ready upon any occasion. The Skirmish began first by the light Horsemen, and afterwards increased hotter by supply of the men of Armes; howbeit, the ROMAN Knights being unable to ber the shock of the Enemies, they were quickly broken; so that the Legions maintained the Burdl with fuch fury and noble courage, that they had been able to have refifted, fo they had fought but with Footmen onely. But on the one fide, the Horfemen and Elephants made them afraid, and on the other fide the Footmer followed them very luftily, and fought with great fury againft imi-fied and frozen men. Wherefore the ROMANS notwithstanding, suffering all the miseries that vexed them on every fide, with an unspeakable courage and magnanimity, such as was above their force and firength, they fought fill, until that Mago coming out of his ambush, came and id-denly affailed them with great shouts and cries: and that the middle Squadron of the CARTHA-GINIANS also (through Hamibals commandment) flew upon the CINOMANIANS, The the ROMANS feeing their Confederates flie, their hearts were done and utterly discouraged. It is faid that there were ten thousand Footmen of the ROMANS got to PLACENTIA, and came through the Enemies. The reft of the Army that fled, were most part of them flain by the Care Hamibal VI THAGINIANS. The Confull Sempronius also scaped very narrowly from the Enemies. The Victory cost Hannibal the setting on also : for he lost a great number of his men, and the most part of his Elephants were flain. After this Battell Hannibal overcame all the Country, and did put all to fire and Sword, and took also certain Towns: and with a few of his men made a great number of the Countreymen flie, that were diforderly gathered together in Battell. Then a the beginning of the Spring, he brought his Army into the Field fooner then time required: and meaning to go into Thuscan, bewas driven back by a great Tempest at the very top of the height of Appenine, and so compelled to bring his Army a JULPLACENTIA: howbeit, fhortly after he put hmilelf again into the Fields, for divers urgent and necessary causes. For had he not faved himself by that policy, he had almost been taken tardy by the Ambush of the GAULS: who being anery with himself that the War was continued to long in their Countrey, they fought to be revenged of him, as the onely authour and occasion of the War. Therefore perceiving it was time for him to avoid this danger, he made all the hafte he could to lead his Army into some other Provinces. Furthermore, he thought it would increase his estimation much among strangers, and also greatly encountermore, he thought it would increase his estimation much among strangers, and also greatly encountermore, rage his own People, if he could make the Power of the CARTHAGINIANS to feem fo great, and also their Captain to be of so noble a courage, as to dare to make War so near to the Cuy of ROME. All things therefore fet apart, he marched with his Camp by the Mountain Appenine, and fo coming through the Countrey of the LIGURIANS, he came into THUSCAN, by the way that bringeth them into the champion Countrey, and to the Marishes about the River Arms, The River of Arnus at that time was very high, and had overflown all the Fields thereabouts. Hamnbal there fore marching with 10 great an Army as he had, could not avoid it, but that he must needs lofe a number tore marching with 10 great an Army as he had, could not avoid it, but that he must needs lose a number one of his eyes of his Men and Horse, before he could get out of those evill-favoured Marishes. Insomuch that he solve he River himself lost one of his eyes, by reason of the great pains he had taken day and night without step or rest and also through the swill give though the swill give the swill g or rest, and also through the evil air: though he was carried upon a high Elephants back, which onely was left him of all that he brought with him. In the mean time, C. Flaminia Confull, to and Cn. Servilius Consults.

whom the charge of Sempronius Army was given, he was come unto ARET ILM against the Senates minde, who were marvellously offended with him, because he left his Companius Cn. Servisius at ROME, and went unto his Province by stealth as it were, without the Furniture of a Confill and his Officers. This was a very hafty man of nature, and one that the People had brought to that Dignity and Office: fo that he was become so proud and insolent, that men might see how he would hazard all things without wit or judgement. Hannibal having intelligence thereof, thought it the best way to anger the Confull, and to do what he could possible to allure him into the Field, before his fellow Confull should come to joyn with him. Therefore he marching forward with his Camp through the Countrey of Fesula Aretium, he burnt and spoiled all the Countrey thereabouts. and filled them all with fear, never leaving to deftroy all before him, untill he came to the Mountains Cortonenses, and so to the Lake called Thrasimene. When he had viewed the place, he went Montes Corto. about to furprize his Enemy by some Ambush : whereupon he conveyed certain Horsemen under the nonles, Hills, hard by the Streight that goeth unto Thrasimene, and behind the Mountains also he placed Lacus Thrasithe light Horsemen. Then he himself with the rest of his Army came down into the Field , suppo- mene. the light Florience. Then he minich was not to the fing that the Confull would not be quiet; and so it fell out. For hot stirring heads are easily intrapped withall into the Enemies Ambuth, and oftentimes do put all in hazard, because they will follow of a Souldier. no councell nor good advice. C. Flaminius therefore feeing their Countrey utterly fpoiled, the Corn destroyed and cut down, and the Housesburnt, he made great haste to lead his Army against the Enemy, contrary to all mens minds, who would have had him tarried for his Companion Cn. Servilim the other Confull. So even at Sun-fet, when he was come to the Streights of the Lake of Thrafimene, he caused his Camp to stay there, although his men were not weary with the long Journey they had taken by the way. So the next morning by break of day, making no view of the Countrey, he went over the Mountains. Then Hannibal (who long before was prepared for this) did but stay for the opportunity to work his Feat : when he faw the ROMANS come into the Plain . he gave a Signall unto all his men to give Charge upon the Enemy. Thereupon the CARTHAGI- Battel between NIANS breaking out on every fide, came before and behind, and on the Flanks to affail the Ene-Hannibal and my, being shut in between the Lake and the Mountains. Now in contrary manner, the ROMANS C. Flaminius beginning to fight out of order, they fought inclosed together, that they could not fee one another, the Confull, by as it it had been dark : fo that it is to be wondered at , how , and with what mind they fought it out the Lake of That want want and they fought it out about three That Roman energy fide. For they fought it out about three The Roman energy fide. hours space, with such fury and courage, that they heard not the terrible Earthquake that was at were so earnest that present time, neither did they offer to flie or ftir a foot untill they heard that the Confull (. in fight, that Flaminius going from Rank to Rank to encourage his men, was flain by a man of Arms called they heard not Decarius. Then when they had loft their Generall, and being void of all hope, they fled, fome Bartle of an Arms of Arms of the mole of the control of the property of towards the Mountains, and others towards the Lake, of the which divers of them flying, were C.Flaminius he overtaken and flain. So there were flain * fifteen thousand in the Field, and there scaped about Conful flain. ten thousand. Furthermore, the report went, that there were fix thousand Footmen which forci- *Plusarch in bly (at the beginning of the Battell) got to the Mountain, and there stayed on a Hill till the the life of Fa-Battell was ended, and at length came down upon Hannibals promife: but they were betrayed, addeth too as and slain every Mothers Son of them. After this great Victory, Hannibal did let divers many Prilon-ITALIAN Prisoners go free without Ransom paying, after he had used them marvellous courte- ets. oully: because that the Fame of his Clemency and Courtesse should be known unto all Nations, Hamnibals crasswhereas indeed his own nature was contrary to all Vertues. For he was hafty and cruell of nature, femble vertice, and from his youth was brought up in Wars, and exercised in Murder, Treason, and Ambushes The natural laid for Enemies : and never cared for Law , Order , nor Civill Government. So by this means he disposition of became one of the cruellest Captains, the most subtill and crastiest to deceive and intrap his Ene- Hannibal. my, that ever was. For as he was alway prying to beguile the Enemy, fo those whom he could not overcome in War by plain force, he went about to intrap by flight and policy. The which appeareth true by this present Battell, and also by the other he sought against the Consull Sempronime, by the River of Trebia. But let us return to our matter, and leave this talk till another time. Now when the news of the overthrow and death of the Confull Flaminius was reported at Rome, having loft the most part of his Army: there was great moan and lamentation made through all the City of ROME: fome bewailing the common mifery of the Common-wealth, others lamenting their private particular loss, and some also sorrowing for both together. But indeed it was a wofull fight, to fee a world of men and women to run to the Gates of the City, every one privately asking for their Kin and Friends. Some do write, that there were two women, who being very forry and penfive, despairing of the safety of their Sons, died suddenly for the extream joy they had, when beyond their expectation and hope they faw their Sons alive and fafe. At the felf-fame time, Cn. Servilins , Extream jo the other Confull with C. Flaminius, did fend him four thouland Horsemen, not understanding yet cauleth sudden of the Battell that was fought by the Lake of Thrasimene. But when they heard of the overthrow of death. their men by the way, and therefore thought to have fled into UMBRIA, they were compassed in by the Horsemen of the Enemies, and so brought unto Hannibal. Now the Empire of Rough being brought into fo great extremity and danger, because of so many small losses one in the neck of another: it was ordained, that an extraordinary Governour or Magistrate should be chosen, who should be created Dictator: an Office specially used to be reserved for the last hope and remedy in most ex- Dictator, of tream danger and perill of the State and Common-wealth. But because the Confull Servilius could what effect. not return at that time to Rome, all the ways being kept by the Enemy : the People contrary to & Fabius Matheir custom, created Q. Fabin Dictator (who afterwards attained the firname of Manimus, to ximus, created

was a grave and wife Counfellour, and of great Authority and Estimation in the Common-wealth: infomuch as the Citizens had all their hope and confidence in him onely, perswading themselves that the honour of ROME might be better preserved under the Government and Conduct of such a Generall., rather then under the Government of any other man what foever. So Fabius knowing it very well, after he had carefully and diligently given order for all things necessary: he departed from ROME, and when he had received the Army of the late Confull Cn. Servilim, he added unno them two other Legions, and so went unto the Enemy. Now Hannibal was gone from the Lake of Thrasimene, and went directly towards the City of SPOLETUM, to see if he could take it at the first Assault. But when he saw that the Townsmen stood upon the Rampiers of their Walls , and valiantly defended themselves: he then left the Town and destroyed the Countrey as he went, and burnt Houles and Villages, and fo went into APULIA, through the Marches of ANCONA, and the Countrey of the MARSIANS and PELIGNIANS. The Dictator followed him at the heels, and camped hard by the City of ARPY, not far from the Camp of the Enemy, to the end to draw out the War at length. For the raffness and fool-hardiness of the former Captains aforetime, had brought the State of ROMF into fuch mifery, that they thought it a Victory unto them, not to be Hastiness of overcome by the Enemy, that had so often overcome them. Whereby all things were turned straight with the change and alteration of the Captain : for though Hannibal had fet his men in Battell-ray, and afterwards perceiving his Enemies stirred not, went and destroyed the Countrey, hoping thereby to intice the Dictator to fight, when he should see the Countrey of his Consederates so spoiled as it was before his face: the Dictator, this notwithstanding, was not moved withall, but still kepthis men close together, as if the matter had not concerned him. Hannibal was in a marvellous rage with the delay of the Dictator, and therefore often removed his Camp, to the end that going divers ways, some occasson or opportunity might fall out to deceive the Enemy, or elle to give Banell. So when he had passed the Mountain Appenine, he came unto Samnium. But because shortly after, fome of CAMPANIA, who having been taken Prisoners by the Lake of Thrasimene, had been fet at liberty without ranfom : they putting him in hopethathe might take the City of Ca-PUA, he made his Army march forward, and took a Guide that knew the Countrey, to bring him unto Casinum. Now the Guide overhearing Casinum, understood it Casilinum, and so miltaking the found of the word, brought the Army a clean contrary way unto CALENTINGS and CALENUM, and from thence about STELLA. So when they came into a Countrey environed about with Mountains and Rivers, Hannibal knew straight they had mistaken their way, and so did cruelly put the Guide to death. Fabins the Dictator, did in the mean time bear all this patiently, and was contented to give Hannibal liberty to take his pleasure which way he would, until helad cruelly put to death by Hangotten the Mountains of Gallicanum, and Casilinum, where he placed his Garison, being places of great advantage and commodity. So the Army of the CARTHAGINIANS was in manner com-Hamibals Stratagem in the great shame and dishonour: had not Hamibal by this Stratagem prevented the danger. Who knowing the danger all his Army flood in , and having fpied a fit time for it : he commanded his Souldiers to bring forth two thousand Oxen which they had gotten in spoil in the Fields, having and California great fore of them, and then tying Torches of Fire-links unto their horns, he appointed the against Q.Fs. nimblest men he had to light them, and to drive the Oxen up the Hill to the top of the Mountains, biss Diction at the relief of the first Watch. All this was duly executed according to his commandment, and the Oxen running up to the top of the Mountains with the Torches burning, the whole Army marched after them fair and fortly. Now the ROMANS that had long before placed a strong Garison upon the Mountains, they were afraid of this strange fight, and mistrusting some Ambush, they forthwith forfook their Pieces and Holds. Fabius himself miltrusting also that it was some Stratagem of the Enemy, kept his men within the Camp, and could not well tell what was some stratagem of the Entire Hannibal got over the Mountain, not far from the Balts of at Swelfa, which the Countreymen do call, The Tower of the Baths, and brought all his Army led the Tower Swelfa, which the Countreymen do call, The Tower of the Baths, and brought all his Army led the Tower Swelfa, which the Countreymen do call, The Tower of the Baths, and brought all his Army led the Tower of the Baths and the Baths all his Army led the Tower of the Baths and the Baths and the Baths all his Army led the Baths and the Baths and the Baths all his Army led the Baths and the Baths and the Baths and the Ba fafe into ALBA: and shortly after, he marched directly as though he would go to ROME, how-Glerenam, a beit he suddenly turned out of the way, and went presently into Apulia. There he took the City in Apalis. City of GLERENUM, a very rich and wealthy Town, where he determined to winter. The Dictator followed him hard, and came and camped by LAURINUM, not far from the CARTHAGI-NIANS Camp. So he being fent for to ROME about weighty Affairs of the State, there was no remedy, but that he must needs depart from thence with all the speed he could : howbeit before he went , he left Marcus Minutius Generall of the Horsemen, his Lieutenant of all the Army, and commanded him in his absence not once to stir nor to meddle with the Enemies. For he was fully bent to follow his determination, which was, not to vex the Enemy, nor to fight with him , though he were provoked unto it. Howbeit Marcin Minutine little regarding the Dictatours commandment, his back was no fooner turned, but he fet upon a company of the Ene-

rest even unto their Camp. The rumour of this Skirmish slew straight to ROME, and there was such great account made of it, that it was esteemed for a Victory; and the common People were so the Army between them, either of them commanded his Army apart, as the Confuls were wont to do before. Marcus Minutius thereupon grew to such a pride and haughty mind, that one day he ventured to give Battell , and made not his companion Fabius of counsell withall : the which Hannivenues to give Datter, and durit feantly have enterprifed. So he led his Army into fuch a place, where the Enemy had compassed them in : infomuch that Hannibal slew them at his pleasure, without any hope left them to escape, if Fabins had not come in time (as he did) to aid them. rather respecting the honour of his Countrey, then remembring the private injury he had received. For he coming fresh with his Army to the Battell , made Hannibal asraid , that the ROMAN Legions had liberty to retire with fafety. Whereby Fabius wan great Fame for his wildom and valiantnels, both of his own Souldiers, as also of the Enemies themselves. For it was reported that Hannibal (hould fay (returning into his Camp) That in this Battell he had overcome M. Minnting, but withall, that he was also overcome by Fabius. And Minutius himself also consessing Fabius wildom, and confidering that (according to Hestodus saying) it was good reason to obey a better manthen himself: he came with all his Army unto Fabius. Camp, and renouncing his Authority. came and humbly faluted Fabius as his Father, and all that day there was great joy, and rejoycing among the Souldiers. So both the Armies being placed in Garifon for the Winter time, after great among the Soundities.

Contention about it, at length there were two new Confuls created, L. Paulus Amylius, and C. Te- L. Paulus A. rentint Varro, one that of a mean man (through the favour of the common People) was brought myling, and C. tobe Confull. So they had Liberty and Committion to leavy a greater Army then the Generals be- Terenius Varforethem had done. Whereby the Legions were newly supplied, and also others added unto them, 10, Consuls. more then were before. Now when the Confuls were come into the Army, as they were of feverall The difference more then were before. Now when the Contins were come into the Ariny, as they were of reverain betwein L.Pandiffortions, fo did they also observe divers manners in their Government. Lucius Paulus, who has a plate and citewas a grave wise man, and one that purposed to follow Fabius counsell and fashions: he did defire remian Varia. todraw out the War in length, and to ftay the Enemy without fighting. Varro on the other fide was a hasty man, and venturous, and defired nothing but to fight. So it chanced, that not long after it was known, to the great coft and danger of the City of ROME, what difference there was betwist the modesty of Amylins, and the fool-hardiness of Varro. For Hannibal being afraid of fome stir and tumult in his Camp for lack of Victuals, he departed from CLERENUM, and going into the warmest place of Apulia, came and camped with all his Army, by a Village called Can-NES. So he was followed with both the Confuls, who came and camped feverally hard by him. but fo near one to another, that there was but the River of Aufide that parted them. This River Aufitius fo (asit is reported) doth alone divide the Mountain of the Appenine, and taketh his head on that lide of the Mountain that lieth to the Sea fide, from whence it runneth to the Sea Adriaticum. Now Lucius Paulus finding that it was impossible for Hannibal being in a strange Countrey to maintain fo great an Army of such sundry Nations together; he was fully bent to protract time, and to avoid Battell, periwading himfelf that it was the right and onely way to overcome him, being as much to the Enemies disadvantage, as also marvellous profitable and beneficiall for the Common-wealth. And fure if C. Terentini Varro, had carried that mind, it had been out of all doubt, that Hannibals Army had been overthrown by the Romans, without ftroak ftriking. Howbeit he had such a light head of his own , and was so fickle minded , that he neither regarded wise counsell, nor Paulus Amylius Authority : but in contrary manner would fall out with him, and also complained before the Souldiers, for that he kept his men pent up and idle, whileft the Enemie did put forth his men to the Field in Battell ray. So when his turn came, that he was ab-Solutely to command the whole Army (for they had both absolute Power by turns) he passed over the River of Aufide by break of day, and gave the Signall of Battell without the privity of his Companion Amylins, who rather followed him against his will then willingly, because he could do no otherwise. So he caused a Scarlet Coat of Arms to be put out very early in the morning, for a Signall of Battell. Hannibal on the other fide being as glad of it as might be poffible, that he had occasion offered him to fight : (considering that the continual delaying of Battell did alter all his purpose) he passed his Army over the River, and had straight put them in very good order. For he had taken great Spoils of his Enemies to furnish himself very bravely. Now the Army of the Roman's stood South-ward, infomuch that the South-wind (which Battell at Canthe men of the Countrey call Vulturnus) blew full in their faces: whereas the Enemies in contrary manner had the vantage of the wind and Sun upon their backs, and their Battell flood in this manner. The AFRICANS were placed in both the Wings, and the GAULS and SPA-NIARDS fet in a Squadron in the middeft. The light Horsemen first began this Skirmish, and after them followed the men of Arms: and because the space betwirt the River and the Footmen was very narrow, fo as they could not well take in any more ground, it was a cruell Fight for the time, though it lasted not long. So, the Horsemen of the ROMAN'S being overthrown the Footmen came with fuch a lufty courage to receive the Charge, that they thought they should not have day enough to fight. Howbeit , the over-earnest desire they had to overcome their Enemies, made their overthrow more miserable, then their joy and good hap was great at the beginning. For the GAULS and SPANIARDS, (who as we have faid before kept the Battell) not being able any longer to withftand the force of the ROMANS, they retired towards the Africans in the Wings. The ROMANS perceiving that , ran upon the Enemies with all the fury they could, and had them in chase and fought with them, till they were gotten in the middeft of them. Then the CARTHAGINIANS that were in both Wings,

Two Dictators joyfull of it, that they straight made the Power of the Lieucenant equall with the Dictator Fabius, together, never the which was never heard of before, Fabius patiently bearing this extream injury with a noble heard of before, courage, having no way deferved it, he returned again into the Camp. Thus there were two came and compaffed them in before they were aware. Moreover, there were five hundred of the NUMIDIAN Horsemen, that colourably sted unto the Consuls, who received them very courteoully, and placed them in the Rear-Ward of the Army. They feeing their time, shewed behind the Enemies, and did suddenly give them charge. Then the Army of the ROMANS was unterly overthrown; and Hannibal obtained Victory. Livie writeth, that there were flain in this Batbirst tatting their source filty tell source thousand Footmen, and above two thousand seven hundred Horsemen. Polybius faith, thouland flain, that there were many more flain. Well, letting this matter pass, it is certain that the ROMANS had and fourceen never greater loss, neither in the first War with AFRICK, nor in the second by the Car-THAGINIA'NS, as this overthrow that was given at CANNES. For there was flain the Confull Paulus Amylius himself, a man undoubtedly deferving great praise, and that served his Countree and Common-wealth even to the hour of death: (n. Servilius (Confull the year before) was also flain there, and many other that had been Confuls, Prætors, and others of fuch like Dignity, Captains, Chieftains, and many other Senatours and honest Citizens, and that such a number of them, that the very cruelty it felf of the Enemy was fatisfied. The Confull Terenium Varro, who Great Haugh-ter at the Bat- was the onely Author of all this War and flaughter, feeing the Enemy Victor every way, he fatell of Canners, ved himself by flying. And Tutsdamus a Chiestain of a Band, coming through his Enemies with a good company of his men, he came unto CANUSIUM. Thither came also about ten thousand men, that had escaped from their Enemies, as out of a dangerous storm: by whose consent, the charge of the whole Army was given unto Appim Pulcher, and also unto Cornelim Scipio, who afterwards The conftancy did end this War. Thus was the end of the Battell fought by CANNES. News flew straight to of the Roman ROME of this overthrow, the which though they juftly filled all the City with forrow and calamity, in extreamity. Yet the Senate and People of ROME kept always their countenance and greatness, even in this extream mifery. Infomuch they had not oncly good hope to keep their City fafe, but furthermore they leavied a new Army, and made young men to bear Armour, and yet left not SICILE and SPAIN unprovided in the mean time : fo that they made the World to wonder at them , to confider these things, how they could in fo great calamity and trouble have so noble hearts, and such wise counsell. But to let pass the former overthrows, and great losses they sustained at TICINUM, at Inc Admiant TREBIA, and at the Lake of THRACIMENE: what Nation or People could have born this lift Battels to Han- Plague, whereby the whole Force and Power of the ROMANS was in manner utterly destroyed and nibal at Tici- overthrown? and yet the People of Rome to held it out, and that with fo great wildom and counnan, Trebis, fell, that they neither lacked Manhood nor Magnanimity. Befides, to help them the more, Hand Training and Training and Training and Albasians and Companyon triffing time in taking his lefture and refreshing his Army: he saveshed nibal being Conquerour, trifling time in taking his leifure, and refreshing his Army; he gaveine ROMANS leisure that were overcome to take breath again, and to restore themselves. For doubtlefs, if Hamibal being Conquerour, had immediatly after the Victory obtained, brought his Army directly to ROME, furely the ROMAN'S had been utterly undone, or at the leaft had been compelled to have put all in venture. So it is reported, that Hamibal oftentimes afterwards repented him-felf he followed not his Victory, complaining openly, that he rather followed their counfell which wished him to let his Souldiers rest, then Maharbals advice, Generall of his Horsemen, who would have had him gone straight to ROME, and so have ended all this War. But he seeing Hannibals Manarbil, Generall of Har., told him (as it is reported) this that is now common in every mans mouth: Harmibal, thou knoweft how to overcome, but thou knowest not how to use Victory. But what? all things are not (as Neftor faith in Homer) given to men all together. For fome had no skill to overcome, others knew not how to follow their Victory, and some also could not keep that they had won. Pyribus King of the EPIROTES that made War with the ROMANS, was one of the famoulest Captains that ever was : yet as men write of him, though he was marvellous fortunate to conquer Realms, he could never keep them. Even fo in like manner, fome Captains have been indued with excellent vertues, and yet notwithstanding have been insufficient in Martiall Affairs, deserving praise in a Captain, as we may read in divers Hiftories. Now after this Battell fought by CANNES, the Attellanians, the Calatinians, the Samnites, after them also the Bruti-ANS, LUCANIANS, and divers other Nations and People of ITALY, carried away with the fame of this great Victory: they all came and yeelded to Hannibal. And the City of CAPUA alfo (which Hannibal was defirous to have won long before) forfaking their old Friends and Confederates, made new League and friendship with Hannibal: the which wan him great estimation with other Nations, For at that time the City of CAPUA was very populous and of great power, and the chiefest City of estimation of all IT ALY NEXT to ROME. Now to tell you in few words what is reported of CAPUA, it is certain that it was a Colony of the Thuscans, which was first called Vulturunum, and after that Capua, by the name of their Governour called Capius; or otherwise (as it is most likely) because of the Fields round about it : for on every side of it, there are goodly pleasant Fields, full of all kinds of fruits growing on the Earth, called in GREEK, Kepi. Furthermore, all the Countrey is confined round about with famous Nations. Towards the Sea there dwell the Suesa NIANS, the CUMANIANS, and the NEAPOLITANS. On firm Land also towards the North, are the CALENTINIANS and the CALENIANS. On the East and Southfide, the DUNIANS and the NOLIANS. Furthermore, the place is of a strong situation, and on the one side is compassed in with the Sea, and on the other fide with great high Mountains. Now the CAMPANIANS flourished marvellously at that time; and therefore feeing the ROMANS in manner utterly undoneby the Battell they had loft at CANNES, quickly took part with the stronger, as it commonly falleth out : and furthermore befides that they made League with Hannibal , they received him into their

City with great triumph, hoping that the War being ended, they should be the chiefest and wealthieft of all ITALY. But mark how men are commonly deceived in their expectation. Now when Hainibal came into the City of Capua, there was a World of People that went to fee him, for the great fame they heard of him. For there was no other talk, but of his happy Victories he had won of the Enemy. So being come into the City, they brought him unto Pacuvins House, his very familiar friend, who was a man of great Wealth and Authority, as any among all the CAMPANI-ANS. Then he made him a notable Banquet, to the which no Citizens were bidden, faving onely Inbellius Taurea a from man, and the Son of Pacuvius his Hoft : who through his Fathers means, with much ado, was reconciled to Hannibal, for that Hannibal hated him as he did, because he followed, Decins Magins, who always took the ROMAN'S part. But now let us confider a little I pray you, how great men sometimes unawares are subject to great dangers and missortunes. For this Conspiracy a young man diffembling his reconciliation with Hannibal, watching time and occasion notwithstand- gainst Hanniing to do him some displeasure, in the time of this Feast, while they were making merry he took his bat at Capital. Father afide into a fecret corner of the house, and prayed him together with him, by a great good turn, to redeem the favour and good will again of the ROMANS, the which they had loft through their great wickedness. Then he told him how he was determined to kill Hannibal the Energy of his Countrey, and all ITALY befides. His Father that was a man of great countenance and Authority. was maryelloufly amazed withall, to hear what his Son faid: wherefore imbracing him with tears running down his cheeks, he prayed him to leave off his Sword, and to let his Gueft be fafe in his house. The which his Son in the end yeelded with great ado. Thus Hannibal having before withflood all the force of his Enemies, the Ambushes of the GAULS, and having brought with him also a great Army from the Sea, and the farthest part of SPAIN, through so many great and mighty Nations, he scaped killing very narrowly by the hand of a young man, whilest he was at the Table making merry. The next morning Hannibal had audience in open Senate, where he made great and large promiles, and told them many things, which the CAMPANIANS eafily believed; and therefore flattered themselves, that they should be Lords of all ITALY: howbeit they reckoned beside their Hoft. And to conclude, they did so cowardly submit themselves to Hannibal, that it seemed they had not onely suffered him to come into their City, but that they had also made him their absolute Lord, like men that neither remembred nor regarded their Liberty. And this appeareth plainly by one example I will shew you amongst many. Hannibal willed them to deliver Decius Magius, the head of the Countrey-faction to him. Whereunto the Senate not onely obeyed with all humility. but worst of all, suffered him to be brought bound into the Market-place, in the presence of all the People: who because he would not for lake the ancient League and friendship with the ROMANS. had thewed himfelf a more faithfull Citizen to his Countrey and Common-wealth, then unto the barbarous People. Now whilest these things passed thus in CAPUA, Mago (Hannibals Brother) went to CARTHAGE, to report the news of his happy Victory to his Countreymen, which they had won of the Enemies; and withall, before the Senate to declare the noble Exploits of Arms done by Hannibal. And to prove the words true he spake, he poured out at the coming in of the Senate-house, the Gold Rings which had been taken from the ROMAN Knights: of the which there were (as fome do report) above a bushell full, and as some other do write, above three bushels full and a half. After that, he prayed a new supply for Hannibals Army; which was granted them by the Senate with greater joy then afterwards it was fent. For the CARTHAGINIANS perswaded themselves by the things present, that the War would fall out as fortunate, as the beginning was fair: they thereupon decreed to continue the War, and to aid Hannibals attempts, by leavying of Souldiers. Now no man withstood this new supply to be sent to Hannibal, but Hanno a perpetual Enemy of the BARCINIAN faction. Howbeit the CARTHAGINIANS weighed not his counfell and advice then, though it tended to peace, and was good counfell for them, as oftentimes before he had used the like. So when Hannibal had made League with the CAMPANIANS, he led his Camp before the City of NOLA, hoping they would yeeld of themselves without compulsion. And certainly fo it had come to pass, had not the sudden coming thither of Marcellus the Prætor been. who both kept the People in, pacified the Sedition, and repulfed the Enemy that was coming into the City, by a Salley he made upon him at three feverall Gates, chafing and killing them even to their Camp with great lofs. This is that noble Captain and valiant Souldier Marcellus, who with a noble courage made the World know, that Hannibal was not invincible. Hannibal perceiving that Martellus Vithere was no other way, but to let NOLA alone till another time: he came to ACERRES, and took Gory of Hanand spoiled it without reliftance. Then going on with great power unto CASILINUM, a fit place nibal at the Cito offend the CAPUANS, he went about to win them that lay there in Garison, but when he saw ty of Nola. that neither his fair promifes, nor otherwise his threats could prevail, he left part of his Army to beliegethe City, and bestowed the residue in Garisons before the Winter Season, Howbeit he chose for his chiefest feat and strength the City of CAPUA, which stood very pleasantly, and had plenty of all things. There it was that Hannibals Souldiers being used to lie hard, and easily to away with cold, hunger and thirst, became then of valiant men, rank cowards, of strong men weaklings, and Souldiers marof serviceable and ready men, timorous and effeminate persons, through the daily pleasures they en-red with ease joyed at will. For sweet inticing pleasures do corrupt the strength and courage of the mind, and at Capua. mans disposition unto vertue: moreover they spoil hiswit, and take all good counsell from him, all Pleasure the which things are dangerous for men. And therefore Plato rightly calleth pleasure, the bair of all evils. And doubtless in this case, the pleasures of CAMPANIA did hurt the CARTHAGINIANS, more then otherwise the highest Alpes, and all the Armies of the ROMANS did. For one onely Winter passed over in such pleasure and wantonness, was of such great force to extinguish the vehe-One winters we must passed in the Souldiers, that when they were brought into the Field at the beginning of the Spring, fure they would rightly have faid that they had forgotten all Martiall Difcipline. Thus the Winter being passed over, Hannibal returned again to Castlinum, hoping that the Citizens within would willingly yeeld unto him, after they had abidden fo long a Siege. Howbeit they were bent to abide all extreamity, before they would yeeld to their fo cruell an Enemy, although they

The hard shift lacked Victuals. Wherefore living first by Spealt, or bare Barley, and afterwards with Nurs which of the Caplini- they had received of the ROMANS by the River of Vulturnus : they held it out so long, that ant to live du-Hamibal in the end being angry with the continuance of the Siege, he was content to take the City ring Hamibal upon composition, the which he had refused before. Now this War, in the which the CARTHASSIEGE. Siege. upon composition, the white the activate color fortune, and received no loss worthy of Hamibal good Ginians had always had great Victories and good Fortune, and received no loss worthy of fortune began menory, began at that time to decline, and to fall to great change and alteration. For the League that was made with Philip King of MACEDON, and the new Aid and Supply that was fent from CARTHAGE, and the taking of PETILIA, CONSTANTIA, and of other Cities of the Countrey of the BRUTIANS, kept the CARTHAGINIANS in good hope. On the other fide, the great Victories which the ROMANS had won upon the Enemies of SPAIN and SARDINIA, did greatly incourage them, and gave them also good hope that their Affairs would prosper better and better. They had also chosen three excellent Captains, Fabins Maximus, Sempromius Gracchus, and Marcus Marcellus, a man most worthy of praise for Martiall Discipline; who so wifely governed the Affairs of the State, that Hannibal found he should make War with an Enemy, no Three famous tae Romans, les politick and wife, then hardy and valiant. For first of all, he was driven from the City of Cu-MES, with great flughter of his men, by Sempronius Gracehus, and forced to raife his Siege and shortly after he was overcome by Marcellus, in a Battell he fought at No LA. For there were flam above a thousand ROMANS, and * fix thousand CARTHAGINIANS slain and taken fly-mas,Sempronius Gracchus. The Victories ing. Now it is easily seen what great importance that Battell was of: because Hannibal immedially of the Roman upon it, railed his Siege from Nola, and went into Apulia to winter his Army there. By this against Hanni- means came the ROMANS to recover again , as out of a great fickness, and sent a great Power against the Enemy : and were not content onely to keep their own, but they durft also invade others. So their chiefest intent was , to besiege the City of CAPHA , for the injury they had but Marcellus feet lately received of the CAMPANIANS. For incontinently after the Battell was fought at Can-NES, they forfook the ROMANS, even in their greatest extreamity and milery, and took part thouland of with Hannibal that was Conquerour, forgetting the great pleafures their City had received hold the grains flair time by the ROMANS. On the other fide, the CAMPANIANS knowing they had made a fault, and onely of and one yor five hundred and being afraid of this new Preparation of the ROMANS, they fent to Hamibal into Apulla, to pray him to come and aid their City (being of the number of the Confederates) in their great necessity. Hannibal departed out of Apulla without delay, and came on with great Journeys into Romans. CAMPANIA, and camped by TIPATA over CAPUA, whereby he rather deferred till another time, then prevented the Plague hanging over the CAMPANIANS heads: fo fpoyling the Comtrey round about NAPLES, he began to take conceit of a new hope, that he might take NOLA by Treason. For in Nola, the People and Senate were at variance the one against the other, as they were likewife in divers other Cities of ITALY. The common People desirous of change, savoured Hannibal; and the Noblemen, and men of Authority, took part with the People of ROME. So when Hannibal went to take the City of NOLA, Marcellus met him with his Army in Battell-ray, as he had often done before, and failed not to fight with him, even at the first meeting. There the ROMANS overcame, and drave the Enemy with fuch manhood and readiness, that if the Horsemen which bad taken another way, had come in time, as Marcellus commanded them; no quefion the CARTHAGINIANS had been utterly overthrown. Hamnibal after he had reited his Army into his Camp with great flaughter, he shortly after departed thence, and went into the Countrey of the SALENTINIANS. For certain young TARENTINES that had been taken Priloners in former Battels, where the ROMANS had been overthrown, and that were afterwards delivered free without Ranform : they to shew themselves thankfull, had put Hannibal in hope to deliver him the City of TARENTUM, fo he would bring his Army before the City. Hamaibal inticed by their promises, did what he could to obtain it, because he might have some City upon the Sea in his power , the which he had defired of long time. And indeed , of all the Cities upon the Sea Coaft, there was none fo meet as TARENTUM, to bring aid out of GREECE thither, and also to furnish the Camp with many things that were to be occupied daily. So though this thing was drawn out in length , by the Garifon of the ROMANS that valiantly refifted . yet Hamilia never gave over his Enterprize, untill that Nico and Philamenes, the Authours of the Treaton, had delivered him the City into his hands. The ROMANS kept onely the Caftle, the which is in manner environed with the Sea on three fides; and on the fourth fide, that lay upon the firm Land, it was very strong with Rampiers and Bulwarks. Hannibal perceiving that he could do no good on that fide , because of their great strength : he determined to shut up the mouth of the Haven of Ta-RENTUM, hoping that was the onely way to make the ROMANS yeeld, when their Victuals should be cut from them. Yet the Enterprize seemed very hard, because the Enemies had all the Streights of the Haven in their power, and the Ships also that should befiege the islice of the Haven, were shus up in a narrow little place, and were to be drawn out of the Haven, at the soot of the Castle, to bring them into the next Sea. But when never a man of the TARENTINES could devise how to bring this Enterprise to pass : Hannibal himself perceived that these Ships might be drawn out of the Haven with certain Engines, and then to cart them through the City to the Sea. So having his cunning Workmen in hand with the matter, the Ships within few days after were taken out of the Haven, and carried into the Sea, and then came and shewed before the Bar of the Haven. Thus the City of TARENTUM being won again, after the ROMANS had kept it Tarentum won the space of a hundred years: Hannibal leaving the Caffle belieged both by Sea and Land, he return by Hannibal, ed into Samnium. For the Consuls of the Romans had spoiled and stripped the Campania. ANS that went out to forage, and having brought their Army before CAPUA, they determined (if ANS that without to 10 t fule to fight, they both marched forward, and doubtless to fight, it would have proved a bloudy Battell , had not Semprasine Army severed them ashe did , which came into CAMPANIA under the Conduct of (n. Cornelius, after they had lost Sempronius Gracehus in the Countrey of Luke. For they seeing this Army far off, before they could know who they were, the ROMANS and CAR-THAGINIANS were both afraid, and fo retired into their Camp. Afterwards the Confuls went unto feverall Countries, the one into Luke, and the other towards Cumes, to make Hannihal remove from CAPUA: who went into LUCANIA, and found occasion to fight with M. Centenius. who very fondly and desperately did hazard his Army left him in charge, against a subtill and danger-ous Enemy. The Battell being begun, M. Centenius was slain valiantly fighting, and sew other escaped. After this also there hapned another loss: for Haunibal returning shortly after into Apu-LIA he met with another Army of the ROMANS, the which Fabius the Prætor led , who also entrapped that Army by Ambulhes, and flew the most of them: fo that of twenty thousand men, two thousand scant escaped the edge of the Sword. In the mean time the Consuls perceiving that Hannibal was gone, they came with all their Army une CA PUA, and did befiege it round. This being come to Hannibals ear, he came with his Army into CAMPANIA, in very good order and well appointed : and at his first coming he set upon the Camp of the ROMANS, having first willed the CAMPANIANS at the felf-fame inftant to make a Salley out on them. The ROMAN Confuls at the first tumult of their Enemies, divided the Army between them, and went against them. The CAMPANIANS were eafily driven again into the City: howbeit against Hannibal, the Battell was very bloudy. For if ever he proved himself a valiant Captain or noble Souldier, that day he shewed it. He attempted also to surprize the ROMANS by some Stratagem. For as his men Hannibals Strateger were about to break into the ROMANS Camp, he fent one thither that had the Latine Tongue tagem, excellently well, who cried out by the commandment of the Confuls, that the ROMANS should fave themselves in the next Mountains, considering they had almost lost all their Camp and strength. This cry made on the fudden, had eafily moved them that heard it, if the ROMANS being throughly acquainted with Handbals subtilities, had not found our his deceit. Wherefore one of them incouraging another, they made the Enemy retire, and compelled him in despight of his beard to flie into the Camp. When Hannibal had done what he could by all devife and practife possible, to raise the Siege from CAPUA, and perceiving all would not ferve, being forry for the danger of his Confederates: he then determined to call a Council, the which he had paffed over a long time, having referved it for the last refuge. For he truffed up his Carriage, and marched away with his Army, and as quietly as he could, he paffed over the River of Vultur Nus, and coafting through the Countreys of Vulturnus the the SIDICINIANS, ATIFANIANS, and CASSINIANA he came to Rome with Enligns diplayed, hoping thereby he should make them raise their Siege, being to earnestly been to win CA-FUA. This flying straight to ROME by Curriers, they were to a fraid there, as ROME was never in like fear it flood in then. For they faw their mortall Enemy come to them with Enfigns displaid, whom they had so often proved, almost to the utter destruction of their Empire : and now they saw him present, whom they could not refift being absent, threatning to bring the Senate and People of Rome into Subjection. So all Rome being in fear and tumult, it was ordained that Fulvim Flacem (one of the Confuls lying before CAPUA) should be sent for home. And that the new Confuls Sulpitius Gal-Sulviting Galba, and Corneling Centimalus, should lie in Camp out of the City: and that C. Calpur- ba, Cornelins mini Prator should put a strong Garison into the Capitoll, and also that the Citizens that had born Centimalus, any Office or Dignity, should be appointed by their countenance and Authority to pacific the suddentumults that might happen in the City. So Hannibal marched forward without flaving, till he came to the River of Anienes, and there camped within tweaty four furlongs of ROME; and shortly Anienes ft. after that, he came with two thousand Horse so near unto Rome, that riding from the Gate Collina, unto Hercules Temple, he had leifure to view at his pleasure, the fituation and Walls of fo great a City. Fulvine Flacere feeing that, could not abide it, but straight fent out certain men at Arms of the ROMANS against him: who coming with great fury to give charge upon him as they were commanded, they eafily fent him packing. The next morning Hannibal brought his Army out of Hannibal cothe Camp, and did fer them in Battell-ray, determining to fight presently, if he could allure the E- meth to invade nemy to battell. The ROMANS on the other fide did the like. So both Armies marched one against Rome. the other, with such life and courage, that to see them, they appeared men that seared no danger, so they might obtain the Victory that day. For on the one fide, the CARTHAGINIANS were to fight (in manner) for the Empire of the World : the which they thought depended upon this

Battell, as being the laft they should fight. The ROMAN's in contrary manner, they were to fight for their Countrey, Liberty, and their Goods, to fee whether they could keep them, or that they for their Countrey, Liberty, and their Goods there fell out a thing worthy of memory. For as they nound come into their Emellice hands. So that for the Signall of Battell to give charge, there fell fuch a were ready fet in Battell-ray, tarrying but for the Signall of Battell to give charge, there fell fuch a were reany in in pattern ray, many me on them, that both of them were driven in tright of their teeths wonderfull great shower and storm upon them, that both of them were driven in tright of their teeths wonderfull great inower and nother Fortsagain. The next day following in like manner, unto the to pring park their Army man had been deferred, when they had again both of them fet their men in which it feemed the Battell had been deferred. WHICH IT IEEE THE DATES HAS DESTRUCTED BATTELL THE BAT CARTHACINIANS, as the first: so that it forced them onely to look to fave themselves; and not to think otherwife to fight. Hannibal perceiving this, he turned to his friends and told them, that the first time he thought not to win ROME, and that at the second time the occasion was taken the first time in thought had greatly troubled Hannibal, and that was this. That though he came foncar to ROME, with an Army of Horfemen and Footmen: yet he heard that the ROMANS had fent aid into Spain, and that he had redeemed the Countrey where he had been, at a far greater price then reason required. Wherefore being in a rage withall, he cauled all the Goldsmith Breater price used reason required and Bankers Shops of the Romans Chizens to be fold by the Crier. But afterwards caffing with and painters only of the Action and State of the City of ROME, or elfe being afraid to lack himself, what an hard Enterprize it was to take the City of ROME, or elfe being afraid to lack Nimitelt, what an nard Emeriptize it was to take the City of Royal, of the using arran to lack Victuals (for he had flored himfelf onely but for ten days) he raifed his Camp, and removing thence came unto the holy wood of the goddels Feronia, and rifled the rich Temple there, and afterwards went thence into the Country of the BRUTIANS and LUCANIANS. The CAPUAN Shaving inwent mente into the Commer, or of all hope, they yeelded up their City unto the ROMANS. The telligence thereof, being left out of all hope, they yeelded up their City unto the ROMANS. The temgence thereon, being thus yeelded up, and brought again to the fubjection of the ROMANS, it was of great importance to all the People of ITALY, and withall brought great defire of change. was or great importance to an interaction of the state of whereby he did ftir up the hearts of divers Nations against him. For where before when he was Conquerour, he had often let Priloners go with the Ranform paying, through which liberality he had won the hearts of many men: even so at that present time, his barbarous cruelty made divers Cities (milliking to be subject to the CARTHAGINIANS) to rebell against him, and to take part with the ROMANS. Amongst them was SALAPIA, the which was yeelded up unto the Confull March satapia 2 City Was left there in Garison, were in manner slain every man of them. This is the City where them. where Hannibal fell in fancy with a Gentlewoman, and therefore they greatly reprove his immoderate lust and lafeviousness. Howbeit there are others, that greatly commending the continency of this Captain, fay, that he did never eat lying, and never drank above a pint of wine, neither when he came to make War in ITALY, nor after that he returned into AFRICK. Some there be also that fay, Hamibal was cruell and unconstant, and subject to divers such other vices : howbeit they make no manner of mention of his chaftiry or incontinency. But they report that his Wife was a Spani-ARD, born in Castulo, a good Town: and that the Carthaginians granted her may things, and trufted her very much, because of the great faith and constancy of that Nation. Now Hasmings, and returned net very many, second you) the City of SALAPIA, he found the means to cry quitance, and to make the ROMAN'S lofe more then he had loft. For at the felf-fame time Fulvim Vict-Confull lay besseging of HERDONIA, hoping to win the City without resistance. And because he Rood in no fear of any Enemy round about him (for Hannibal was gone into the Countrey of the BRUTIANS) he kept no Watch, and was altogether negligent in Martiall Affairs, contrary to the nature of the ROMAN Captains.  Immidal being advertifed thereof by Spials, would not lofe fuch a goodly opportunity: and therefore toming into Apulia with his Army ready, he came to haftily upon HERDONIA, that he had almost Rollen upon Fulvim, unprovided in his Camp. Howbeit the ROMANS valiantly received the first Charge with such courage, that they fought it out longer then it was looked for. Notwithstanding in the end, as the ROMAN'S two years before that had been overcome not far from thence, with their Confull Fulvius: even fo likewife under the Conduct of Fusion Vice-this Fulvine Vice-Confull, the ROMANS Legions were utterly overthrown, and their Captain flain , with the most part of his Army. The Consull Marcellus was at that time in the City of SAN-NIIM, who being advertifed of this great overthrow, defired to be even with him: and thought fermedhe came too late to help things past remedy, yet he brought his Army into the Countrey of the Lucanians, whither he understood Hannibal was gone after his Victory, and came and camped directly over against his Enemy, and foon after came to Battell. The which the CARTHAGINI-ANS refused not, but gave such a fierce onlet on either side, that they fought it out till Sun-set, and no man knew who had the better, and fo the night parted them. The next morning the ROMANS shewing again in Field in Battell-ray, made it known that the Enemies were afraid of them. For Hamibal kept his men within the Camp, and the next night following ftole away without any noife, and went into Apulia. Marcellus allo followed him foot by foot, and fought to put all to ha zard by some notable Battell: for he bare himself thus in hand, that of all the ROMAN Captains, there was none matchable with Hannibal but himfelf, either in Counfell, Wit, or Policy, or ele in Martiall Discipline, or Warlike Stratagems. Howbeit the Winter following kept him, that he could not fight any fet-Battell with the Enemy: for after be had made a few light Skirmilhes, because he would not trouble his Souldiers any more in vain, he bestowed them in Garison for the Winter time. At the beginning of the next Spring, procured partly by Fabina Letters (who was one of the new Confuls for that year) and partly also through his own disposition, hebrought out his Garrisons sooner then they were looked for, and came with his Army against Hanhebrought out his Garrifons looner then they were tooken to; and came with my Army againt tran-nikal, who lay at that time at CANBIUM. Now it chanced, that through the nearness of both Divers Con-they Camps, and the good defire they both had to fight, in few days they fought three feverall likits of the tide; The first Battell, when they had fought it out till night, in manner with like hope of both fides, Romans with the control of them had the better: they both of purpose retired into their Hamipal. and that it could not be judged which of them had the better : they both of purpose retired into their Camp again. The second day Hannibal was Conquerour, after he had slain almost two thousand feven hundred Enemies, and put the refidue of the Army to flight. The third day, the ROMANS to recover the shame and dishonour they had lost the day before, they were the first that prayed they might fight, and fo Marcellus led them out to Battell. Hannibal wondering at their valiantnels, faid unto his People, that he dealt with an Enemy that could never be quiet Conquerour, nor conquered. So the Battell was more bloudy and cruell then any that was before : because the Ro-MANS did their best to be revenged of their loss, and the CARTHAGINIANS on the other fide were mad in their mindes, to fee that the vanquished durst provoke the Vanquishers unto Battell. Hamibals words of Mar-In the end the ROMAN'S being sharply reproved, and also perswaded by Marcellus to stick to cellus, it valiantly like men, that the news of their Victory might come to ROME, before the news of their overthrow : they flew in among the prease of their Enemies, and never left fighting, till that after they had thrice broken their Enemies, they made them all flie. At the felf-fame time Fabius Maximus took the City of TARENTUM again, almost after the felf-same fort it was lost. This being reported unto Hannibal: he faid: The ROMANS have also their Hannibal. The next year fol- Marcellus and lowing, Marcellus and Crifpinus were chosen Consuls, who preparing to put themselves in readiness Crifpinus Confor War, they led both the Armies against the Enemy. Hannibal despairing that he was not able to refift them in Battell, he fought all the wits he had to device fome way to intrap them by fubrilty, whom he could not overcome by Battell. So Hannibals head being occupied thus, there was offered him a better occasion to bring this Enterprize to pass, then he looked for. Between both Camps there was a pretty Grove, in the which Hannibal laid certain Bands of the Numidians in Ambulh, to intrap the Enemies passing to and fro. On the other side, the Consuls by consent of them Hannibal all, thought it best to send to view this Grove, and to keep it if need required : lest in leaving it layeth ambush behind them, the Enemies should come, and so be upon their backs afterwards. Now before they for the Romans. removed their Army, both the Confuls went out of their Camp, with a small company of Horsemen with them, to view the fituation of this place : and fo going on very undifcreetly, and worse appointed then became men of their Authority and Place, they unfortunately fell into Hannibals Ambulh. So, when they faw themselves in a moment compassed about on every side with Enemies, that they could not go forward, and were also fought withall behind: they defended themselves the best they could, rather by compulsion, then of any determination they had to fight. So. Marcellus was The death of fain fighting valiantly: and Crispinsus the other Confoll also very fore hurt, who hardly scaped the Marcellus, Enemis hands.

Hannibal being advertised that Marcellus was slain, who was the chiefest man of all the ROMAN Captains, that had most hindered the happy success of his Victories, and had befides troubled him most: he presently went and camped there where the Battell was fought, and when he had found Marcellus body, he gave it honourable Pomp and Funerall. Hereby we may fee how The power of Magnanimity, and excellent Vertues, are effeemed of all men : confidering that the cruell and most Magnanimity. mortall Enemy gave honourable buriall to fo noble and excellent a Captain. The ROMANS in the mean time feeing one of their Confuls dead, and the other Confull very fore hurt, they drew straight to the next Mountains, and camped in a strong place. Howbeit Crifpinus had fent to the next Towns of the Mountains, to advertise them that Marcellus his Companion was dead, and that the Enemy had gotten the Ring he sealed his Letters withall, wherefore he wished them to beware of any Letters written in Marcellus name. Crispinus Messenger came but newly unto SALA-PIA, when Letters were brought also from Hamnbal in the behalf of Marcellus, to tell them that he would be there the next night. The SALAPIANS knowing his craft, they fent his Meffenger away, and carefully looked for Hannibals coming. About the fourth watch of the night, Hannibal came to the City of SALAPIA, who of purpole had put all the ROMAN'S that had fled, in the Vauntguard, because that they speaking the Latine Tongue, might make them believe that Marcellus was there in person. So when the Citizens had suffered six hundred of them to come in, they thut to the Gates, and with their Shot and Darts thrust out the rest of the Army, and then put all them to the Sword they had let into the City. Thus Hannibal being in a marvellous rage he had miffed of this purpole, he removed thence, and went into the Countrey of the BRUTIANS, to aid the LOCRIANS that were belieged by the ROMANS, both by Sea and by Land. After all these Morest Livius, things, at the earnest request of the Senate and People, two new Consuls were created, both famous Consuls. Captains, and valiant Souldiers, Marcus Livius, and Claudius Nero: who having divided the Army betwirt them, went unto their feveral charge and Provinces. Clauding Nero went into the Countrey of the SALENTINIANS, and M. Livins into Gaul, against Hafdrubal BARCINIAN, who was come over the Alpes, and made haste to joyn with his Brother Hannibal, bringing with him a great Army both of Footmen and Horsemen. Now it chanced at the same time, that Hannibal had received great loss by Clandins the Confull. For first of all, he overcame him in the Countrey of the Lucanians, using the like policies and fetches that Hannibal did. Afterwards again, meeting with Hannibal in Apulia, by the City of Venusia, he fought such a lufty Battell with him, that many of his Enemies lay by it in the Field. By reason of the great losses, Hannibal suddenly went to METAPONT, to renew his Army again. So having remained there a few days, he received the Army from Hanno, the which he joyned unto his, and then returned unto VENUSIA. C. Nero lay not far from VENUSIA with his Camp: who having intercepted Letters of his Enemies, he understood by them that Hafdrubal was at hand with his Army. Thereupon he bethought himfelf night and day, what policy he might uleto prevent the joyning of two fo great Armies together as these. So, after he had taken advice of himself, he followed in fight a dangerous determination, but peradventure needshiry, as the time required. For leaving the Camp unto the charge of his Lieutenant, he took part of the Army with him, and making great journeys, came to PISENUM (being the Marches of Ancona) fo that with min, and maxing great journey. There both the Confuls joyned their Forces together, and fetting on the fixth day he came to Sena. There both the Confuls joyned their Forces together, and fetting upon Hafdrubal by the River of Metaurum, they had very good luck at that Battell. For, as it is re-Metaurum 11. upon rasjarunas vy the fifty thousand of the Enemies slain on that day; so that they almost had as Breat an overthrow, as the ROMA NS had received before at the Battell of CANNES. Now C. Nero, after this famous Victory, returning as speedily unto VENUSIA as he went thence, he set up Hafdin. bats head, where the Enemies kept the Warch : and did let certain Prifoners go, to carry newsto Hamibal of this great overthrow. For afterwards it was known, that Hamibal knew nothing yet of Claudius fecret Enterprize, nor of the speedy execution and great slaughter he had made. Whereat fure I can but wonder, that so subtill a Captain as Hannibal, could be deceived by Clandius, considering both their Camps lay so near together : so that he first heard the news of the overthrow of his Brother, and of all his Army, before he understood any thing of the Confuls departure, or heard of his return again to the Camp. Now Hamibal having not onely received a generall, but also a particular great lofs by the death of his Brother, he faid then, he plainly saw the change and alteration of and alteration the CARTHAGINIANS good fortune : and shortly after removed his Camp, and went thence into the Countrey of the BRUTIANS. For he knew that this great overthrow given by the River of Metaurum, was a marvellous incouragement to the ROMANS, and would also be a great log in his way, for the fuccels of this war. This notwithflanding, he gathered together all his Power he had left in ITALY, after fo many great Battels and Conflicts, and fo many Cities taken; and maintained the War with an invincible courage. But the most strangest thing in Hannibal was this, that through his authority and wisdom, he kept all his Army in peace and amity together (being a medley of Spani-ARDS, AFRICANS, GAULS, and of divers other Nations) and never man heard that there was any brawl or tumult among them. Howbeit the ROMANS themselves, after they had won SICILE, SARDINIA, and SPAIN again, they could never utterly overcome him, nor drive him out of I-TALY, before they had fent P. Cornelius Scipio into AFRICK 1 who making War with the Car-THAGINIANS, he brought them to fuch great extremity, that they were driven to fend for Hanmibal home out of ITALY. Hannibal at that time (as we have faid before) was in the Countrey of the BRUTIANS, making War by Inrodes and sudden Invasions, rather then by any fought Battell : faving that once there was a Battell fought in haft betwirt him and the Confull Sempronius, and immediately after he came and fet upon the same Sempronius with all his Army. At this Battell Hamitell Hamibal bal had the Victory: but at the fecond, Sempronia overcame him. Since that time, I can find in no fought in Italy. Greek nor Latine Authour, that Hamibal did any famous act in ITALY worthly memory. For bewas with Soming fent for into Africk by the Carthaginians, he left Italy fixteen years after this which he over AFRICK War was begun, greatly complaining of the Senate of CARTHAGE, and of himfelf allo. came Hamibal. Of the Senate, because that all the time he had been in his Enemies Countrey so long, they had allow Handibal fent ed him fo little Money : and fo feanted him befides with all other things necessary for the Wars. And of himself, because that after he had so often overcome the ROMANS, he had always delayed time after the Victory, and had given the Enemy liberty to gather force again. It is reported also, that warred fisteen before he imbarked and took Sea, he fet up a triumphing Arch or Pillar, by the Temple of Jano years in Italy. Lacinia, in the which were briefly graven his noble Victories, both in the Punick and Greek Tongue. So when he was departed out of ITALY, the wind ferved him to well, that in few days hearrived at LEPTIS, and landing all his Army, he first came to ADRUMENTUM, and afterwards Hansibal de- unto ZAMA. There receiving advertisement how the Affairs of the CARTHAGINIANS prospered, he thought it best to devise some way to end this War. For this cause he sent unto Scipio, to pray him to appoint him fome convenient place where they might both meet, and talk together of matters of great importance. Now it is not certainly known, whether Hamibal did this of his own head, or by commandment of the Senate. Scipio refuled not to come to parley. Wherefore at the day appointed, there met two famous Generals of mighty Nations, in a great Plain toge-Hamiliats and ther, either of them having his Interpreter, to talk together of divers matters touching Peace and Schie's meet- War. For Hannibal was altogether bent to Peace, because he faw the Affairs of the CARTHA GINIANS WAX WORFE and WORFE every day : that they had loft SICILE , SARDINIA , and SPAIN: because the War was brought out of ITALY into AFRICK: because Sphax (2 mighty King) was taken Prifoner of the ROMANS : and also because that their last hope consisted in the Army he had brought into Africk, which was the onely remain and relief of fo long a War as he had made in ITALY : and also because that the CARTHAGINIANS had so small a Power left (both of Strangers, and also of Citizens) that there were scarce men enough to defend the City of CARTHAGE. So he did his best to perswade Scipio with a long Oration he made, rather to agree to Peace, then to resolve of War. Howbeit Scipio that lived in hope to bring this War to a good end, would not feem to give ear to any Peace. Wherefore after they had long debated the matter of either fide, in the end they brake off, and made no Agreement. Shortly after, was this famous Battell stricken by the City of ZAMA, in the which the ROMANS obtained Victory.

For first of all, they made the CARTHAGINIANS Elephants turn upon their own Army, so that they did put all Hannibal's horsemen out of order. And Lalius and Masinissa, who made both Scitio's Victor the Wings, increasing their fear, gave the Horsemen no leasure to gather themselves in order again. It of the Car-Howbeit the Footmen fought it out a long time, and with a marvellous great courage: infomuch that initiate, at that the CARTHAGINIANS (trufting in their former Victory) thought that all the fafety and the Battle of preservation of Africk, was all in their hands, and therefore they layed about them like men. Zama. The ROMANS on the other fide had as great hearts as they, and besides, they stood in the better hope. Howbeit one thing indeed did the ROMAN'S great service to help them to the Victory: and that was, Lalius and Mafiniffa's return from the chafe of the Horsemen; who rushed into the Battle of the Enemy with great fury, and did put them in a marvellous fear. For at their coming, the CARTHAGINIANS hearts were done, and they faw no other remedy for them, but to hope to scape by flying. So it is reported, that there were flain that day, above twenty thousand CARTHA-GINIANS in the Field, and as many more taken Prifoners. Hannibal their General, after he had tarried to fee the end of the Battle, fled with a few of his men out of the great flaughter. Afterwards The flying of when he was fent for to CARTHAGE, to help to fave his Countrey, he perswaded the Senate Hamnibal not to hope any more in Wars, but did counfell them, that fetting all devices apart, they should fend unto Scipio the ROMAN Captain, to make Peace with him upon any condition. When the ten Ambassadors had brought the Capitulation and agreement unto CARTHAGE of the Articles of Peace, it was reported that there was one $Gife_0$, who milliking to hear talk of Peace, made an Oration, and perswaded all he could to renew War against the ROMANS. Wherefore Hamibal could Hannibal perceiving that divers men confirmed his Opinion, and being much offended to fee fuch talk of War, beafts, and men of no understanding, to dare to speak of such matters, in so dangerous a time: he cast himself down headlong, whilest he was yet in his Oration. So when he saw that the Citizens and all the whole Affembly thought this too prefumptuous a part of him, and unmeet altogether for a free City, he himself got up into the Pulpit for Orations, and said: Let no man be offended, if a man that from his youth had been alway out of CARTHAGE, and brought up all his life time in Wars, be ignorant of the Laws and Ordinances of the City. After that he spake so wifely of the Articles of Peace, that the CARTHAGINIANS being immediately moved by the authority of fo great a person, they all agreed to accept the conditions which the vanquisher, and thenecessity of time offered them. The Articles out of doubt were very extream, and fuch as the vanquished are wont to receive with all extremity by the Conquerors. But befides all other things, the CARTHAGINIANS were bound to pay the ROMANS an Annual Tribute, untill a certain time were run out. So when the day came that the first Pension was to be payed to the ROMANS, and that every man grudged when the Subfidy was spoken of: some say, that Hannibal being offended with the vain tears of the CAR-THAGINIANS, he fell a laughing. And when Hafarabal Hadas reproved him because he laughed in fuch a common calamity of all the City, he answered, that it was no laughter nor rejoycing from the heart, but a scorning of their fond tears, that wept when there was less cause (and onely because it touched every private mans purse) then before, when the ROMANS took from the CARTHAGINIANS their Ships, Armour, and Weapons, and their spoils of the great Victories which they had won before, and now gave Laws and Ordinances unto them that were vanquished. I know some Authors write, that Hannibal immediately after he had lost the Battle, fled into Hannibal in his As IA, for that he was afraid they would deliver him into Scipio's hands, that perhaps might demand mifery fled unhim of them. But whether that was done suddenly, or sometime after the Battle was lost at ZAMA, to King Antiit makes no great matter: confidering that all the world knoweth, that when he faw things brought others into Afra to extremity, he presently fled into ASIA unto King Antiochus. So it is most true, that King Antiochus received him with great courtesse, and used him very honourably: insomuch as he made him of counsell with him all in all, both in private and publick Causes. For the Name of Hannibal carried great reputation with all men : besides that, he had a common and mortal hate to the ROMANS, which was a pricking spur still to move War against them. And therefore it seemeth that he came in happy hour into that Countrey, not onely to prick forward the courage of the King against them, but also to set Wars at liberty against the ROMANS. So he told him, that the onely way to make War with the ROMANS, was to go into ITALY to levy ITALIAN Souldiers, by whom onely, that Victorious Countrey of all other Nations might be subdued. He requested of the King a hundred Ships, fixteen thousand Footmen, and a thousand Horsemen onely. With this Small Army he promised to invade ITALY, and that he would marvellously trouble the ITALIANS: whom he knew yet to stand in no small fear of him, for the very found of his Name onely, because of the late Wars he had made there, so fresh yet in memory. Furthermore, he took heart again unto him to renew the Wars of Africk, if the King would license him to send men unto CARTHAGE, to stir up the BARCINIAN faction, whom he knew hated the ROMANS TO death. When he had gotten the King to grant him his request, he called Ariston TYRIAN unto him, a fine subtle fellow, and meet for such a purpose: to whom he made large promises, and perswaded him to go to CARTHAGE to his friends, and to carry them Letters from him. Thus Hannibal being a banished man, and fled out of his Countrey, raised War in all parts against the ROMANS. And furely his counsell had taken good effect, had King Antiochus rather followed his advice, as he did at the first, then the vain perswasions of his fine Courtiers. But envy, a common plague frequenting Princes Courts, bred Hannibal great Enemies. For they being afraid that by his counfells he should grow in great favour with the King (for he was a wife and

And it fo chanced at that time that Publiss mon plague of Villiss, who came Ambassador unto Ephesus, had often conference with Hannibal. Hereupon Princes Courts his privy Enemies took occasion to accuse him, and withall, the King himself became so jealous of it, that from thenceforth he never more called him to counfell. At the felf fame time Scipio African alfo, as some do report, Publim Cornelius Scipio African (who was one of the Ambassadors sceps Aprices and, as some an expension talking familiarly with Hamibal, prayed him amongst other things met with Han- sent unto King Antiochus) talking familiarly with Hamibal, prayed him amongst other things to tell him truly, whom he thought the worthiest Captain of all others. Hannibal answered him. First he thought Alexander King of Macedon the chiefest: next unto him, Pyrrhu, mm. First in mongar s. and thirdly, himself. Then Scipio African imiling, asked him: what wouldeft thou fay Hannibal, if thou hadft overcome me? Truly faid he, then I would be chiefest my self. This answer pleased Scipie marvellous well, because he saw he was neither despised, nor yet brought to be compared with the other, but left alone as peerlefs, by fome fecret flatnor yet trought to be compared with the control of began to lay open his Life unto him from his youth, and bewray the malice he had always born unto the ROMANS: whereby he so fatisfied the King, that he was again received into his grace and favour, which he had almost utterly lost. Thereupon the King was determined to have made him Admirall of his Army by Sea, the which he had put in readincis for ITALY, and alfo to make proof of his great courage and service, whom he knew to be a worthy man, and a mortall Enemy to the ROMANS. But one Thosas, Prince of the ETOLIANS, thwaring this opinion, either for malice, or elfe for that his fancy was fuch: he altered the Kings mind, and clean changed his purpole, the which was a matter of great importance for the War he preceded to make. For he gave countell unto Antiochia, that he should go himself into Greece, and direct his own effairs: and that he should not suffer another to carry away the honour and glory of this War. So King Antiochus shortly after went into Greece, to make War with the Romans, Hamilateoun- Within few days after, when he confulted whether he should make league with the THESS ALIANS, Hamibal's opinion was specially asked: who spake so wisely touching the State of the THESSALL ANS, and the chiefest matter of importance, that they all went with his opinion, and gave their confents unto it. Now his opinion was, that they should not need much to care for the THESS ALIANS, but rather to make all the means they could, to get King Philip of MACEDON to take their part, or else to perswade him to be a Neuter, and to take neither part. Furthermore, he gave counsell to make War with the ROMANS in their own Countrey, and offered himself to aid him the best he could Every man gave good ear to his words; but his opinion was rather commended, then followed Whereford every man marvelled, that fuch a Captain as he, that had fo many years made War with the ROMANS (who had in manner conquered all the World) should then be so light fet by of the King, when it specially stood him upon, to have such a mans belp and counself. For, what Capain living could a man have found more skilfull or politick, or meeter to make War with the ROMANS then him? Howbeit the King made no reckoning of him at the first beginning of this War, but shortly after, distaining all their counsell, he consessed that Hannibal onely saw what was to be done. For after the ROMANS had obtained Victory in the War he made in GREECE, Amischus fled out of EUROPE into EPHESUS, where making merry, and following pleasure, he hoped to live in peace, little thinking the ROMANS would come with an Army into ASIA. Now, these flattering Courtiers fed ftill his humour: a perpetual plague to Kings and Princes, that suffer themfelves to be flattered, and are contented to be deceived, because they give good ear to that that pleafeth them. But Hannibal, who knew the power and ambition of the ROMANS perswaded the King to hope for any thing rather then Peace, and bad him truft to it, that the ROMANS would never flay, till they had proved whether they could enlarge the Dominions of their Empire, into the third part of the world, as they had done in AFRICK, and EUROPE. Antiochus perswaded by the authority of fuch a man, straight commanded Polyxenidas, a very serviceable man, and skilfull in Sea fervice, that he should go meet with the Army of the ROMANS that was coming thither. Then Hamibal made be fent Hannibal into Syria, to levy a great number of Ships together, and afterwards made him and Apollonius (one of his favoured Courtiers) Generals of his Army by Sea : who notwithstand-Antischur Ar- ing that Pelyxenidas was put to the worst by the ROMANS, they went and fet upon the RHODImy by Sca, to ANS, that were Confederates with them. Hannibal in this Battle affailing Eudamus the Captain of the RHODIANS, that led the left Wing, he had already compaffed in the Admirall Galley, and doubtless had obtained the Victory, but that the other Wing came in to refere, after they had followed Apollonius in chafe, and took the Victory from him, that was his own. After this Battleby Sea, which had no great good fuccels, we do not find that Hannibal did any thing worthy of memo-For King Antiochus being overcome, besides other conditions, the ROMANS offered him, they defired that Hannibal (the mottal Enemy of their Countrey) should be delivered unto them. Hannibal foreseeing this long before, he suddenly stole from Antiochus, after this notable Battle that was fought by MAGNESIA, where the Kings Power was overthrown. So, after Hannibal had wandered up and down a long time, he fled at length unto Prustar King of BITHYNIA, for sucto Prints King cour. Now he did not fo much trust to his friendship, but because he sought for the meetest place of Bibbrais. he could come by, as also for the fafeft, the which he most defired : considering that the Ro-MANS had the most part of the Sea and Land in their subjection. Some say, that after King Antischus was overcome, Hannibal went into CRETA unto the GORTYNIANS: and that the rumour ran immediately, he had brought a great Masse of Gold and Silver with him. Wherefore being afraid left the CRETANS should offer him some violence, he devised this shift to scape the danger : he filled earthen Pots with Lead gilt, and fent them into the Temple of Diana, faming that he was marvellous carefull for them, as though all his Treature had been there. On the other fide he had hid all his Gold in Images of Brass, the which he had left carelefly lying on the ground in the house. In the mean time, whill they watched the Temple carefully, that these earthen Pots should not be carried away without their privity, Hannibal hoiled fail, and fled into BITHYNIA. In BITHYNIA there is a Village upon the Sea fide, which the Countreymen call LIBYSSA, of the which by some mens faying, there ran an old Oracle and Prophecy in this fort :

> The Land of Libysfa shall cover under mould. The valiant Corps of Hannibal, when he is dead and cold.

There Hannibal lay, not spending his time idly, but passing it away in exercising of the Mariners, riding of Horses, and training of his Souldiers. Some Authors also do write, that at that time Prusas made War with Eumenes, King of PERGAMUS, who was a Confederate and friend of the ROMANS: and that he made Hannibal his Lieutenant-General of his Army by Sea: who affailing Eumenes with Hannibal King a new found and unknown device, wan the Victory of the Battle by Sea. For before they began to fight, Profiss Geneit is reported that Hannibal had gotten an infinite number of Snakes into earthen. Pots, and when the ral by fee, a-Battle was begun, and they bufily tending their fight: he threw those Pots with Snakes into the Ene- sing of Potsamies Ships, and that by this fearfull and strange device he made them fly. Now whether this was true, mus. or not, the old Chronicles do make no manner of mention, but onely Amylius and Trogue : and there- A strange defore I report my two Authors: So, the news of the diffention betwirt these two Kings, Prusias and vice of Snakes Eumenes being brought to ROME, the Senate sent T. Q. Flaminim Ambassador into AstA, whose put in earthen Name was famous for the noble Victories he had obtained in GREECE: to the end (as I conjecture) thrown into to make peace betwixt these two Kings. Flaminius being come unto King Prustas, he was marvellous- the Enemics ly offended, and forry in his mind to fee Hannibal yet alive (that was the mortalleft Enemy of the Ro- Ships. MANS) after the Conquest of so many Nations, and the facking of so many People: therefore he Time Quinting was very earneftly in hand with King Prassas, to deliver him Hannibal. Hannibal from the first be Ambassador ginning miltrufted King Prufias inconftancy very much, and therefore had digged divers Vaults in his into Alis. house, and made seven several vents to fly out at, if he were suddenly taken. The report of Flaminius coming did encrease his suspition the more, for that he thought him the greatest Enemy he had in ROME: both generally for the hate he bare unto all the ROMANS, as also particularly for the remembrance of his Father Flaminius, that was flain in the Battle fought by the Lake of Thrafymene. So Hannibal being full of care and grief (as it is reported) he found devices to escape, the which stood him to no purpose against such a great power. For when the Kings Guard which was sent to take him, had compassfed his house about, Hannibal thought to fly at their first coming, and to save himself by the secretest Vault he had. But when he found that the place was kept by the Guard, then he determined to rid himfelf out of the ROMAN'S hands, by destroying himself. So some do report, that he was strangled by one of his men, whom he had commanded to help to dispatch him. Others write again, that he had drunk Bulls Blood, and when he had drunk it, died, as Clitarchus, and Stratocles do fallly report of Themisfocles. Howbeit Titus Liviw, that famous Historiographer writeth, that Hannibal called for the Poyfon he had ready for fuch a mischief, and that holding this deadly Drink in his hand, before he drank, he faid, Come on, let us rid the ROMANS of this pain and care, fith their spite and malice is so great, to haften the death of a poor old man, that is half dead already. The ancient ROMANS advettifed Pyrrhus King of the EPIROTES, who came with Enfigns displaied to the very Walls of the City of ROME, that he should look to himself, and beware of poysoning : and these ROMANS now do make a friend forgetting his Kingly State and faithfull promife, vilely to betray his poor Gueft. After he had faid, bitterly curfing King Prufias, he poyloned himfelf, being seventy years old, as some Writers do Hamibal poy teftifie. His Body was buried in a Tomb of Stone by LIBYSSA, on the which were engravening more found himfeli but this: Here live Hamibal. The ROMAN'S being advertifed of his death, every man faid his opinion, as his fancy ferved him. Some greatly blamed T.Q. Flaminius cruelty, who to make himfelf is

But some again on the other side, commended Flaminius for it, and faid, it was a good deed of him, to rid the ROMANS of their mortal Enemy : who though he had a weak Body, yet he lacked no wit, wife counsel, and great experience in Wars to intice King Prusas to make War, and to moleft all Asia, befides new Wars. For at that time, the power of the King of Bi-THY NIA was fo great, that it was not to be lightly regarded. For after that, Mithridates King of the fame BITHYNIA, did marvelloufly moleft the ROMANS both by Sea and by Land, and moreover fought Battles with L. Lucullus, and Cn. Pompey, famous Captains of the ROMANS. And fo the Ro-MAN'S might also be afraid of Prusias, and specially having Hannibal his Captain. So some judge, that T.Q. Flaminius was specially sent Ambassador unto King Prusias, secretly to practise Hannibal's death. Howbeit it is to be supposed, that Q. Flaminius was not so desirous to have Hannibal so saddenly put to death, as he would have been glad otherwise to have brought him again to ROME, that had done fuch mischief to his Countrey : and this had been a great benefit for ROME, and much honour also unto himself. Such was the death of Hannibal the CARTHAGINIAN, a famous man doubt-

So we may eafily judge, of what power and force his Noble-mind, his great Wildom and Courage, and his perfect Skill junge, or what power and totte may concerning, magnetic translation of Martial Diffipline was in all things. For in all the Wars the CARTHAGINTANS had so vehemenly, and with fuch great preparation enterprifed, they never thought themfelves overcome, till Hannibal was overthrown at that great Battle by ZAMA. So it appeareth that all their fittength and skill of Wars began, and also ended with Hannibal their Captain.

THE LIFE OF SCIPIO AFRICAN.

Anno Mundi.

Ant. Chrift.

The Parentage of Scipio. Oblim Scipio a PATRICIAN, of the Family of the Cornelii (who was the first ROMAN Captain against whom Hannibal fought in ITALY) was the Father of Cornelius Scipio afterwards firnamed African, the First : fo called because he had conquered that Nation. The same Scripe, after he had obtained many great Victories in Spain, and done notable sears of Arms, was in the end slain with a wound he had in a Battle against his Enemies, as he was plying and encouraging of his men from place to place, thronging in the greatest danger and sury of the Battle. Shortly after did his Brother

Cn. Scipio also end his life, much after one self manner, and was slain valiantly fighting. So these two Captains besides the same they archieved by their noble deeds, lest behind them great praise of their faithfulnels, modefly, and courage: the which made them not onely withed for of their Souldiers that were then living, but also of all the SPANIARDS befides. Cn. Scipio had a Son called P. C. Affica, one that had been Conful, and had also triumphed: who being but a young man, was thought the meteft man of all the City of ROME to receive Idea the Mother of the gods. This Publiss had two Sons, the fo famous Scipio's: of the which the one was called Affan, because he conquered ASIA: and the other African, because he subdued Africk at that famous Battle of ZAMA, where he overthrew Hannibal and the CARTHAGINIANS, 25 we faid before. Whose Life we purpose now to write, not fo much to make the glory of his Name (fo famous by all the Greek and Latin Authors) the greater by our History, as for that we would make all men know the order of his noble deeds, and morall vertues, to the end that all Princes and noble Captains in reading it, should behold the lively Image of period vertue, which may move an earnest defire in them to follow the example of P. C. Scippo's Life, who from his child-hood gave great hope and flew of a noble nature, and excellent ver-tue, after he followed the inftruction of Martial Discipline, under the Conduct of his Father. He was great commendation of his own Father, and befides, great estimation also of all the Army. Further-dier fare of P. more, he shewed such tokens of a sharp wit and noble courage, that he made him beloved, and al. Cornelina Scipio more, he inewed tuch tokens of a mary an am prefer at the Battle of the Horsemen, where Pub- being but sefo seared of his Enemies. For this Scipio was present at the Battle of the Horsemen, where Pubventeen years line Corneline Scipio the Confull fought with Hannibal, by the River of Thesin: and some Writers old. do affirm, that Cornelius the Father being hurt, was almost taken by the Enemy, had not his Son Scipio faved him, who had then but a little down on his beard, he was fo young. After that alfo, Publia Corne-Scipio faved him, who had then but a little down on his deard, he was to young. And that had all his Stipio ref-at the Bartle that was fought by CANNES, to the great lofs, and in manner unter defirmation of cued his Father the Empire of Rome, when the ten thousand men that fled to CANUSIUM, had all together with from being taone consent referred the Government of the Army unto Appin Pulcher, that had been Ædilis, and ken orthe Encunto Cornelius Scipio, that was yet but very young, the fame Scipio shewed then by his deeds, what mies. noble mind and courage was in him. For when he faw certain young men confult together between themselves to for sake ITALY, he thrust in among them, and drawing out his Sword, made them all Swear they would not forfake their Countrey. These, and such like deeds done by him with a lively courage and noble mind, being then but a young man, wan him such favour with the Ro-MANS, that not respecting his young years, nor their ancient custom, they called him forward, and laid Offices of great charge and Government upon him. Infomuch that when he fued Honours done for the Office of Ædilis before his due time, notwithstanding that the Tribunes of the People were to Scipio, being against his suit, because he was so young a man : yet the People suffered him to be brought from but a young Tribe to Tribe, and fo was prefently chosen Ædilis with the most voices. So after his Father and man. Uncle (both famous and noble Captains) had been flain one after the other in SPAIN, and that the ROMANS were in confultation to appoint some worthy Captain in their room: they could find no man that durft undertake this fo dangerous War, confidering the lofs of two fo great Captains before. Wherefore the whole affembly being called to choose a Vice-Consull, all the other Princes and Peers of the Realm being filent at fo worthy a motion : Scipio onely of all the reft, being but twenty four years old, stood up in the middest of them, and said with a good hope and confidence he would willingly take the charge upon him. He had no fooner offered this promife, but he was presently made Vice-Consull of Spain, with the wonderfull good will and favour of the People, Scipio Vicewho gave him all their voices. Howbeit the Senators afterwards confidering better of the matter, a- Confull at gainst what Captains and Nations, he should make War, they thought it unpossible to young a four and wentum and could perform to weighty a charge. Wherefore mens minds were wonderfully changed a years of age, again on the sudden, as if the Tribes of the People had repented them of their voices and election. Scipio perceiving it called an Affembly presently, and made such an Oration of his age, and Difcipline of Wars, that every man that heard him wondred at him, and the People began again to scivio's great renew the good hope they had of him for the Wars. For he had not onely a noble courage in him, find and being indued with fo many fingular vertues, but he was also a goodly Gentleman, and very comly goodly perform of person, and had besides a pleasant countenance : all which things together, are great means to win him the love and goodwill of every man. Moreover, even in his gesture and behaviour, there was a certain Princely grace. Now the glory of Martiall Discipline being joyned unto those his rare Gifts of mind and nature, it was to be doubted, whether civil Vertues made him more acceptable unto strangers, then wonderfull for his skill in Wars. Furthermore, he had filled the common Peoples hearts with a certain superstitious fear, because he did daily (after he had taken the mans Gown) use to go up to the Capitol, and so into the Church without any company; infomuch that all men began to think that he learned some secret things in the Temple, which others might not know, as they were perswaded long before, that Numa Pompilisis was taught by the Nymph Ageria. Furthermore, it feemeth that some had the like opinion of Scipio, angle by the rythol Oscarder King of Macedon, to wit, that oftentimes there was a sind time they had of Alexander King of Macedon, to wit, that oftentimes there was a Snake feen in his Mothers Chamber. But let these things go. Scipio departing out of Train with Scipios jourten thouland Footmen, and a Fleet of thirty Galleys, every one of them having five Oars to a ney into Spain. bank, he failed into Spain: and in few days arriving at Emporia, he landed his men and marched by land to TARRACON. There he kept a Council, and many Ambassadors of the Cities their Confederates came thither, who being courteoully received, returned to their lodgings with fuch answer as they liked. After this, Scipio being carefully bent to prosecute the War he had taken

SPAIN, against three Captains of the CARTHAGINIANS. Now Scipio being come to this

the War should prosper: and when they saw him, they remembred their old Captains, insomuch that there was never a Souldier could have his fill with looking upon this young man, Howbeit, after he had commended the Souldiers for their noble courage, not despairing for the calamity of their Countrey, he greatly honoured Lucius Martius : to fhew, that who so trusteth in his ward in all things, in riding, in watching, in taking all manner of pains like a Souldier, that he wan The first Soul-

own vertues, need not envy the glory of another man. So Winter being past, he took the old and new Bands out of the Garifons, and first of all determined to go and lay siege unto new Cag-THAGE. For of all the Cities of SPAIN it was the wealthieft, and none more meet to make War both by Sea and Land, then that. Moreover, the Captains of the CARTHAGINIANS had beflowed in this City all their Munition, and greatest Treasure: and less a strong Garison, both in the City, and Caftle. But the Captains themselves were divided in divers Countreys, to the end that they there might keep the whole Region from spoil, least of all looking then, that CARTHAGE thould be belieged. But Scipio having put all in readincls, he came and belieged new CARTHAGE with all his Army both by Sea and Land. This feemed to be a marvellous hard enterprize, and would continue long, both because the City was very strong of it felf, and also for that the men within it were fo couragious, that they did not onely think themselves able to defend the City, but their hearts ferved them also to make fallies out upon the Enemy, and to skirmish with them, even to the very Trenches of the Romans Camp. Howbeit it hapneth often, that what a man cannot obtain by force, he may win by industry. Now Scipio knew, that the Lake or Mear which is not far from the Walls of CARTHAGE, did ebb and flow with the Tide, and that it was paffable by foord on that fide where they might eafiliest come to the Walls : fo, he thinking to embrace this occasion, and that he could not possible meet with a better device to take CARTHAGE: when he faw his time, he fet his menin Battle-ray, and having divided them into feveral Squadrons, gave a more desperate affault upon the City, then he had done before. In the mean time, he chose out a Band of the valiantest men he had, and commanded them to wade over the Lake, and to scale the Walls on that fide, where they within the Town made leaft account of it. So, these Souldiers that were commanded to give this attempt, after they had paffed over the Lake without any let or trouble, they found that part of the Wall without any Watch or Guard, because the greatest fury of the fight, was on the other fide of the City. Therefore they eafily getting up on the Wall, came and assailed the Enemies behind them. The Citizens , and those of the Garison , perceiving they were unawares fallen into that great danger, they immediately for fook the Walls, and feeing themselves charged on every fide, betook them to their Legs, and fled. The ROMANS scipio wan the purfued them fo hotly, that they wan the City, and facked it: where they found a wonderfull City of new great fpoil, and aboundance of all things necessary for War. Scipio greatly prairied his Souldiers and did reward them, for that they had done fo valiant fervice. Howbeit when he should come to give the scaling Crown of the Walls, unto the first man that got up upon the Walls, three were two Souldiers at fuch variance for the matter, that all the Army was in danger of dinfino and mutiny upon that occasion. Thereupon Scipio called his men together, and in open affently told them, that he knew they both got up on the Wall together, and so gave them both a failing Crown: and by this means their tumult was prefently pacified. Afterwards he fent unto all the Cities of SPAIN, the hostages that were found in the City, which were a marvellous number: The great chat, the which wan him great fame for his courtefie and clemency, whereby he allured many Nations to yield themselves unto the ROMANS, and to forsake the CARTHAGINIANS. But one thing above all thereft chiefly encreafed his praife, and wan him great love and good will, as a mirrour and example of all vertue. There was a young Lady taken priloner, that in beauty excelled all the Women in CARTHAGE: whom he carefully caused to be kept and preferved from violence and dishonour. And afterwards when he knew that she was married unto Luceius Prince of the Cel-TIBERIANS, he fent for her Husband, that was a very young man, and delivered her unto him, untouched or dishonoured. Luceiss not forgetting his noble courtesse unto her, did let all his Subjects understand the great bounty, modesty and rare excellency of all kind of Vertues that were in this ROMAN Generall, and shortly after, he returned again to the ROMANS Camp with a great number of Horsemen. The three Captains of the CARTHAGINIANS (Mago, Hajarubal BARCINIAN, and the other Hafdrubal, the Son of Gifgo) knowing that the loss of new Carand Halfarabat THAGE did them great hurt, as well in the impairing of their credit with other ftrange Nations famous Capas also by the conjecture divers made of the Success of this War: they first practiced to diffemble the loss of it, and then in speech to make light of it as much as they could. Scipio having joyned to him divers Nations and Princes of SPAIN, (among the which were the two little Kings, Mandonius and Indibilis, understanding where Hasarbad BARCINIAN lay, he marched towards him with his Army to fight with him, before Mago and the other Hafdrubal came to joyn with him. Haldrubal BARCINIAN By in Camp by the River of Besida, and was very desirous to fight, trufting wholly to his strength and Army: but when he heard that Scipio was at hand, he left the Valley, and got to a hill of pretty firength. The ROMAN Legions followed him, and gave him no respite, but pursued so near, that he came and assaulted his Camp at the first coming. So they sought it out upon the Trenches and Rampires, as if they had been at the affault of a City. The CARTHA-GINIANS trufting to the ftrength of the place, and driven to it of necessity (which maketh cowards most desperate,) they valiantly resisted their Enemies the best they could. The ROMANS in contrary manner, being valiant, and full of good hope, fought it out luftily like men, and the fight was fo much more cruel, for that it was in the fight of their General Scipie, and of all the Army befides : informuch that their valiant fervice there could not be hidden. Therefore they never gave

and entred into divers places into the Enemies Camp, and made them fly. Haldrubal Captain of

For a great number of Spani-ARDS being present, wondering at the great elemency of the Generall of the ROMANS, they could do no less but call him King, to honour and recompence his vertue. But Scipio strake that Scipio called word straight, the which was no common found to the ROMANS ears, and therefore he would by King by the no means allow that Title, which he knew to be hatefull to the Noble men of his Countrey, and also Spaniards. unmeet for the liberty of the ROMANS. He onely prayed the SPANIARDS, that if they liad any mind and defire not to shew themselves unthankfull to him, that then they would be faithfull and loving to the People of Rome. So whilft these things were done by Scipio, the other two Captains of the CARTHAGINIANS, (Mago, and Hafdrubal the Son of Gifgo) after they understood of the overthrow of their men by the River of Befula, made all the speed they could to joyn together: and shortly after came and met with Hafdrubal BARCINIAN, to consult together, and to take order for the War. So after they had laid their heads together, and confidered all things. they concluded thus: that Hafdrubal BARCINIAN should go into ITALY to his Brother Han-Hastrubal lene nies, where the War was greatelt: and that Mago, and the other Hafarabal should remain in Haltanbal fan ibal, where the War was greatelt: and that Mago, and the other Hafarabal should remain in Entityro his Spain, should fend for aid from Carthage, and should not fight with the Romans un-Brother Hamitill all their forceslooked for, were affembled, and so might make a great and puissant Army. Lucius Scipio was fent thither with part of the Army to become in Battle. fiege it: but finding it a very strong situation, and too well manned to take it at the first assault, he and taken prienvironed the Town, and within few days took and facked it. Winter came on apace, and the foner. time of the year made them both to retire into their Garisons, for the Winter. So Scipio having had so good fortune in this War, he went unto TARRACON: Mago, and the other Hasdrubal, the Son of Gifgo, went to the Sea fide. The next Summer, Wars growing more bloody and cruell then before in the lower SPAIN, the ROMANS and CARTHAGINIANS met, and joyned Battle by the River of Befula, and fought fet Battles. After they had fought a long time together, Scipio at length got the Victory, and made the Enemies fly (of the which there were slain a great number in the Field) and giving them no leafure to gather together again, and to make head againft him, he fought with them and followed the chase so hotly, that Hasdrubal and Mago were driven to leave the main Land, and to fly to GADES, after they had loft all their Army. In the Army of the CARTHAGINIANS, there was a young man of a noble courage, and very wife, called Masinissa, who finding means to have secret conference with Syllanus, he was the first man that offered him friendship, either being brought to it through Scipio's liberality, or else because he thought Masinissaction the time was come, that it was the furest way to take part with the ROMANS, which were the eth his friend-Conquerors. It is that Masinisa that afterwards (through the goodness of the Romans) became the great and mighty King of Numidia, and indeed he was divers ways a profitable triend unto the ROMANS. Furthermore the felf fame year (which was the fourteenth of the second War with the Africans) Spain was the first Nation and People of the up-land men dwelling in the heart of the Realm, that was conquered under the happy conduct of the Vice-Confull Scipio : howbeit it was the last Realm that was made a Province long time after, by Augustus Cafar. Now Scipio not contenting himfelf with the great Victories he had obtained, in very short time in SPAIN (for he had an imagination and good hope also to conquer AFRICK) he thought it his best way, to make all the means he could possible, to get Syphan King of the MASESYLIANS, a syphan Kingol friend to the ROMANS. Wherefore after he had felt the Kings mind, perceiving that he was the Majafilians well inclined to make league with the ROMANS, he presently set all his other affairs aside, and sailed into Africk with two Galleys onely, at five Oars to a Bank. At the felf fame time also came Hafdrubal, the Son of Gifgo thither, from GADES: fo that both these valiant and lufty Captains came of purpose to the King envying one the other, to crave the Kings good will, unto their Countrey and Commonwealth. Syphax welcomed them both into his Court, and did use them very honourably and courteoully, and appointed that they should both eat at one Table, and lie in one felf Chamber, because the one should not think his entertainment better then the other. It is reported that Hasdrubal wondering at the magnanimity and great wisdom of Scipio that was prefent, he confidered with himself the great danger the City of CARTHAGE and all AFRICK befides was in, through that mans means: for he faw him yet a young man, quick, and excellent in all manner of great Vertues, and that had continually obtained fuch Victories : and therefore confidering the lufty youth of this Gentleman, he imagined that it was impossible to perswade him to scipio. embrace Peace, rather then War. Besides, he was asraid also that Syphax, moved by the personage and authority of him that was present, would take part with the ROMANS: and indeed his mind gave him rightly, for to it happened. For though Syphax at the first shewed himself indifferent Syphax King of to them both, and had moved talk to end the War betwirt the ROMANS and the CARTHAthe Maschinar GINIANS: yet afterwards when Scipio told him he could conclude no Peace without confent of the maketh leegue Senate of ROME, he rejected Hajdrubal, and inclining to Scipio's request, he made league with the People of Rome. So Scipio being returned again into Spain, himself partly by force, and partis also by L. Martius means, conquered ILITURGIUM CASTULO, and certain other places that refused to yield themselves unto the ROMANS. And to the end nothing should be lacking for all kind of sports and pleasures, after he had so fortunately obtained so many famous Victories: when he was come to new CARTHAGE, he caused the Fencers to prepare themselves to fight with great pomp, where there were many great Estates, not onely to see that pastime, but also they themselves to handle the Weapons in person. But amongst other SPANIARDS of noble Houses, there were two called, Corbin and Orsua, which were at strife together for the Kingdom: but that day they ended their quarrell, the one being flain by the others hand. The fight was very lamentable and grievous to the Beholders: but the death of him that was slain, troubled them much more, for they were both Coufin-Germans. After all this Scipio having his mind still occupied in matters of greater weight and importance, then those which he had already brought to pass. he fell sick. His sickness being carried through all Spain, and as it hapneth often, his disease being reported to be much greater and dangerous then it was indeed: thereupon, not onely the Nations of Spain began to rile in hope of change, but the Army it felf allo of the Romans, the which he had left at Sucro.

First of all, Martial Discipline was corrupted through the absence of the General. Afterwards also, the report of his fickness, and danger of his life being spread a-The rebellion broad in the Army, raifed such a rebellion among them, that some of them little regarding the of the Roman authority and commandment of the head Captains of the Bands, they drave them away, and chose two mean Souldiers for their Captains; who presumptuously took upon them the Name given unto them by men of no authority, and yet more arrogancy, made the bundles of Rods and Axes to be carried before them. Such folly doth fury and vain ambition oftentimes work in mens minds. On the other fide, the SPANIARDS flept not, and specially Mandonius and Indivitive Mandonius, In- who afpiring to the Kingdom of SPAIN, came to Scipio when he was Conquerour, after he had dibitis, two taken new CARTHAGE. But afterwards being offended to fee the power of the RONANS increase daily, they fought occasion to make some alteration. So after they had heard, not onely of Scipio's fickness, but also how he was at deaths door, and did believe it: they presently levyed an Army, and went and made War with the Swessitans which were confederates of the Ro-MANS. But Scipio being recovered again of his fickness, like as upon the falle rumour of his death every man began to rife: even so after the truth was known indeed of his recovery, they were all put down again, and not a man of them durft proceed any further in their rebellion. Scipio being more skilfull in Martial Discipline, then acquainted with sedition and rebellion, although he was mar-Scipio's wildow welloully offended with the Souldiers that had committed this folly; yet in the end, left following his fuppielling his anger, men should have thought him to have exceeded all bounds of reason in punishing of them, he referred all unto the Confull. The most part of them gave advice, that the Authours of the rebellion should be punished, and all the reft pardoned: for by this means, said they, the punishment shall light upon a few that have deferved it, and all the rest shall take example by them. Scipio widom in pe- followed that advice, and presently sent for all the seditious Bands, to come to new CARTHAGE to receive their pay. The Souldiers obeyed his commandment, some of them making their fault oftenders, Scipios care of less then it was, as men do often flatter themselves; others also trusting to the Captains clemency, as knowing him not to be extream in punishment. For Scipio was wont to say, that he had rather fave the life of one ROMAN Citizen, then to kill a thouland Enemies. This rumour ran alfo, that Scipio had another Army ready, the which he looked for to joyn with them, and then to fer upon the Kings (Mandonius and Indivitus) who made War with the Swessitans. These Souldiers departing from Sucro, with good hope to obtain pardon, came unto CARTHAGE. Howbeit the next day after they were come into the Town, they were brought into the Market-place where their Armour and Weapons being taken from them, they were environed with all the Legions Army. Then the ROMAN Generall fitting in place of judgement, shewed himself before all the company in as good health and good disposition of body, as ever he was in all his youth. Thenhe made a tharp and bitter Oration, full of grievous complaints: infomuch as there was not one of all the Souldiers that were unarmed, that durft cast up their eyes, or look their Generall in the face, they were so ashamed. For their consciences did accuse them for the fault they had committed, and the fear of death did take their wits and fences from them, and the prefence of their gracious Captain, made them blush as well that were innocent, as the parties that were offendors. Wherefore there Scipio didput was a generall and forrowfull filence of all men. So after he had ended his Oration, he caused the the Authors of chief Authors of this rebellion to be brought forth before the whole Affembly: who after they had been whipped according to the manner, were prefently beheaded, the which was a fearfull and lamentable fight to the beholders. These matters thus pacified, Scipio made all the other Souldiers to be sworn again, and then went and proclaimed War against Mandonius and Indibitis. For they confidering with themselves, how the ROMAN Souldiers that had rebelled in the Camp, were put to death, they were out of hope to obtain any pardon. Therefore they had levied an Army of twenty thousand Footmen and two thousand Horsemen, and came down with them against the ROMANS. Scipio having intelligence thereof, before that the Kings could increase their Army, and that other Nations could rebell : he departed from CARTHAGE, and went with as great speed as he could, to meet with the Enemy. The Kings were camped in a very ftrong place, and trufted fo to their Army, that they were not determined to provoke the Enemy, nor also to refuse the Battle if it were offered them. Howbeit it chanced by the nearness of both Camps, that within few days, they being provoked by the ROMANS, came down and fer their men in Battle-ray, and joyned Battle with Scipio: fo that a good while together, the fight was very bloody and cruell. But at length the SPANIARDS feeing themselves compassed in behind, and being driven to fight in a ring to defend the Enemy on every fide, they were overcome: fo that the third part of them scarcely faved themselves by flying. Mandonius and Indibitis seeing themselves utterly undone, and that there was no hope nor remedy left, they fent Ambaffadors unto Scipio, humbly to pray him to receive them to mercy, and to pardon them. But Scipio knowing right well how greatly they had offended him, and the ROMANS; yet thinking it more honourable to overcome the Enemy by courtefie and cle- A noble thine mency, then by force : he did pardon them, and onely commanded them to give him Money to pay to overcome his Souldiers. Syllanus, and also speak withhim face to face, whom he judged to be a worthy man, for the famous Synanus, and an intruth Masinissa was not deceived in the opinion he had of the Masinissa comvaliantness and Vertues of Scipio, but found him the felf fame man whom he before had imagined eth unto Scipio him to be in his mind : the which but feldom hapneth fo notwithstanding. For besides the great rare gifts of nature that Scipio had above all others, therewas in him also a certain princely A princely grace and majefty. Furthermore, he was marvellous gentle and courteous unto them that came to majefty in Sci-him, and had an Eloquent Tongue, and a paffing Gift to win every man. He was very grave in pile's personage his gesture and behaviour, and ever wore long hair. Masinissa being come to salute him, when he saw him, he had him in fuch admiration, as it is reported, that he could not cast his eyes off him, nor have his fill of looking on him. So he thanked him marvelloufly for fending his Nephew unto him, and promifed him that his deeds should confirm and witness the friendship agreed upon between them : the which he ever after inviolably kept unto the ROMANS, even to the hour of his death. So all the Nations of Spain became subject to the Empire of Rome, or at the least their Confederates: whereupon those of GADES also following the example of others, came and yielded themselves unto the ROMANS. This is a very ancient Nation, and if we may credit their report of it, as CARTHAGE was in AFRICK, and THEBES in BOEOTIA; fo was GADES up. The Antiquity report of it, as CARTHAGE was in AFRICE, and THEBES in BUGGITA, to was distributed on the Sea, a Colony of the TYRIANS. But because never man vet was fuffered to enter into ROME in Triumph, for any Victories he had obtained, whileft he was onely but Vice-Confull, and not yet been Confull: The Senators thought it not good, and Scipio himfelf also made no great suit for it, because he would not be an occasion, to bring in any new Custom, and to break the old. So when he came into the City, he was afterwards declared Con- Scipio made full, with the great good will and confent of the whole Affembly. It is reported that there never Conful came fuch a world of People to Rome, as were there at that time, not onely for the Affemblies fake, but more to fee Publiss Cornelius Scipio. Wherefore not the ROMANS onely, but all the ftrangers also that were there, all their eyes were upon Scipio, and said both openly and privately:

that they should fend him into Africk, to make War with the Canthaginians, at home in their own Countrey. Scipio also being of the same opinion, said, that he would ask advice of the People, if the Senate would be against such a worthy enterprise. For amongst the Peers and Senators, there were some that vehemently inveighed against that opinion, and amongst the reft, Fabius Maximus specially, a man of great same and authority. Scipio went forward with the matter, and thwarted him, and shewed many reasons that there was no way to overcome the CARTHAGINIANS, and to drive Hannibal out of ITALY, but that onely : and that all other counsells were in vain, and unprofitable. After this matter was long debated in Council, St-

CILE was appointed unto Scipio: and the whole Senate gave him Commillion to go with his Army into Africk, if he thought it meet and profitable for the Commonwealth. The decree of the Senate being published, every mans mind ran of so great enterprises, that they perswaded themfelves Africk was already their own, and had great hope to end this War. Howbeit Scipio faw it a hard matter to make his preparation for this journey, because of the poverty of the Common Treasure, and for lack of young men, the flower and choice of the which was utterly gone, by the former great losses and overthrows Hannibal had given them. Howbeit to fatisfie every mans expectation of him, he made all the possible speed he could, to prepare things necessary for the Wars. So divers People of THUSCAN, and of the UMBRIANS, offered to help him to their best power: fome of them gave him Timber to build his Ships, others holp him with Armour, and others also furnished him with Corn, and all other kind of Victuals, and munition for his Army.

P. C. Scipio

The Ships being built, and all the Army by Sea put in a readiness, in the space of five and forty Scipio prepared days, a thing incredible to many, Scipio departed out of ITALY, and sailed towards SICILE. his Anny and But when he came to take muster of his Army, he specially chose those that had served long time Nay by Sea in the Wars, under the conduct of M. Marcellus, the which were all esteemed for very expert Souldiers. And for the SICILIANS, he partly wan them by courtefie, and partly by compulfion compelled them to give him aid for the War he took in hand, the which he meant to make in AFRICK when the time of the year should serve for it. Among other things, it is reported. that Seipio chose out of divers Cities , three hundred young Gentlemen of the noblest houses of all the faid Province, and commanded them to meet at a certain day appointed, every man with Horse and Armour. They then coming at the day appointed, according to his commandment, the Confull bade them choose whether they would follow him in the Wars of AFRICK, or elfe deliver up their Armour and Horfe to as many other ROMANS as they were in number. So when they all prayed they might be dismissed from the War, Scipio appointed three hundred other young ROMANS in their places, whom he had brought out of ITALY with him unarmed, because he would mount and arm them at the SICILIANS Coast, as indeed it chanced. Afterwards they did him great service in Africk, in many great Battles. Now time was come on for Scipio to put his Army in Garilon for the Winter-time, when he came to Sy. RACUSA, taking order not onely for the preparation of War, but also for the affairs of Sici-LE. There when it was told him by complaint of divers, that there was a great company of I. TALIAN Souldiers in that City, who would not reftore the spoils which they had gotten in the Wars, but kept them still in their hands, notwithstanding that the Senate had enjoyned them by fpecial commandment to make reflitution to the Syracustans: he straight compelled them by proclamation, to accomplish the Senates commandment. Whereby he wan all the Peoples hearts of Sicile, and was reported to be a just and upright Confull. In the mean time he was advertifed by Caim Lalins, that returned out of AFRICK with great spoil, how King Massing was very defirous of his coming thither, and that he inftantly prayed him he would come into Africk, as foon as he could possible, fo it were without the prejudice of the Commonwealth, Moreover, that divers Nations and l'eople of APRICK had the like desire : who hating the Government of the CARTHAGINIANS, defired nothing more then some good occasion to rebell. Now this journey was not deferred through Scipio's fault or negligence, confidering that fuch a Captain could hardly be found that was more carefull and diligent in his charge then he. Howbeit the affairs of SICILE, and the opportunity he had to recover LOCRES again, did hinder him that he could not bring his purpose to pass according to his mind. Furthermore, his Lieutenant Pleminius disorder grieved him much, because that having left him at LOCRES, he fell to all forts of infolency, as to deflower Women, and to spoil the poor Citizens: infomuch that they being marvellously offended with these infinite troubles and villanies offered them, they determined rather to suffer all other things, then to be subject to the Government of so vile and wicked a man. So the Ambassadors of Locres being arrived at Rome, and exhibiting their complaints in open Senate, of the great wrongs and injuries Pleminius did them: the Noble-men took the matter fo griceoully, that they made bitter Decrees, not onely against the same Pleminius, but also against P.C. Scipio himself. Whereupon Scipio's Enemies having gotten matter enough to accuse him, they were then so bold to affirm that he was acquainted with the injuries offered the Locatans, with the licentiousness of Pleminius, and with the rebellions of his Souldiers also: and that helad fuffered all these things more negligently, then became the Office or duty of a Consul. They added thereto moreover, that his Army he had in SICILE was altogether unruly and unferviceable, and regarded not the Ordinances of the Camp: and that the Captain himfelf was careles, and altogether given over to pleasure and idleness. But above all others Fabius Maximus was his heavy Enemy, and so vehement against him in his words, that he exceeded the bounds of all modelly great adversa- and reason, and thought good to call him presently home out of Sicile, and to dismiss him of his charge. This decree was thought of all men very straight and extream. Wherefore, following Quintus Metellus counsell, the Senators appointed ten Ambassadors to go into SICILE, to make diligent inquiry, whether the Acculations objected against Scipio were true : and if they found him in fault, that then they should command him in the Name of the Senate presently to return into ITALY. And on the other fide, if they found that he was unjustly accused, and onely through the procurement of his malicious Enemies and Detracters: then that they should fend him to his Army, and encourage him valiantly to go forward with this War. So when the Ambassadors were asrived in SICILE, after they had made diligent enquiry according to the Articles of their Commillion, they could not find that Scipio was faulty in any thing, faving that he had too lightly passed over the wrongs and injuries Pleminius had done unto the Locatans. For Scipio was very li-Scipio snature. beral in rewarding of his men, and exceeding courteous, and mercifull also in punishing of them. But when they faw his Army, his Ships, and his other Furniture and Munition for War: it is reported that they wondered so much to see the great abundance, and good order taken for all things, that when they returned to Rome, they greatly commended Scipio, and rejecting all the Acculation of his Accufers, they did promife the Senate and People of ROME affured hope of Victory. So when all these home-troubles at ROME were taken away, there chanced other out-ward troubles abroad sing Syphax revoletch from that grieved him much. For the Ambaffadors of King Syphax came and told him, that their Mafter had node a non-leading that the symbol make the symbol of the had made a new league with the CARTHAGINIANS, and was become friend unto Hafarubal, whole

Daughter he had married : and therefore that he wished him if he meant to do his Countrey good. to make no attempt upon Africk, for he was determined to reckon the Carthaginians his friends, and also to set upon them whom the CARTHAGINIANS account their Enemies. Scipio quickly returned the Ambassadors again unto Syphan, because the effect of their coming should not he blown abroad in his Camp: and gave them Letters, in which he praifed King Syphax, that remembring his league and faithfull promife, he should beware he attempted nothing unworthy the Name of a Roman, and Faith of a King. Afterwards calling his men together, he told them that the Ambaffadors of King Syphax were come into Sicile, to complain of his long tarrying, as Mafinissa had done before. Therefore he was to hasten his journey to go into Africk, and thereupon commanded all his Souldiers to put themselves in readiness, and to provide all things necessary for their journey. The Confuls commandment being published through all SICILE, there repaired immediately unto LILYBEA 2 multitude of People, not onely those that were to fail into AFRICK. but of others also that came to see the Fleet and Army of the ROMANS : because they never faw an Army better furnished, nor set out with all things necessary for War, nor better replenished with Souldiers, then that, So Scipio, all things being ready imbarked at LILYBEA with so earnest a desire to pass over the Sea, that neither Oars nor wind did content his mind. Yet he was brought in few days failing, to the Promontory or Mountain called Fair, and there he put all his men on land. The news of his arrivall flying straight to CARTHAGE, all the City was presently in such an uproar, that fuddenly they founded the Alarm, and guarded the Gates and Walls, as appeareth by testimony of some in writing. For from M. Regulus time unto that present day it was almost fifty years space since any ROMAN Captain ever entred AFRICK with force of Arms. And therefore it was no marvell though they were afraid, and grew to uproar. The Name of Scipio did encrease their fear the more, because the CARTHAGINIANS had no Captain matchable with him. Hafdrubal the Son of Gifgo had the Name that time of a lufty Captain, whom they knew had notwithstanding been overcome, and driven out of SPAIN by Scipio. Howbeit putting all the hope and fafety of their Countrey in him, and in King Syphax that mighty King : they never left intreating the one nor perswading the other, to come and help the affairs of Africk, with all the speed they could possible. So, whilest these two were preparing to joyn both their Armies together, Hannibal the Son of Hamilton, being appointed to keep the next Countrey adjoyning to it. came against the ROMANS. Scipio after he had destroyed the Countrey, and enriched his Army with great spoil, he camped by the City of UTICA, to see if it were possible for him to win so noble and wealthy a City, and being besides so commodious for the Wars both by Sea and Land. At the felf fame time Mafiniffa came to the ROMANS Camp, and was inflamed with a vehement The ready and At the felt tame the Many and M quick and valiant of his hand, he sent him to discover the Army of the Enemies, before the CAR- Romans, THAGINIAMS could gather any greater power, and willed him to use all the device and means he could possible to intice Hanno to fight. Masimisa as he was commanded, began to provoke the Enemy, and drawing him out by little and little, he brought him where Scipio lay with all his Legions armed, looking for a good hour to fight. The Army of the Enemies was now wearied, when the ROMANS came to fet upon them with their fresh Army. Hanno at the first onset was overcome Hanno overand flain, with most of his men : and all the rest fled and dispersed themselves here and there, where come and they thought they might best scape. After this Victory, Scipio returning back again to besiege slain, the City of UTICA, the fudden coming of Hafdrubal and King Syphax, made him to leave off his enterprise, for that they brought with them a great Army both of Footmen and Horsemen, and came and camped not far from the ROMANS. Session perceiving that, raised his siege immediately, and came and sortified his Campupon a Hill, from whence he might go and fight with the Enemy, and molest them of UTICA, and also keep his Ships safe that rode at Anchor. Howbeit the time of the year being come, that both Armies were to dispose their men in Garisons for the Winter feafon, he determined to fend unto King Syphax to feel his mind, and to make him leave the friendship of the CARTHAGINIANS if it were possible. For he knew well it was his marriage with Sophonisha, which through her flattering periwasions had brought him to that fury, that he Sophonisha, had not onely for faken the friendship of the ROMANS, but also meant to destroy them, contrary King to his faith and promise: and that if he had once satisfied the heat of his love with her, he thought wine, then he might be called home again. Syphax having understood Scipio's message sent him, he anfwered, that indeed it was time, not onely to leave the league with the CARTHAGINIANS, but also to give up all thought of War: and so promised, that he would be a good mean to make peace. Scipio gave good ear unto it, and caught hold of an excellent fine device. He chofe the valiantest scipio's crast. Souldiers in his Army, apparelled them like flaves, and made them wait upon the Ambaffadors, and gave them inftructions what they should do. These fellows, whilest the Ambassadors and King Syphax were in talk together about the Articles and conditions of peace, and that the confultation held longer then it was wont to do, they went and walked up and down through the Enemies Camp, to fee all the ways and entries into it, according unto Scipio's instructions. After they had done this divers times, they came again to Scipio. Truce was taken for a time, the which being expired, Scipio feemed to make preparation for Wars, (as being out of hope of any Peace)

as he had done before. He gave out this rumour through all the Countrey, to perswade his Enemies that it was true: howbeit having called the Captains and Petty-Captains of his Army together, he made them privy to his intent and enterprife. He told them that both the Enemies Camps lay not far afunder; of the which, the one of them had all their Tents and Cabins of Wood; and the building of the other Camp was all of Reeds, fo that they were both eafie to be burnt. Whereupon having fent for Masinissa and Caim Latins to come unto him, he gave them charge about midnight to give Alarm unto Syphax Camp, and to fet it on fire: and that he himself on the other fide, would fet upon the CARTHAGINIANS Camp. They two obeyed Scipio's commandment, performed his will without delay, and came at the hour appointed them to affail the Numidians Camp, and so did set the houles of Reeds on fire; which took fire in such fort, as the flame was immediately round about the Camp. The Numidians at the first thinking the fire had come by misfortune, ran thither straight unarmed to quench it. But when they found themselves among the Legions of the ROMANS, and that there was nothing but killing down right, feeing themfelves to compaffed in on all fides, they faw their best remedy was to fly. On the other fide also, where Scipio's Army was, the CARTHAGINIANS Camp was almost all burnt, and the Enemis A mayellous put to flight with fuch cruel flaughter, that some Writers affirm, there were flain that night agress flaughter bout forty thouland men, as well CARTHAGINIANS as Numidians. This great overthrow of the Cartha and flaughter being carried to CARTHAGE, did put the Citizens there in fuch a lear and terrour, that some thought best to send for Hamibal out of ITALY, and others gave advice to make peace with Scipio. Howbeit the BARCINIAN faction which was rich and wealthy, and altogether against the Peace-makers, they so prevailed, that they levyed a new power to begin War again. King Syphax and Hashrubal having levied a great multitude of Footmen and Horsemen again, renewed their Army fooner then was looked for, and came again to pitch their Camp directly over against the Enemies. Scipio having understanding of that, would not tarry, but determined to give them Battle, whileft his men were in good heart and willing to fight. So it chanced at the first by the nearness of both their Camps, that there were certain skirmishes: but in the end, the Armies came to joyn Battle, and the ROMANS fought with furth courage and terrour, that at the first onfet they made the Numidians and the Carthaginians fly, and flew the most part of them. Hafdrubal and Syphax (caped, by flying out of the flaughter. Scipio fent Mafinissa and Caim Laliss with the light Horsemen to give them chase. Syphax being come into Num 1D1A, and from thence into his own Realm and Kingdom, he levied an Army in hast of all forts of People, and came to meet with Masinifa and Caim Letius, and was not afraid to give them Battle. But it was a fond part of him, confidering that he was nothing like to strong as his Enemy, neither for number of fighting men, nor yet in likelihood of Souldiers. For neither the Souldiers, nor Captains of his Army were matchable with the Souldiers and Captains of the ROMANS Camp: and therefore king Syphax King of Syphax was eafily overcome by fuch skilfull men, and moreover was himfelf taken in Battle, with mathe Mighlians ny other great Noble-men, whom Mashinista would hardly have looked for : and then they were overcome, and brought unto Scipio. At the first there was a marvellous joy among them, when it was told them the King Syphax should be brought Prisoner unto the Camp: but afterwards when they saw him bound they were all forry to fee him in fuch pitifull state, remembring his former greatness and regal majefty... They called to mind how famous the Name of this King had been but a little before, what wonderfull great wealth he had, and also the power of so great a Realm and Kingdom. Howbeit scippo the ROMAN Confull received him very courteoully, and gently asked him what he meant to change his mind in that fort, and what moved him to make War with the ROMANS. Then the King remembring his former friendship and faithfull promise broken, he boldly told him, that it was the love he bare to his Wife Sophonisha, who onely had procured him to deal fo diffionourably with the ROMANS: howbeit, that he had fo financed for it, as all others might take example by him, and beware how they break their promise. And yet, that this was a great comfort to him in his extream Mafiniffa wan milery to fee that his mortal Enemy Mafiniffa was fo taken with that frenzy and mad humour, wherethe City of with he before was possessed. For after Syphax was overcome and taken, Massis a went into Craculta by the Chief City of the Parks that the chief City of the City of THA, the chief City of the Realm, the which he wan, and found Sophonubs there, with whom with Suphoniabs he fell in fancy: who, after the had finely wrapped him in with her decentual flatteries and kindness, King Sphax

When coinio was informed of perform his promise made, he took her to his Wise and married her. When Scipto was informed of thefe things, it grieved him marvelloully. For it was known to all men, that Syphax was overcome under the conduct, and through the ROMANS means: and therefore all that was belonging to Syphax, was at the disposition of the ROMANS. Wherefore if Massins had without Scipus confent, undertaken to defend Sophonisha's quarrell, then it appeared plainly, he despised the authorty of the Confull, and the majefty of the People of ROME. Furthermore, his filthy luft did aggravate his fault the more, the which feemed fo much more intolerable, by how much the continency of the ROMAN Confull was the greater, the which Mafiniffa faw daily before his eyes, and might have been a pattern and example unto him. For Scipio befides many other proofs and shews of his Ver-

asside, he so sharply reproved him, that he made him know what it was to obey a moderate, and also a severe Captain. Whereupon Masinissa went into his Tent and wept, and could not tell what way he should take: howbeit shortly after, perceiving that it was unpossible for him to keep pro-

So Scipio being offended with Masinista, (though he shewed it not before company) to mife with Sophonisba, which grieved him to the heart : he fent her poyfon, and a meffage mile with approximately and for willingly made her felf away: Furthur-soptomiotapoy-more, the Carthaginians after they had received such wonderfull great losses and o- foned her felf. verthrows, one after another, perceiving that their affairs were brought to fuch a straight through Mass. and extremity, that they were no more to look after the enlarging of their Dominions, but niffa's procureonely to consider which way they might keep their own Countrey; they sent for Hannibal Hannibal sent to come out of ITATY. Who returning with great speed into Africk, before he did for into Italy, any thing else, he thought good first to talk with P. Scipio about peace : either because he to return into was afraid of the good fortune of this young man , or elfe for that he mistrusted he could not Africk. otherwise help his Countrey and Common-wealth, which he saw decaying and like to be destroved. Wherefore a place was appointed : where they might meet according to his defire : where when they were both met, they had long talk together about the ending of this war. In the end Scipio offered Hannibal fuch conditions of peace, that by them it appeared the RO-MANS were not weary of war, and that Scipio himself being a young man, had better hope to obtain victory, then great defire to hearken to peace. So, all hope of peace being fet afide, they brake off their talk, and the next morning two famous and worthy Captains of the most noble Nations that could be , prepared themselves to battell , either to give or take away in short time from their Common-weals, the Seigniory and Empire of all the world. The place where they employed all their force, and where this famous battell was fought, as it is reported, was by the City ZAMA: in the which the ROMANS being The battell at conquerours, did first make the Elephants flie, then the horsemen, and in the end brake so The battell at To a substitute of the footners, that they overthrew all the Army. It is reported, that there pit is forcely into the footners, that there pit is forcely into the footners and taken by the ROMANS above fourty thousand CARTHAGINIANS. Han the Suthaginibal fled out of the fury of the battell, and faved himself, though that day he had shewed nians. himself like a valiant and famous Captain. For at this battell he had set his Army in better The praise of order then ever he had done before, and had strengthened it both with the commodity of the Hannibal. place, and relief beside : and even in the very sury and terrour of the battell he so bestirred himself among his Souldiers, that the enemies themselves did commend and praise him for a noble Captain. After this victory, Scipio meeting with Vormina King Syphax fon, that brought aid to the CARTHAGINIANS, he put him to flight, and came and brought his Army to the Walls and haven of CARTHAGE, thinking (as indeed it fell out) that the CARTHA-GINIANS would fue to him for peace. For, as the CARTHAGINIANS before had been very good fouldiers, and ready to make wars: so were they now become timorous and fainthearted, specially when they saw their Generall Hannibal overcome, in whom they chiefly reposed all their hope and trust, for desence of their Countrey. Wherefore they being (as I have faid) out of heart, fent Ambaffadours unto Scipio, to pray him that according to his accustomed clemency, he would grant them peace. Now was great suit made at ROME, to have the Government of the Province of Africk and one of the new Confuls made hafte to come and make war, with fuch charge and preparation as was meet for his dignity and calling: and therefore Scipio doubting that another should carry away the glory for the ending of So great a war , he was the better contented to yeeld to the CARTHAGINIAN Ambaffadours requests. So the capitulation of the Articles of peace was offered unto the CARTHA-GINIANS, according to the conquerours mind : and befides all other things, the whole Fleet of all their Ships and Gallies (in the which their hope confifted much) were taken from them, For when the whole Fleet was burnt, it was such a lamentable fight unto them all, that there was no other thing but weeping and lamenting through the whole City, as if CAR-Five hundred THAGE had been destroyed and razed to the very ground. For as some do write, there Carthaginian were five hundred. Ships burnt of all forts. These things therefore should make us all beware barn by scripto. of humane frailty, the which we often forget in our prosperity. For they that before perraded themselves to conquer the world, after they had won so many great battels, and victories of the enemie, and in manner conquered all ITALY, and so valiantly besides besieged the City of ROME, were in short time after brought to such milery and extremity, that all their power and force being overcome, they had no more left them but the Walls of CAR-THAGE, and yet they were not fure to keep them, but through the speciall grace and favour of the enemy. After these things were done, Scipio by decree of the Senate, did not onely restore King Masinista to his Realm again, but also adding thereunto the best part of all King Syphax Countrey, they made him one of the mightieft Kings of all Africk: and afterwards he gave honourable gifts unto every man as he had deferved. In fine, after he had fet all the affairs of Africa at good flay, he brought his Army back again in Scipio's return to ITALY: at what time there came to Rome a world of people, to fee fo great and famous a Captain, returning from fuch wonderfull great victories. So he entred into ROME with pomp of triumph, Terintine Culeo following him with a hat on his head, because that Scipio's trithrough his favour and friendship he was taken out of bondage. Polybins writeth, that King for the Cartha-Syphax was led in triumph : howbeit some say he died before Scipio triumphed. Indeed divers ginians. that did triumph, some before him during the wars of the CARTHAGINIANS, and others afterwards in the wars of MACEDONIA and ASIA, they made greater shew of plate, both of gold and filver in their triumph, and led also a great number of prisoners:

wards repented himself that he had taken away the old custome, and brought in a new. At that time there fell out great variance betwith Massinisa and the Carthaginians, touching their borders and confines. Whereupon the Senate fent Scipio thither with two other Commissioners: who after they had heard the cause of their quarrell, they less the matter as ane crany counted of size they found it, and would proceed no further in it. And this they did, because that the Car-THAGINIANS being troubled with civill wars at home, should take upon them no other wars abroad, neither should have leisure to attempt any alteration otherwise. For the ROMANS had great war with King Anisochus, and Hamibal CARTHAGINIAN WS there with him , who ftill fittred up the old enemies against the ROMANS , and practifed to raise up new enemies against them, and in all things to counsell the CARTHAGINIANS 10 cast away the yoke of bondage, which the ROMANS had brought them into under the tide of peace, and to prove the friendfhir of the Kings. Howbeit shortly after, the ROMANS having obtained victory, and driven King Antiochus out of Greece, they intended allo to conquex Asia: and therefore all their hope was in Scipio African, as a man that was born to end wars of great importante. Howbeit Lucius Scipto and Cains Lalius were Confols, and either of them made fuit for the government of ASIA. The matter being confulted upon, the Senate flood doubtfull what judgement they should give, betwire two so famous men. Howbeit , because Lalin was in berter favour with the Senate , and in great estimation: the Senate began to take his part. But when F. Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the elder brother of Lucius Scipio, prayed the Senate that they would not diffuonour his house so, and told them that his brother had great vertues in him, and was belides very wife, and that he himself also would be his Lieutenant : he had no fooner spoken the words, but the Senators received him with great joy, and prefently did put them all out of doubt. So it was ordained in open Senate, that Lucius Scipio should go into Greece to make war with the ÆTOLIANS, and that from thence he should go into ASIA, if he thought good, to make war with King Antiochus: and affo that he should take his brother Scipio AFRICAN with him, because he should go against Hamibal, that was in Anisotons Army. Who can but wonder at the love and naturall affection of Publins Cornelius Scipio AFRICAN, the which he first shewed from his youth unto his father Cornelins, and afterwards also unto his brother Lucius Scipio, confidering the great things he had done? For, notwithstanding he was Africas to his choice Lucius sergio, connucring the great times had some I at a non-triumphed over the Carbrother Lucius that African by name that had overcome Hannibal, that had triumphed over the Carbrother Lucius Thacinians, and excelled all others in praife of Martiall discipline; yet of his own good nature he made himself inseriour to his younger brother, because he might have the honour of obtaining the Government of that Province from his fellow Confull Letius, that was so well beloved , and of great estimation. Lucius Scipie the Confidl brought great bonour to his Countrey by that war, for that he followed the found and faithfull counfell of his brother. For first of all going into GREECE, he took truce for fix moneths with the A-TOLIANS, through the advice of his brother African: who counfelled him, that fetting all things apart, be should straight go into Asia, where the war was rifest. Afterwards also he wan Prafias King of BYTHINIA from Antiochus friendship , who before was wavering up and down , doubtfull which fide to take , and all rhrough his brother A FRICANS means and practile. So the authority of the AFRICAN was very great, and all those that would obtain any thing of the Confull, came first to the AFRICAN to be that mean and interceffor. Now when he came into Asia, Antiachni Ambaffadours, and Hue clides BIZANTIAN, came unto him to offer to make peace, and after they had openly told their mellage, percelving that they could not obtain reasonable conditions of peace, they privately talked with Scipio African, as they were commanded, and practifed the best they could to make him King Antiochus friend. For they told him, that Antiochus would fend his younger fon which he had taken, and furthermore that he would willingly make him his companion in the Government of all his Realm, onely referving the name and title of a King. Howbeit P. Scirio, excelling no less in faithfulness and bounty, then in many other vertues, after he had answered them to all other matters, he told them, that for his fon he would take him for a marvellous friendly gift : and that for a private good turn, he would do the best he could to requite him with the like : Howbeit, that he would counsell the King above all things to leave off thought of war, and to receive The fidelity those offers and conditions of peace which the Senate and people of ROME would offer him. Shortly and love of P: after, Antiochus lent P. Scipio his fon according to his promife: who (as it is reported) had been ta- Scipio to his ken prisoner from the first beginning of the war, as he went from CHALCIDE unto ORICUM: or Countrey. as other writers fay, as he paffed by in a pinnace. Yet fome hold opinion, that he was taken as he went to discover the counsell of the enemies, and that he was then sent again unto his father. Lying sick at the City of ELEA. This great courtefie of King Antiochus was marvellous well thought of by the AFRICAN, and not without cause: for to see his son after he had been away so long, it did greatly lighten his spirits, and diseased body. But P. Scipio to shew some token of a thankfull mind, prayed the Ambassadours that came unto him , greatly to thank King Antiochus for the exceeding pleasure he had done him, to fend him his fon. Alterwards he gave Antiochus advise also, that he should not give battell, till he understood of his return from Elea to the Camp. So Antichus being per-fiwaded by the authority of so worthy a man, he kept close in his Camp for a certain time, and determined to draw the war out at length, hoping in the end that he might come to speak with the Conful , by the AFRICANS means. But afterwards, the Confull camping hard by MAGNESIA, did so vex and provoke the Enemy, that the King came out to battell, and set his men in battel-rav. It is reported that Hannibal himself was present at the battell, being one of the Generals for the King. is reported that Trainmentation.

So Antio Abs being overcome, and his Army difconfitted, perceiving that there was no help in his affairs, he came unto the African (who being newly recovered of his fickness, came to the ing overcome, Camp a little after the field was won (and by his means obtained of the Conful to be contented to accepte th contalk of peace. When Antiochus Ambassadours were come to the Camp, and had humbly craved par- ditions of peace don in behalf of their King, and also prayed that they would give them such conditions of peace. as they best liked of : Scipio AFRICAN with the consent of them all answered them, that it was not the manner of the ROMANS to yeeld to adversity, neither also to be proud in prosperity: and therefore that he now made him the felf fame offer and conditions of peace, which he did before the victory. That the King should not meddle with Europe : that he should surrender up all he had in Asia, from the mountain Taurus unto the River of Tanais: That he should pay tribute twenty years together: that he should also put in such Hostages as the Consul would chuse out: and that specially above all the rest, they should deliver Hannibal CARTHAGINIAN unto the Conful, who was the onely author and procurer of this war. But he, as we have written in his life, perceiving that King Antiochus Army was overthrown both by sea and by land, escaped the ROMANS hands, and went unto Prusias King of BYTHINIA. Antiochus having accepted the offers and conditions of peace, faid, that the ROMANS used him very favourably, to rid him of so great a care, and to Great Kingappoint him so small a Kingdom. So when the mighty King of Asia was overcome, and that so great a war was so easily ended beyond all mens opinion : the Conful L. Scipio returned to ROME, and made his entry into the City, flowing a great and honourable triumph. He also deserveth the surname of the Province and Countrey tobdued by him. So that, as his eldest brother was called AFRICAN, for that he had conquered and Asian, for AFRICK: even fo was Lucius Scipio firnamed ASIAN, for conquering ASIA unto ROME, And his conquett of P. Now at that time, the house calling Centers, and samily of the Scipio's and Corntlians shourished with supreme degree of honour; and the author. Scipio African knowing his innocency, most envied. being called by the magistrate, shewed himself obedient, and came into the Market-place with a bold countenance, and there made an Oration, declaring what things he had done for the benefit and commodity of his Countrey and Common-wealth. The rehearfal of these things did not millike the Hhhh 2 wherent against him, and spared no injurious words, but accused him as though he had indeed been in fault, howbeit upon suspition, rather then of any due proof. The next morning being command-

his friends, he came through the whole aftembly, and went up to the Pulpit for Orations. When he saw that every man kept filence, then he foake in this manner: I remember, my Lords, that on fuch a day as this, I wan that famous victory of Hannibal and the CARTHAGINIANS, and therefore leaving a-fide this contention, I think it good if I go to the Capitol, to give God thanks for the victory. So he departed thence, and all the whole affembly followed him, not onely to the Capitol, but also to all the other Temples of the City, leaving the two Tribunes all alone with their Sergeants. That day was the very last day of the AFRICANS good forume, for the great assembly and multitude of people that waited upon him, and for the great good will they bare him. For from that day forward he determined to get him into the Countrey, far from all ambition, and the company of the people; and forward of his fo great fervice, and fo fun-dry benefits, as he had brought into his Countrey, he received but shame and reproach: or else for that indeed being (as he was) of a noble mind, he thought it more honour willingly to give place to his enemies, then to feek to maintain his greatness by force of Arms. So when the Tribunes

nels: Tiberins Gracebus, one of the Tribunes that was against the African, took his excuse

nourably praifing him, another time also threatning his enemies, that the Senate afterwards thanked him very greatly for it. For they were marvelloully offended for the great injury they did him. Some do write that P. Scipio himfelf, before he went unto LINTERNUM, did with his own hands tear the book his brother had brought unto the Senate, to deliver the account of his charge; and tear the book his prother had prought unto the senate, to deliver the actions of instraine eld to that he did it not for any deceit or pride, but with that felf boldness of mind he aforetime that the did it not for any deceit or pride, but with that felf boldness of mind he aforetime that the treasurers, when he did against the law require the keys of the common treasurer, to supply the present need of the State. Now some there be also that say, it was not the AFRICAN, but Seipio ASIAN that was accused before the Tribunes: and that Seipio AFRICAN was fent in Committion at that time into Thuscan. Who, understanding of his brothers accusation, at his return to ROME, and finding his brother Lucius condemned, and the Sergeants waiting on himto carry him, being bound into prison, he was in such a rage withall, that he refcued his brother by force out of the Sergeants hands, and from the Tribunes of the people. And they report befide, that Tiberius Gracchus one of the Tribunes, complaining first that the authority of the Tribuneship was trode under feet by a private person, he asterwards letting fall all the malice and envy he bare unto the Scipio's, defended their caule, because the Tribunes should rather feem to beover-come by a Tribune, then by a private person. They said moreover, that the self same day the Science support in the Capitol, he perswaded the Aprican to let Tiberius Gracchus marry his young. er daughter. This promife was no fooner made, but Seipio coming home to his houle, told his wife that he had befrowed their daughter: whereupon she being angry, told him again, that he should not have married her without consent of her mother, though he could have bestowed her upon Theiring Gracchus. This answer liked Scipio marvellous well, when he saw that his wife was of his mind, touching the marriage of their daughter. I know it is thought of fome, that it was attributed to Tiberius the son, and to Appin Claudim his father in law. For Polybius, and other ancient writers affirm, that Cornelia, the mother of Caim and Tiberim Gracehi, was married unto Gracehu, after the Africans death. For Scipio African was married unto Amylia the daughter of L. Paulus o Emylisus Conful that was flain at the battle of CANNES. By her he had two daughters, of the which the eldest was married unto P. Cornelius Nasica, and the younger unto Tiberius Gracibus, either beiore or after the death of his father. Now touching his son, there is little mention made of him in writing, that a man may write of certainty to be true. We have spoken of his younger son that was taken by King Antiochin, and afterwards frankly fent unto his father : of whom not withflanding afterwards I find no mention in writing, faving that some say he was afterwards Prator, and that he came to this office by means of Cicereius his fathers Secretary. There appeareth in writing also, that the younger African was adopted by the son of P. Scipio. Ciero in his book initialed Cato Major faith, how weak (faid he) was the fon of P. AFRICAN that adopted thee his son? And in his sixt book also de repub. Aimylius the father exhorteth Scipio his son, so himself witnesseth he faw. Furthermore, by CALETA this Epitaph was graven in a plate of Copperfer in a Marble Tomb.

> The man that vanquisht Hannibal, and conquer'd Carthage Town. And eke increast the Romans both in Empire and renown, Lies here a heap of dust and earth, hid underneath this stone : His deeds, his prowefs, and his life, are altogether gone, Whom neither Europe could withstand, nor Africk in times past, (Behold mans frailty) here he lies in little room at last.

The Epitaph of Scipio African, A CONTRACT OF THE PARTY OF THE

Now touching the time of his death, having made great fearch for it, I have found in certain Greek Authors, that the African lived four and lifty years, and died shortly after. Furthermore he was Scipio African a Noble Captain, and worthy of all commendation for Martial Discipline, and besides excelled in fifty four years other vertue: the which did so delight his mind, that he was wont to say, he was never less idle, then of his death, when he took his ease: neither less solitary, then when he was alone. For sometimes he would withdraw himself out of the Assembly, and from all mens company, and thought himself safe when he was alone. The fame of his noble Deeds was fo great, that wherefoever he went, all forts of people would come and fee him. The common report went, that when he was at LINTER NUM, there came certain Roversunto him, to fee fo famous a man, and to kifs that fo faithful and victorious a hand. For The power of Vertue hath great force and power with all forts of people; because it doth not onely make the good. Vertue. but the evil also to love and honour it.

HANNIBAL with P. SCIPIO AFRICAN.

Ow let us Compare Hannibal and Scipio's Deeds together, as touching their Civil Discipline. First, if we remember their Deeds in Wars, it is manifest, that both of them have been great and famous Captains in War, and that they have not onely been comparable with the Noblest Kings and Princes in their time (being also in that age when Wars flourished most) but with those that were before their time. One thing maketh me wonder at them, that they having great and heavy enemies in their Countrey (who fought to overthrow all their doings and enterprizes) could possibly go through with so great matters, and to obtain such happy and famous Victories, in strange and forraign Wars. Therefore passing over all other matters, what ado had Publius Scipio before he could obtain to be fent into Africk, to make War with the CARTHAGINIANS? Fabius Maximus, and other Noblemen of the City greatly againft it. Again, what enemy had Hannibal of Hanno, who was Prince and head of the contrary faction against him? Now they both having overcome such great troubles at home, did not withstanding bring things to end worthy perpetual memory; not by chance, as it happeneth unto many; but through their industry, great wildom, and counsell. So divers do wonder greatly at Hannibal's cou-follow justice and piety, as his grandfather Seipio AFRICAN had done. And touching the death of P. Scipio African, writers do diversly vary: for some say, that he died and was buried at ROME. And for proof thereof, they do bring forth the monument that was fet up for him by the Divers opinigate Capena, over the which stood three statues or images, two whereof were the images of Publiss ons touching and Lucius Scipio, and the third was of Q. Ennius the Poet. And furely that which Cicero wrote the death of feemeth to confirm it true : our Enniut, faid he, was marvelloully beloved of African the great, Scitio. Statues of the and therefore it is thought that he was buried in Scipio's Tomb. Other authors write also (and furetwo Scipio's Poet, by the gate Capena at ly they agree best with the common report) that Scipio African died at Linternum, and that there he was buried at his own appointment: because his Countrey so unthankfully acknowledg-Scipio African ing his fervice, should do him no honour at his death: and that there they fet him up a Tomb, and died at Limits his flame upon that, the which afterwards was blown down by a tempest of wind, and the which Limits him.

rage and noble mind: who after he had facked the City of SA GUNTUS, came boldly from the fartheft part of the world into ITALY, and brought with him a great Army of Footmen and Horsemen, and came to make War with a great State and Commonwealth, the which his predeceffors always dreaded : and after he had won many Battles, and slain fundry Consuls and Captains of the ROMANS, he came and Camped hard by the City of ROME it felf, and procured strange Kings and far Nations to make War with the ROMANS. He that was able to do fo great things as thefe, men cannot otherwife think of him but that he was a great and valiant Captain. Others also speaking of Scipio, do greatly praife and commend him for the four Chieftains he overcame, and for the four great Armies which he defeated and put to flight in SPAIN, and also for that he overcame, and took that great? King Syphax prisoner. In fine, they come to praise that famous Battle, in the which Scipio overcame Hannibal at ZAMA. For if Fabiss (faid they) were praifed, because he was not overcome by Hannibal, what estimation will they make of the African, who in a pitched Battle overcame that fo famous and dreadfull Captain Hannibal, and also did end so dangerous a War? Besides also that Scipio did always make open War, and commonly fought with the Enemy in plain field : where Hannibal in contrary manner did always use craft and subtility, and was full of stratagems and policy. And therefore all Authors, both Greek and Latine, do count him very fine and fubtle. Furthermore, they greatly commend Hannibal for that he maintained this Army of fo fundry Nations, fo long time in peace, as he had War with the ROMANS: and yet that there was never any mutiny or rebellion in his Camp. On the other fide, they blame him again, because he did not follow his Victory, when he had overcome the ROMANS at that famous Battle of CANNES: and also because he spoiled his souldiers with too much ease, and the pleasures of Can-PANIA and A Pulla, whereby they were fo changed, that they feemed to be other fouldiers then those that had overcome the ROMANS, at the fundry Battles of TREBIA, THRASIMENE, and CANNES. All Writers do reprove these things in Hannibal, but specially his cruelty. For amongst other things, what cruelty was it of him to make a Woman with her Children to come from ARP1 to his Camp, and afterwards to burn them alive? What shall a man say of them whom he cruelly put to death in the Temple of Juno Lacinia, when he departed out of ITALY? For Scipio African on the other fide, if we shall rather credit the best Authors that write, then a number of other detracters and malicious Writers, we may fay, he was a bountifull and temperate Captain, and not onely lively and valiant in fight, but also courteous and mercifull after victory. For oftentimes his enemies proved his valiantness, the vanquished his mercy and clemency, and all other men his faithfulnels. Now therefore, let us tell you what his continence and liberality was, which he shewed in SPAIN unto a young Lady taken prisoner, and unto Luceim Prince of the CELTIBERIANS: doth it not deserve great praise? Now for their private doings, they were both vertuoully brought up, and both of them embraced Learned men. For as it is reported, Hannibal was very familiar with Socillus LACEDEMONIAN, as the AFRICAN was with Emina the Poet. Some fay also, that Hannibal was so well Learned in the Greek Tongue, that he wrote an History in Greek, touching the deeds of Manling Volfo. Now truly I do agree with Cierro, Phornio Peri- that faid in his Book, de Oratore, that Hannibal heard Phornio PERIPATETICIAN in EPHEpateticism read-ing Philosophy tiall laws and ordinances: and that immediately after being asked what he thought of that Philosophy tiall laws and ordinances: and that immediately after being asked what he thought of that Philosophy pher, he should answer in no very persect Greek, but yet in Greek, that he had seen many old doing fools, but that he had never feen a greater doter then Phormio. Furthermore, both of them had an excellent grace in their talk, and Hannibal had a sharp taunting wit in his answers. When King Antiochim on a time prepared to make War with the ROMANS, and had put his Army into the field, not fo well furnished with Armour and Weapon, as with Gold and filver : he asked Han-Homibal's wis nibal if he thought his Army fufficient for the ROMANS, Yea Sir, quoth he, that they be, were the ry answer unto enemies never so coverous. This may truly be said of Hannibal, that he obtained many great wictors answer ries in the Wars, but yet they turned to the destruction of his Countrey. Scipio in contrary manner did preferve his Countrey in fuch fatery, and also did so much encrease the dominions thereof, that as many as shall look into his deferts, they cannot but call Rom B unthankfull, which liked rather that the African (preferver of the City) should go out of Rome, then that they should reprefs the fury and infolency of a few. And for mine own opinion, I cannot think well of that City, that to unthankfully hath fuffered to worthy and innocent a person to be injured: and to would I also have thought it more blame worthy, if the City had been an aider of the injury offered him. In fine, the Senate (as all men do report) gave great thanks unto Tiberisu Gracebus, because he did defend the Scipio's cause: and the common people also following the AFRICAN, when he visited the Temples of ROME, and left the Tribunes alone that accused him, did thereby shew how much they did love and honour the name of the Scipio's. And therefore, if we should judge the Citizens hearts and good wills by those things, men would rather condemn them for cowards to have fuffered fuch outrage, then unthankfull for forgetting his benefits: for there were very few that consented to so wicked a deed, and all of them in manner were very forry for it. Howbeit Scipio, that was a man of great mind, not much regarding the malice of his enemies, was content rather to leave the City, then by Civil Wars to destroy it. For he would not come against his Countrey with Enfigns difplayed, neither would he follicite strange Nations and mighty Kings to come with force and their aid to destroy the City, the which he had beautified with so many spoils and triumphs, as Martim Coriolanm, Alcibiades, and divers others did, by record of ancient ftories.

For we may eafily perceive how carefull he was to preferve the liberty of ROME, because when he was in SPAIN, he refused the title and name of King which was offered him: and for that he was marvellous angry with the people of Rome, because they would have made him perpetual Consul and Dictator: and confidering also that he commanded they should fet up no statue of him, neither in the place of the Affembly, nor in the judgement feat, nor in the Capitol: all which honours afterwards were given by the Citizens unto Cafar, that had overcome Pompey. These were the civil vertues of the A-FRICAN, which were great and true praises of continency. Now therefore, to deliver you the sum and effect of these things, these two so famous Captains are not so much to be compared together in their civil Vertues (in the which Scipio chiefly excelled) as in the Discipline of Wars, and in the glory of their famous Victories. To conclude, their deaths were fomewhat alike : for they both died out of their Countreys, although Scipio was not condemned by his Countrey as Hannibal was, but would by voluntary banishment die out of the City.

O onely like thy felf, the world always Admireth thy great valour, grace and wit: And thinking to have all good pares in it, By having thee, trimmpheth in thy praise.

Riters of Histories report that Cadmus the fon of Agenor having taken sea CUR of PHOENICIA into EUROPE, by commandment of an Oracle he left the Country of THRACIA where he had dwelt, and came into BOEOTIA, where Countrey of Thracia where he had dwelt, and came into Bosotia, where he had great doings against a certain neighbour-peoplecalled Spartans: of the had great doings against a certain neighbour-peoplecalled Spartans: of which the had great doings against a certain neighbour-peoplecalled Spartans: of the had great of the had great member of the had a great number of the had a great number of worthy men of noble race descended from them. Of which some of them were very rich men, and attained to the tipe of royal dignity: as Cress and fonely. Now because they were divided into two principal bouse, it is hard to judge out of which of the two samilies of the Chronians or Echionidats, Polymonis the father of Epomismalas was descended. Some are of opinion that he came out of the bouse of another chief man of the Spartans, called Uleus, from whom descended the divine Epomismals of the Month of the two families of the most noble and ancient house of the nobly descended.

Herrans, but howsever it was, he descended from one of the most part of this noble lineage care. THERAMS, of whom they report this notable thing : that the most part of this noble lineage car-ried upon their body even for a naturall birth-mark from their mothers womb, a Snake : and fo of the Poet Euripides to be true: that the honour of noble houses falleth to decay, if once their goods

fail them. For the poverty whereof some of Epaminondas ancestors made profession of vertue. feemed to be the cause that they were made small account of. Otherwise I cannot allow that the faid Poet spake of, that a noble and vertuous man is no body if he be poor. For one Epaminondas onely throughly confuted this opinion, who norwithstanding he was exceeding poor, obtained nevertheless the chiefest places of honour in the Commonwealth: for he was one of the best learned and most excellent Philosophers of the world, being Plato's follower and familiar, and the most renowned Palymnisfather man of all the GREEKS, as appeareth by the discourse of his life. Now Polymnis had two sons, responses to wit, Caphissa, and Epaminondas, whom he was very carefull to see well brought up and taught all Epuninondas the liberal and honest Sciences, especially Epaminondas, who had the most stayed wir, and best inhisvertuous in clined to vertue, defirous to hearken and to learn, humble, obedient, and wonderfull apt and docible clination in his and according to the discipline of the THEBANS, he learned of one Dionysius to be very skilfull in fong and playing upon inftruments. And as for learning, and in Philosophy chiefly, in happened well for him that he fell into good mens hands by such a mean. When the Colledges and Companies of the Pythagorian Philosophers that were dispersed through the Cities of Ixa-LY, were banished by the faction of the Cylonians: they that kept still together, met in Councill at METAPONT to determine of affairs. But some seditious persons arose against them, set fire on all parts of the house where they were, and burnt them all together, faving Philadaus and Lafis, who being young and lufty, faved themselves through the fire. As for Phillam, he recovered the Countrey of the Lucanians, and kept there with his friends : but Lyfu went further, and got to THEBES, where when he was arrived, Polymnia received bim, and prayed him Lifts a good to be Eparation and Schoolmafter, who was arrived, Feynman received bim, and prayed him thou and to be Eparation and Schoolmafter, who was but a young boy, but lyet of good capacity, and of thou analyte wery great hope. This Philosopher imployed his endeavour to manure this noble and quick wit of Epitaton 18. Epaminondas, and in short time made him ready and perfect in all Science and Vertue: forther it is hard to find a more Wife, Grave, and Vertuous person then he was, of whom it is fit we Eppuinondas stould say somewhat more at large. When he was but fifteen years of age, he gave himself in exercities in the first and the state of the body, as to run, wrettle, play at the weapons, and to practice all panners of arms: and being quickly skifull in all thefe, he then gave himself to his book, being manurally filent, fearfull to fpeak, but never wearied to hear; and to learn. Whereupon Spindswitton in. speaking little ras the TARENTINE having been a long time with him in TREBES, faid, he never spake to any man that knew fo much and spake fo little as Epaminondas. If he fortuned to be in any company where there was talk of Philosophy, or of State matters, he would never from thence fill he take the matter ended that was propounded. Furthermore, he had no great liking of these dark and my-ficial arguments of some, that think to hide vertue in the observing of their words, but he gave himfelf wholly to the true practife thereof: though otherwise he was as pleasant a man to give a fine flent in discourse, ascould be possible to be found, as the disputation betweet him and Theaver, touching poverty and riches doth witness, which worthily deferment to be mentioped here, as in his proper place. Lysis after he had lived a long time in Thebes, died, and was honourably interred by his disciple Epaninondas, who had honoured and entertained him whilest he lived, and at his death omitted no ceremonies requisite at his funerall. Arcesus, one of the chief of the Pythagorian Philosophers that stayed in Sicilia, understanding that Lysis was at Thebes, through age not able to go to him: appointed by his will and testament, that they should bring Lysis alive again into ITALY if it were positible, or at leastwise the rest of his bones, if so it happened he were dead. The Wars that sell out in the interim were a hindrance, that that could not be done fo speedily. But when the ways were open and free, the Pythagorians fent Theanor of their fect to THEBES, where he found Lyfi dead and buried : and so coming to Epaminondas, after falutations and preambles, told him before Polymnis

and Caphifias, that his companions which were very rich, willed him to give Polymnia and his children a good fum of money, in recompence of their courteous entertainment which they had given to Lysis. Whereupon after pleasant excuses made, Epaminondas concluded, that none could be received : and added further that Jason a Captain of the THESSALLEANS thought I had given him a rude and uncivil answer, when he having earnestly entreated me to take a good sum of gold which he gave me, I fent him word that he did me wrong, and began to make War with me : for that he aspiring to make himself a Lord, would corrupt me with money, a plain Citizen of a free Town, and living under the Law. But for thee, Theanor, I commend thy good will, because it is honest and vertuous, and I love it with all my beart : but I tell thee, thou bringest physick to men that be not sick. Admit then that thou hearing we had been in Wars, haddelt brought us Arms to defend us, and then in the same place thou haddest found us quiet, and in good peace and amity with our neighbours: thou woulded not have thought it good to have bestowed these Arms, and left them with those that had no need of them. Even to thou art come to relieve our poverty, as if it were a grief unto us; whereas to the contrary in is an eafte and pleafant thing for to us carry, and we are glad we have it in our house, amongst us; and therefore we need no Arms nor money against that that doth us no hurt at all & But thou shalt sell thy bectaren there, that they do use their goods very bonefely: and also that they have friends here which use their poverty well. And as for Lysis entertainment and burial, he himself hath fully recompened us, having taught us amongst many other goodly things, not to be afraid of poverty, nur to be grieved to fee it amongst us. After Theanor had made some reply touching the good or evil of riches, as that if poverty were not evil of it felf, neither were riches to be had in contempt, and definited No truely, faid Epaminondas: yet confidering with my felf that we have a world of covetous defires of many things, some naturall as they call them, and born with us, bred in our flesh by the lufts pertaining to it: others strangeunto us, grounded upon vain opinions, which taking a fetling and habit in us by tract of time, and long use through evil education, oftentimes do pluck us down, and withdraw our fouls with more force and violence, then those that be natural unto us. For reason, by daily exercise of vertue and practise thereof, is a mean to take many of those things away from us that are born and bred within us : yet this notwithstanding, we must use continuall force and exercise against our concupiscences that are strangers unto us, to quench them in us, and by all possible means to repress and subdue them. Now having made sufficient proof of that, there is also, faid he, an exercise of Justice against greedy covetousness of getting, which is not, to go rob and rifle his neighbours houses in the night, nor to rob men on the high way side, nor if any man betray his friends or his Countrey for money: fuch a one doth not exercise himself against covetousnels, for law possibly, or fear, bridleth this covetous desire to offend any man: but that man that oftentimes willingly abstaineth from just gains, which he may lawfully take, he it is that by continuall exercise keepeth himself far off from unjust and unlawfull taking of money. For it is unpossible that in great pleasures, yea wicked and dangerous, the foul should contain it felf from coveting of them, unless before being oftentimes at his choice to use them, he had not contemned them. And it is not easie to overcome them, nor to resule great riches evil gotten being offered, unless he had long before killed in him this covetous desire of getting, the which besides many other habitudes and actions, is still greedily bent shamefully to gain, pleasing himself in the pursuit of injustice, hardly sparing to wrong another, so he in any thing profit himself. But to a man that disdaineth to receive liberality and gifts of his friends, and resuseth to take prefents offered him by Kings, and that hath rejected the benefits of fortune, putting by all covetous delires of gliftering treasure layed before him: he shall never be assailed or attempted to do that that is unjust, nor his mind shall never be troubled, but will content himself quietly to do any thing that is honest, carrying an upright heart, finding nothing in it but that that is good and commend-

But his life is far more excellent then his discourse: and as touching that, I will yet speak somewhat of it. Diomedon Dyzicenian, at Artaxerxes request, promised to win Epaminondat to take the PERSIANS part. To bring this to pass, he came to THEBES, and brought a great masse of gold with him, and bestowing three thousand crowns, he bribed a young man called Mycithus; whom Epaminondas loved dearly. This young man went to Epaminondas, and acquainted him with the occasion of the other mans coming to THEBES. But Epaminondas straight answered him, Diomedon being present: I have no need of money: if the King wish well to the THEBANS, I am at Epiminonias his commandment without taking one penny: if he have any other meaning, he hath not gold nor would not be filver enough for me: for I will not fell the love I bear to my Countrey for all the gold in the world. won by bribes As for thee that haft now attempted me, not knowing me, haply thinking me to be like thy felf, I weake part pardon thee; but get thee away quickly out of the City, left thou feduce fome other, having failed met. to corrupt me. And for thee Mycuthus, deliver him his crowns again: and if thou doeft it not presently, I will send thee before a Justice. Thereupon Diomedon befought him he would let him go away with safety, and carry that with him he brought thither. Yes marry, said Epaminondas, but it shall not be for thy sake, but for mine honour: being afraid that if thy gold and filver should be taken from thee, some man would accuse me that I had a share in that which I resused to take openly. Then he asked him: Whither wouldest thou I should cause thee to be conveyed? Diomedon said to A-THENS: which was done, and he had a very good convoy with him: and because he should not be troubled by the way betwixt the gates of THEBES, and the haven where he should imbark himself, Epaminondas gave Chabrias the ATHENIAN charge of this man, that he should see him safe at his ways end, and fo he straight returned back again.

Now though he was very poor, yet he would never take any thing of his City or friends, he was so well acquainted with poverty, which he bare more patiently through his study of Philosophy. For on a time having the leading of an Army of the THEBANS into the Countrey of PELOPON-NESUS, he borrowed above five crowns of a Citizen for his expences in his journey. Pelopidas being a man of great wealth, and his exceeding good friend, could not possibly ever make him take any part of his goods, but rather Pelopidas learned of him to love poverty. For Epaminondas taught Fountainendas him to think it an honour to him to go plainly apparelled, to eat moderately, to take pains willingly, his temperance and to make War lustily. But to relieve others, he would make bold to use his friends goods, in apparell and and in such a case their goods were common to him. If any of his Citizens were taken prisoners die with the enemy, or any friend of his had a daughter to be married, and was not able to befrow her: Epaninondae he called his friends together, and feffed every man of them at a certain fum, and afterwards foners, and brought him before them that should have this money, and told him how much every man had be-matried poor flowed upon him, that he might thank them all. But on a time he went far beyond this: for he fent maids. a poor friend of his to a rich Citizen of THEBES, to ask of him fix hundred Crowns, and to tell him that Epaminondas willed him to let him have them. The Citizen being amazed at this demand, went unto Epaminondas to know what he meant to charge him so deeply, to make him disburle these six hundred Crowns unto him. It is, saith he, because this man being an honest man,

Even the like he fpake of his own table, faying, that fuch an ordinary never received treason. On a time being at a feast with his peers and companions, he drank vinegar, And when they asked him what reason he had to do fo, and if it were good for his health? I cannot tell, faith he, but well I wot, it is good to put me in remembrance how I live at home. Now it was not for that his nature milliked fweet meats, that he lived thus frieldly, and did love and embrace poverty, for he was marvellous high and nobly minded: but by his ftraight and unreproveable life, he led, he thought to bridle many infolencies and diforders then reigning amongst the THEBANS, and to reduce them to the former temperance of their anceftors. As upon a time a Cook giving up an account to him and his fellows of their ordinary expences for certain days, he could find tault an account to min and my knows of their values of the discompanions marvelling at it. Tuth, with nothing, but with the quantity of oil that was spent. His companions marvelling at it. Tuth, faith he, it is not the expence that offendeth me, but because they have poured in fo much oil into their bodies. The City of THEBES made an open feast, and they were all of them in their ban-Epaminondas of quets, feafts, and great affemblies one with the other: but Epaminondas to the contrary, be went dry up and down the Town very lad, without being anointed with any oil of perfume, or decked with brave apparell. Some of his familiar friends met him in this effate, and wondering at him, asked him why he walked so alone, and ill apparelled through the City? Because, said he, you might in the mean time fafely give your felves to drink drunk, and make merry, taking thought for nothing. Thus have we spoken enough touching his temperance: and as for his other vertues they are most famous in arms, the which he with great good fortune and happiness managed for the good of his Now his modesty would in no wife suffer him to seek his advancement, but contrariwise he with drew himfelf from Government, onely to give himfelf quietly to the fludy of Philofophy. Howbe-

it it happened that the LACEDAMONIANS On a time prayed aid of the THEBANS, at that time being in league with them, who fent them certain foot-bands. Epaminondas being about five and thirty years of age, armed himfelf, and went with the rest. Then it was that that friendship began betwixt Pelopida; and him, which conftantly continued even to the end. For they being both in battleray, the one by the other, against the ARCADIANS, whom they had in front against them in the plain of MANTINEA, it chanced that one of the points of the battle of the LACEDEMONIANS, in the which they were, retired, and many of them left their ranks: but they being refolute, determining rather to die then to fly, flood to it like men, untill that Pelopidas being hurt in feven place, fell down upon an heap of dead bodies: then Epaminondas though he took him to be but adea man, stepped manfully before him to defend his Body and Arms, and he alone fought against many, resolved to die in the place, rather then to leave Pelopidas among the dead men, until that himself being thrust into the breft with a pike and wounded in the arm with a blow of a sword (ready to give over) by good fortune, and in a happy time, King Agefipolis came on with the other point of the battle : and faved them both. Afterwards the LACEDEMONIANS finely wan the Cafile of THERE Called CADMEA, put in a strong Garison there, and gave the Government of the City unto Archias, Philippus, and Leomidas, authors of all the milchief. Whereupon to avoid their violence, Pelopidas and many others with speed fled and saved themselves, and were banished by found of Trumper. And as for Epaminondas, they faid nothing to him, but let him alone in the City: for he was contemned as a man of no reckoning, because he was so given to his book; and if he should have had any will to have stirred against them, he could have done them no hurt for his poverty. Now whileft Pelopidas and his companions being at ATHENS, had laid a plot to free Practice, There's, Epaminondas making no fhew of any thing, had long before devifed another practice, which was, to lift up the hearts and courage of the young men of THEBES. For when they went out to play and exercise their bodies, he always found a way to make them wreftle with the Lacs-DEMONIANS. Afterwards when he faw the LACEDEMONIANS fiercely throw them and give them shrewd falls, they being the stronger, he rebuked the THEBANS, and rold them, it was a shame for them for want of courage to fuffer the LACEDEMONIANS to set their feet upon their throats, that were not half to ftrong, rough, and boifterous as they were. All this while Pelopida and his followers went on with their complot, and they had fo good fuccess in their purpose, that one night they got privily into the City of THBBE, and met at Charons house, where they were to the number of eight and forty. Epaminondas knew all well enough, and some towards night to king him afide, went about to perswade him to joyn with them in this enterprise, and to take arms with them to fer upon these tyrants: marvelling much, that he would be so backward, the liberty of his Countrey standing upon it. He answered, that he had taken order with his friends and Gorgidas, that they should put themselves in readines upon any occasion; howbeit that he would put none of his Citizens to death, unlefs they were condemned by law: yet if you will make an fent to bloody attempt for delivery of the City, so it be without murther, and shedding the blood of the Citi-Zens, I will help you (faid he) with all my heart. If you will not believe me, but perfevere in your determination, I pray you let me alone, pure and undefiled with the blood of my Citizens, and fo blameles to attend occasion, whereby I may justly take hold of that which may turn to the good of the Commonwealth: for the murther that will be committed, cannot possibly be contained EPAMINONDAS.

within reasonable bound. I do certainly believe that Pherecides and Pelopidas peradventure will specially fet upon the authors of the Tyranny: but Eumolpidas and Samiadas, both cholerick and fierce men, taking the liberty of the night, they will never lay down their Arms, nor put their fwords up into their sheaths, before they have filled all the City with murthers, and slain divers of the chief personages. Moreover, it is very convenient for the people of THEBES, that some be left free, and blamelels of this murther, and guiltless of all that shall be done in this fury of action : for so the people shall least suspect that we give any encouragement to their rising, although to good end. Notwithfranding all this the enterprise was executed, and the Tyranis put to death, the City restored to her The Tyranis ancient liberty, and the Castle of CADMEA rendred up by composition, and Lyfandridas the LA- of The bes slain. CEDEMONIAN, and other commanders within, fuffered to depart, with fafety of their goods and and the City

These were the beginnings of the long Wars of the LACEDEMONIANS against the THE-BANS, with whom the ATHENIANS joyned in league. For Epaminondas, he quietly gave himself to his book : notwithstanding he was put forward by Pammenes , a principal man of THERES, and he began to follow the Wars very hotly, and in divers encounters made great proof of his wisdom, hardiness and valour: insomuch that by degrees he attained at the length to the highest charges of Government in the Commonwealth. And his Citizens having made no Entremonter further reckoning of him, being a man of fourty years old: after that they came to know him, attained to the and had trufted him with their Army, he faved the City of THEBES that was like to have been highest degree and nad trutted film with their Army, he laved the City of These's that was not to have been of government, undone, and freed all Greece from the fervitude and bondage of the LACEDÆMONIANS: ma

Furthermore, freed Gretce Agefilam being entred into Bo BOTIA with an Army of twenty thousand footmen, and five thou- from fervitude fand horse, preyed and spoiled all the plain Countrey, and presented the THEBANS in open field that which they would not accept, finding themselves the weaker: howbeit they defended themselves defend themselves fo well, through the aid of the ATHENIANS, and of the wife conduction of Epaminondas and Pe- felves against lopidas, that Agefilam returned home with his Army. But after he was gone, the THEBANS went Agefilans, and with their Troops before the City of THESPIES, where they surprised and put to the sword two are revenged hundred men of the Garison, and afterwards gave diversassaults one upon another unto the Wall; on him. and feeing their labour loft, they returned with their Army back again to THEBES. Howbeit Phæ- Phæbidus and bidas the LACEDEMONIAN, he that had taken the Castle of CADMEA by treason (whereupon five hundred role all this War that followed) and was then Governour of Thespies, made a fally out of the of his men Town, and rashly went to give a charge upon the THEBANS in their retreat, where he lost five slain. hundred of his men, and himself was slain in the field. Not long after, the LACEDEMONIANS with the felf fame power returned again to make War with the THEBANS, who having won certain streights and places of advantage, so blocked up the way, as they could not over-run the Countrey, and spoil it as they had done before. Nevertheles, Ageplam had so harried and troubled them, that by little and little they came to a main battle, which held very long and cruel. Now though Agefilam at the first had the better, yet the THEBANS charged him so hotly, that at the length he himself was hurt, and constrained to retire, being well payed for teaching the Thebans military discipline. And this was the first time that the THEBANS knew themselves to be as strong and The . nebans lufty as the LACEDEMONIANS: whereupon they triumphed in fign of victory, and from that time having repulfforwards they waxed more couragious to make head against the enemy, and to present them battle. do trium; h. But the onely thing that did most encourage them, was the presence of Epaminondas, who coun- Epaminonias felled, commanded, and executed very wifely, valiantly, and most fortunately. A certain time af- a good Captain ter that, they went with a great number of good cholen men before ORCHOMENE, where they prevailed not, because there was a strong Garison of the LACEDAMONIANS, that sallied out upon them to give them battle, which was very sharp between them. And yet, albeit the LACEDA-MONIANS were many against one, the THEBANS gave them the overthrow, which never happened to them before: but what Nation foever they had been, they thought they had done a great feat, if with a greater number by many, they had overcome a small number of the LACEDEMO- A second vi-NIANS. The next year following, Artaxerxes King of Persia, meaning to make War in E-GYPT, and therefore to retain divers strangers determined to appeale the Wars against the GREEKS, in hope that they being at Peace, would more eafily be contented that fouldiers should be levied in their Countrey: and thereupon sent his Ambassadors to all the Towns of GREECE, to perswade and intreat them to be at peace together. The GREEKS were very willing to hearken unto it, being wearied of all fides with fo long a War, All ortest; and were eafily drawn to treat of peace: whereby it was especially agreed and concluded, that save the Theall the Cities of GREECE should be free and use their own laws; and Commissioners were bans, make fent all about to withdraw the Garifons in every place where any was kept. Unto this the peace withthe THEBANS onely refused to agree, that every Town should by it self severally capitulate this treaty, requesting that the Towns in the Countrey of BOEOTIA should be comprehended under the City of THERES. Thereunto the ATHENIANS mightily opposed themselves, and there was one of their Orators called Calliffratus, that touching this matter made a notable Oration before the Affembly of the States of GREECE. And Epaminondas on the other fide also, made a wonderfull and vehement Oration in defence of the right of the THEBANS: infomuch as this controverfie was left undecided, and the Treaty of Peace was univerfally agreed and concluded amongst all the other GREEKS, the THEBANS onely excepted, who were not comprifed within the Treaty. So through the motion of Epaminondas, they were bold to withfrand the decrees of the rest of Greece. For the ATHENIANS and LACEDAMONIANS that many years before had contended for the principality of GREECE, made then division together: fo that the one should command by sea, and the other by land. Thus they could not like in no wife, that the THEBANS should aspire to be chief, and therefore they thought to diffmember the other Towns of BOBOTIA from the City of Thebes. And the rather for that the Thebans being strong and thate the Go-lufty of body, and encouraged for that of late they had oftentimes beaten the LACEDEMONIANS, would firive with them for the superiority of GREECE by land, but especially they had a wonderfull confidence in the wildom and prowels of their Captains, but specially of Epaminondas. Matters resting thus doubtfull, the Citizens of PLATZES, a Town of BOEOTIA, desirous to be at league with the ATHENIANS, they fent to requelt fome fouldiers of them, promifing to put the Town into their hands. The Governors of the Countrey of BOEOTIA having intelligence of it, defirous to prevent the Garifon of the ATHENIANS, brought a Troop of fouldiers against them, and they all came before PLATÆES, before the Townsmen had any knowledge of their coming: infomuch that part of them were surprised in the fields by the horsemen, and the other fied into the Town. But having no body to aid them, they were compelled to receive and accept fuch composition as it pleafed the THEBANS to grant them: which was, to leave their Town, and to go fafely with bag and baggage, never to return again into the Countrey of BOEOTIA. After this, the The-BANS razed the City of PLATÆES to the ground, and had the fack of the Town of THESPIES, enemy unto them. All the GREEKS follicited again by the Ambassadors of Persia, thought it good to make a general Peace, and to affembled the Commissioners of all the Towns at Sparts. Epaminondas that was yet scarce known, because he loved not to shew himself, and in all his exploits of war he had ever preferred the advancement of his great friend and companion in Arms Pelopidu, before himself: yet famous among the GREEKS for his great knowledge and experience, was fent thither by the THEBANS. Epaminondas finding that the other commissioners did lean to Agefilam, began to speak boldly and plainly, and made an oration, not onely in the THEBANS behalf, but for all Greece also: making them plainly see, that Wardid still encrease the greatness of the City of SPARTA onely, and keep all the reft of the Towns of GREECE under. Therefore he gave counfell to all to establish a firm Peace indifferently betwirt them, that thereby it might have the longer continuance, when all comprized within the contract should be equals. Agefilam perceiving all the GREEKS assistant at this assembly, to give very attentive ear unto him, and to be tickled, hearing him speak so freely of Peace: he asked ssim aloud if he thought it just and reasonable, that all BO EOT IA should be set at liberty. Epaninondus on the other side, did presently and boldly ask him again, if he thought not also that it was just and reasonable, that all LACONIA should be set at liberty. Thereupon Agefilams in anger frood up on his feet, and commanded him to answer plainly, if they (hould not reftore all the Province of BO BOTIA to her liberty. Epaminon das returned the felf fame speech again unto him : if they should not also put that of LACO NIA in her liberty. This did so anger Ageslam, besides that it did him good to have this colour for an old gradge hebare unto the THEBANS, that forthwith he put the names of the THEBANS out of the lift of those that should be comprized within the Peace, and immediately proclaimed open War against them. Thebam out of But this being done had evil success afterwards, and by reason of the sudden and rash enterprise of the LACEDEMONIANS, it turned to their utter overthrow. For the THEBANS, there was no remedy but they must bear the whole brunt alone: for there was not a Town that durit fend them any aid, because they were all agreed and sworn to this Peace, insomuch as every one thought them utterly cast away and undone. Many pittied their estate, and they that loved them not, rejoyced : they made fo full account, that the LACEDEMONIANS should find nothing that could fland

So the LACEDEMONIANS made King Chombretus march with his Army towards Theres: and being come near to Cheronea with ten thousand footmen and a thousand horse, he pitched his Camp there to ftay for the reft of his Allies. The THEBANS having intelligence of the approach of the Enemy, chose Epaminondas to be Captain Generall, giving him charge of this War, withits other Councellors, whom they call Bastarches, as who would say, Governors of BOLOTIA, to be Captain hath

Ca promifing victory, others threatning overthrow. He commanded them to fet those on the right Oracles of two hand of the chair for Orations, that promifed victory: and those that threatned overthrow, on the left hand. They being thus disposed of, he got up to the chair for Orations, and faid to the Theber, and THEBANS: If you will be obedient to your Captains, and couragious of heart to encounter your how they were Enemies, these here (thewing the good Oracles on the right hand) are yours: but if for faint hearts you refuse danger, those there (thewing the bad on the left hand) shall be for you. Thereupon enrolling all the THEBANS names that were of age to bear Arms, and of some parts of BOEOTIA those that he thought fittelt for Wars . word was brought him that a very honest and valiant man of his person died in his bed. O Hercules, said he, what had this man leasure to die in all these troubles His presence rejoyced, and made all his Army lively: also all the time he was Captain of the Tra-BANS, they never faw any of these terrors happen in his Camp without manifest cause, which they call fudden fears. He was wont to fay, that there was no death more honest then to die in the Wars: and that the body of a fouldier should not onely be kept in exercise like the Champions that fight for maftery, but rather more hardened to endure any labour or pains meet for a good fouldier And therefore he could not abide very fat men, but cashiered a whole band of them for that cause onely: faying, that fearce three or four targets could cover fo great a belly, as did keep him that he could not feehis own privities. So he drew his Army out of THEBES, having in all but fix thousand fighting men. Even as they were marching away out of THEBES, divers of the Souldiers thought they had had many unlucky figns. For as they were going out of the Gates, Epaminondas met on his way a Herald, that following an ancient ceremony and custom of theirs, brought an old blind man as if he had been run away, and the Herald crying out aloud, Bring him not out of THEBES, nor put him to death, but carry him back again, and fave his life. The old men took this meeting and cry for an evil fign; but the young men kept filence, and spake never a word, for fear it should be thought that their hearts failing them, they would feek to diffwade Epaminondas from going the journey he had undertaken. And he himself, unto some that made bold to tell him, that it were well done before he went any further, to confider first what success the flying of the birds did promise unto him. answered this Verse of Homer :

Such a prefent and frank refolution flopped the mouths of all those that were not very constant. But there happened yet another fign worse then the first. For there went a Secretary before him carrying a Javeling, unto the which was tyed a feroll, to make the fouldiers know that they should do what the General commanded them. The wind rose and blew off this scroll and carried it away, folding it upon the square pillar that flood upon a Tomb of certain LACEDEMONIANS, and PELO-PONNESIANS that had been flain in that place when Ageplans brought his Army thither. Alfo there came again certain old men unto him to speak with him, perswading and protesting that he ought not to go any further with his Army, fince the gods were so manifestly against it. All this notwithstanding he never ceased to march with his Camp, thinking that the conicience and resolution to fight in a good cause, ought to be much stronger and of more force to put him in good hope, then these evil signs that appeared, to make him mistrust the worst. And as in marching to meet with the LACEDEMONIANS they heard it thunder : they that were near unto him, asked him, what that thunder meant? That, faith he, betokeneth that the Enemies brains are troubled and aftonied; feeing they having hard by them to commodious places, to Camp in, they now lie Encamped where they are. Indeed they halted, flaying for divers of their Allies that came not : all or them having at better leifure confidered of the discourse Epaminondas made in SPARTA in open affembly of all the Commissioners of every Town, against the ambition of the LACEDEMONIANS. Epaminondas therefore applying to good purpose at that time all the goodly discourse he had learned by the ftudy of Philosophy, for the present time the common people blamed him much : but after the fortunate success of his intention, every man then judged him to be a man ripely understanding the duty Epaminondus of a wife and valiant Chieftain of War. For making his Army march with speed, he wan the winneth credit ftraightshard by the City of CORONEA, and Camped there. Cleombrotus on the other fide, un- in the end. derstanding that the THEBANS had gained that passage, despairing he could not pass that way, made his Army go a great compass about the Countrey of PHOCIDE: and marching along the sea fide in a Cleombrotus very troublous and dangerous way, at the laft he pierced into the Country of B DEOT IA without any codemoniums, danger. And as he went also he took in little Towns, and certain Gallies that lay along that coast, and retireth cowin the end arrived at LEUCTRES: and there fat down to refresh his men a little, over-wearied with ardly. travel in their journey. The BOEOTIANS marched presently that way to meet with them, and so paffing over some little mountains, they discovered them in the plain of LEUCTRES, which did amaze them, feeing fo great an Army.

The Bastarches thereupon came together to confult whether they should go forward, and to fight Council and one against many: or else retire, and find out some better place of advantage. In this Councill consultation is their opinions fell out to be equal : for three of them thought it good to retire : the other three to be used in with Epaminondas, faid, they must tarry and fight. So the conclusion of this Counsel being War. doubtfull, and the Baotarches disagreeing, Pelopidas Captain of the holy band came to them, who was of the second opinion: so that they all agreed together to put it to the hazard of battle. But Epaminonidas seeing their souldiers afraid through the superstition of these signs, devising by some like remedy to put this mistrust out of their heads : to bring this to pass, some being newly come from THEBES, he willed them to fay and give it out every where, that no man could tell at THEBBS what was become of the Arms that hung up in Hercules Temple: but that the voice was The policy of all the Town over, that the ancient demy-gods their ancestors had come and taken them away, Epunicondas for the aid of their defendants at this prefent time. He suborned another also, that gave it out to put away he was newly come from Trophonius trunck or hole, and that the god which giveth the Oracles in fear, the fame, commanded him to tell the BOEOTIANS that after they had overcome their Enemies in the plain of LEUCTRES, they thould celebrate yearly plays in the honour of Jupiter. And thereof it came that the BOBOTIANS long time after that did yearly celebrate a feaft, which is made in LEBADIA. Now to end the painting of this artificial device, Leandrias a Spar-TAN, being a banished man out of his Countrey, and fighting at that time for the BOEOTIANS, being being brought before the fouldiers, whom they encouraged to fight like men the day of the battle : he did fwear unto them that the LACEDAMONIAN'S had an ancient Oracle, that faid they should lose their principality, when they should be overcome by the THEBANS, in a pitched field, in the plain of LEUCTRES. It is true indeed that the LACEDEMONIANS had had many Oracles and forewarnings to bid them beware of the anger of LEUCTRES: but the common people understood not what this warning meant, but were deceived by the equivocation of the word: for that there were three LEUCTRES: to wit, in LACONIA, ARCADIA, and BOEDTIA. Howbeit, the vision of Pelopidas, whereof is made large mention in his life, and the facrifice he made of the young Filly that came into his Camp, confirmed all the former inventions, and made them bold that were most discouraged. Adding withall, that Epaminondas having affembled all his Army, began to encourage them with thefe ftrong and lively realors to shew their valour: infomuch, that being freed from this superstitious sear, they longed for How Epaninonching more then to come to blows. Epaninondas ever concluded all his Orations in this norther manner: O worthy men, embrace facred death, advancing your felves to the most honourable ded his Orati- and famous fight for your Countrey, for the Tombs of your Ancestors, and for the holy things. Even at the fame time came to the THEBANS an aid of five hundred horle, and fifteen hundred sootmen Thessalians, conducted by Jason, who practifed with both sides to make Peace for certain days, telling them he was not wife that feared not the events. Some judge with nive munded horse and it was not at that time that Jason travelled between them both, but rather it was after the jourfifteen hundred ney of LEUCTRES. Howbeit, 1 have followed that which Disdortes the SICILIAN Wilteth, as a thing most likely. Now as Cleombrotus retired with his Army out of BOROTIA, A supply tent to Citombroise he met with a great supply of naturall LACEDEMONIANS, and some of their Allies, brought. to him by Archidamus, Agenlam fon. The LACEDEMONIANS feeing the THEBANS fo resolute, and searing their desperate boldness: sent these two Troops the easilier to daunt the courage of their Enemies. These two being joyned together they were assamed to be assault of the BOROTIANS, and whether it was that the truce taken was near expired, or that they forced not of it, they returned on the sudden again into the plain of LEUCTRES suly bent to fight. The BOEDTIANS also for their part shrunk not an inch back , and so on both fides they fet their men in order of battle. For Epaminondas , he fet his battle affetteth his batter a new fashion, never before shewed by any other Captain. For having chosen out of his Army the best men and valiantest souldiers he had, he placed them together in one of the points of his battle, where he should be himself and fight in person, seconded with Pelbridas, with his three hundred chosen men, called the holy band; and in the other corner he placed his weaker men, commanding them exprelly not to abide the charge of the Enemis that should come to assail them in front, but fair and softly to retire when they saw them come near them. So the matter fell out as he wished: and he hoped to determine the battle by the vertue and prowefs of that point where he had placed all the flower and choice of Now the fign to fight being given, the LACEDEMONIANS marched of even hand with the two horns of their battle, ordered in form of a Cressant. On the contrary part, one of the Wings of the Battle of the BOEOTIANS began to give back, and the other with great fury ran to charge the Enemy in the flanck : ftraight they were both come to the fword together. And at the first, because either side sought very desperately, the victory was doubtfull for a certain time: but at the length Epaminondar Troops brake in amongst the LACEDEMONIANS, and killed the most part of them that were about King (Lister King Cleambre brotus. So long as the King was alive, he kept back the THEBANS from victory, because he was accompanied with all the most valiant men of his Army, valiantly fighting about him. But after he fell down dead on the ground, having received an infinite number of wounds, and stricken down many of his Enemies: then they thronged together on all sides, and there was a cruell fight about his body, where there were heaps of mens bodies flain one upon another. And although Epaminondas did fharply follow this point, yet the LACEDAMO-Expunerates NIANS made such relistance as the last, that they did a little repulse the BOSOTIANS and Lucedamonians cleared the body of their King out of the press and multitude: but that held not long. For Epaminondas through his perfuafions did so lift up the hearts and courage of his men, that they gave a second and so sierce a charge upon them, that they wholly overthrew the La-CEDEMONIANS, and made them fly for life. Then Epaminondas fiercely pursuing the flying Enemies , made great flaughter , and wan one of the most glorioulest victories that ever Captain did : having in a pitched field overcome the most noble and warlike Nation of all GREECE, with a far smaller number of men then his Enemies had. And also he took more glory of that above all his other exploits, and specially because it happened unto him in his father Polymnic life time. And oftentimes he had these words up in his mouth : that of all the honest and happy fortunes that ever chanced unto him; nothing joyed his heart more, then that he vanquished the Lacedamonians at the Battle of Leuctres, his father than the vanquished the Lacedamonians. ther and mother that begat him being both alive. And to fay troely, he that day preferred the life of his father and mother, and of his whole Countrey befides: for the LACEDEMONI-ANS were fully refolved utterly to deftroy the THEBANS. Now he using at all other times to shew himself amongst them, fine and near, with a pleasant countenance: the next day after the battle at LEUCTRES he came out openly very fad, heavy and pensive. Whereupon his friends asked him prefently if he had heard any evil news, or some missortune had happened to him. None, faid he, but I perceived by my felf yesterday, that overjoyed with the victory that I obtained. I lift up my felf more then became me : and therefore to day I correct this joy, which yesterday was too exceeding in me. He knowing that it was the manner of the SPARTANS to hide and cover (as well as they could possible) all such misfortunes: desirous openly to express and shew the greatness of the loss they had fulfained; he would not suffer them to carry away their dead bodies by great altogether, but every City one after another: and so by this means it appeared that there were above a thouland LACEDEMO-NIANS slain. Some make the number of the dead to be greater, and fay they were four thousand natural LACEDEMONIANS, but that must be understood of them and their Allies: and of the BOEOTIANS, there were not above three hundred or thereabouts found dead. This battle of LEUCTRES was stricken at the beginning of the second year of the hundred and second

Olympiade. The LACEDEMONIANS having at that battle lost the greatest part of their honour and greatness, which men had seen before in their estate, lost not their courage for all this : but greatness, which men had feen before in their citate, loft not their courage for all this; but The Lacids-motion to keep their youth fill in heart, and to take away all fear which had poffelfed them that had escaped from this overthrow, Agessaw entred Arcadia with an Army, and was con-tokep their took the second of the s tented to take a small Town of the MANTINEANS, and to prey and spoil the Countrey; youthin good which done, he returned home again. Some think that this was the cause that brought Epa-courage. minordas into LACONIA. Othersome report it otherwise, and say that Agesilans would not jusfer the MANTINEANS to re-edifie their City. And there be that are of another opinion, which is: that Lycomedes Captain of the ARCADIANS having made a rode hard to ORCHOMENE, he flew upon an encounter Polytropus Captain of the LACEDEMONIANS, and had two hundred SPARTANS with him, his purpose being to win ORCHOMENE: and thereupon they finding themselves too weak to stand against the LACEDEMONIANS, they sought the alliance and aid of the THEBANS. Howfoever it was, the LACEDEMONIANS and ARCADIANS being enemies, by reason of their chief City of MANTINEA: that was the cause the THEBANS joyned with the ARCADIANS, and being followed with their Allies, led by Epaminondas, they entred into LACONIA with an Army of forty thousand men of War, and with thirty thousand others that followed the Camp. The ATHENIANS fent Iphicrates Captain with twelve thousand men to aid the SPARTANS: but before his coming Epaminondas entred into LACONIA in divers places, and facked all the whole Countrey, which had not been laid wast by an Enemy in fix hundred years space before, when the DORIANS came to inhabit there. The SPARTANS feeing their Countrey wasted and destroyed before their eyes, were desirous to go out with all the force they could make: but Agefilaus would not fuffer them, telling them how dangerous it was to leave the City, to fet upon fuch a mighty enemy. So they were quiet, and Epaminondas in the mean space descended the mountain Taugete with his Army, towards the River of Eurotas, the which at that time was rifen very high by reason of the Winter. He sought what he could to draw Agessam to sight, who beholding Epaminondas a great while, marching in battle ray alongst the River side at the head of his Troops: he wondred at his boldness and valour, but would by no means come out of his fort. Infomuch as after his Army had preyed and forraged all LACONIA, Epaminondas led them back again laden with booty. And though Apellaus had won himself great honour for his wisdom, in looking to the safety of his City: yet Epaminondas had made his Countrey so poor with the former losses sustained, especially at the overthrow sparts inipoat LEUCTRES: that SPARTA could never afterwards recover that lofs again, nor grow into verified and that reputation and power it had before. Furthermore, notwithstanding all the aid of the A-decaied. THENIANS, and the experience of Iphicrates, Epaminondas returned with his whole Army as he came. And the more to keep the LACEDEMONIANS still under their feet, and to heap new troubles upon them: he gave counfell to the ARCADIANS and other their Allies, to re-edifie and replenish the City of MESSINA with new Inhabitants again, which the LACEDENO- Epaminondas NIANS had long before that destroyed. All the whole Council giving their consents unto it, he made causeth Melfidiligent inquiry forthwith to feek out all those that till that time had been ancient inhabitants in MES. na to be repair-SINA; and in the space of fourscore and five days having re-edified the ruined houses, he set ed and peopled on foot again one of the nobleft and most ancient Cities of GREECE, and left there a strong Garrison: for the which he was as much esteemed and rather more then for any other service he had

The LACEDEMONIANS being lightened of a marvellous great fear, made an agreement with the ATHENIANS, and left them the chief command by sea, referving to themselves that by land. Afterwards through the aid of the ATHENIANS, and the supply that was sent unto them out of SICILIA, they wan their Towns again by little and little. The ARCADIANS to stop their course, assumed the City of Palle of in Laconia, put all the Garrison there to the sword, razed the Town, and preyed on all the Countrey thereabout: and doubting that the Lacedemonia ANS would be revenged, they prayed aid of the THEBANS, who fent Epaminondas thither and the other Beotarches, with fix thousand footmen, and five hundred horse. The ATHENIANS having intelligence thereof, fent their Army before under the leading of Chabrias, who marched directly to Corinth, and there had supply of souldiers, of the MEGARIANS, PALLENIANS, the Army of the LACEDEMONIANS and of their Allies, being arrived at the very place of Co. RINTH, they made all together the number of twenty thousand fighting men. So they determine ed to repair and fortific all the paffages and entrances into the Countrey of Peloponnesus, to thop the paffage of the BOROTIANS. ness, sion sea was followed with such speed, both by means of the great multitude of people, as also through the good wills of those that laboured it hard : that they had finished and done all before the Bosotigood wins or those managements at his coming having diligently viewed and confidered this ANS could arrive there. Epaminondas at his coming having diligently viewed and confidered this fortification, perceived that the caffeft way to be forced, was that which the LACEDEMONIANS themselves kept. So he sent to give them defiance, though they were thrice as many men in number as his own. For all this that they had the defance, they durft not come out, but kept them close under this fortification, which receiving certain affaults, they were repulfed. Now all of them doing their best endeavour, being occupied, some affailing, other defending, Epaminondas those out the best men in all his Army, and luftily charging the guard of the LACEDEMONIAN'S enforced them entereth into to give him way, and in despite of them he entred into Prioponnesus, which was a wonderfull Pelepanatably and memorable exploit of all others. From thence he marched towards the Cities of EpiDaura and memorate exploit of an others. Atom there is howbeit he could take none of the Towns, before of Arms, and TROBZEN, and foforraged all the Country: howbeit he could take none of the Towns, because they were defended with strong Garrisons. Nevertheless he put Sicyone, Phennes, and fome other Towns in fuch fear, that they yielded themselves unto him. That being done, he went to CORINTH, and there overcame the CORINTHIANS in a fet battle, and bear them home fighting even to the walls of their City. There were fome of his men fo rash, and prefuning of their valour, that they entred hand over head with those that fled, even within the Gates of their City: which put the CORINTHIANS in fuch a terrible fear, that they ran with all fpeed poffible to get their houses over their heads. Chabrias beat them out again, and killed some of them. Whereupon he caused a token of triumph to be set up, as if it had been an overthrow. Epaminondas laughing him to fcorn for it; faid he should not call it a Trophee, or token of triumph, but rather Hecateste, as one would say, a statue of Proferpina: because in time past they commonly set this image of Proferpina at the first Gallows they found before the Gate of any City. The BORDTIANS therefore came on with their battle as near unto Corinth as they could, and Chabrias withhis Troops Camped without in a very ftrong place of advantage for him: fo there were many skirmiliss Chibita 2 32- between them, in the which Chabrias shewed such valour, that he wan great same and reputation eliant Captin. ven of Epaminondas himfelf. Who being asked on a time whom he thought to be the greateft Captain, himfelf, Chabrias, or Iphierates: Itishard to judge, faid he, whileft we are all alive. Another brought him word that the ATHENIANS had fent an Army again into PELO PONNESUS, furnified with new Armors. Well, answered be, doth Antigenidas weep when he knoweth that Tellin hah new Flutes? This Tellin was a very bad player of the Flute, and Antigenidas excellent good and skilfull. Touching the supply of this Army, they were tenthouland SPANIARDS and GAULS, whom Dionyfins the Tyrant fent out of SICILIA to aid the LACED. EMONIANS, having paid them for five moneths. They had ferved reafonably well in this War, and so in the end of Summer returned Now it fortuned in these last encounters, that Epaminondas having forced the LACEDENONI-

But now that we have begun to speak of this matter, we must see how he behaved himself among his Citizens, and the wildom he uled in defence of his integrity. Among all those that could not endure the glory of his vertues, was Menectides the Orator, an eloquent man, but withall most wicked and malicious. He finding that Epaminondas wan such honour by Wars, never lest perfunding the THEBANS to embrace Peace, and to prefer it before War: because they should not live always under the obedience and command of one man. Epaminondas told him one day in open Council: Thou wilt deceive the THBBANS, going about to counfel them to leave Wars: and highly commending eafe, thou goest about to put iron bolts upon their feet. For War begetteth peace, the which cannot hold long but among those that know how to feek and keep it with the edge of the fword. Then speaking to the Citizens: If ye will have the principality and command of all Graces, before all others: you must shrowd your selves in your Tents and Pavilions in the open field, and not follow Games and Wreftlings here at home. Also he knew well e-Ease and idle nough that the BOROTIANS spoiled and undid themselves by ease and idleness: which was the caule that he constantly bare this mind to keep them constantly in Wars. Whereupon when time came that they fell to choosing of Captains, and that they went about to chuse him Bastarche: he faid to the Citizens: My mafters, I pray you confider of it, now you are at leifure, before You choose me: for I tell you plainly, if I be choten your Captain, you must to the Wars. He called the Countrey of BOSOTIA, which is all plain Champion the scaffold of War: saying it was unpossible to keep it, unless the inhabitants had their Targets on their arms, and their swords in their hands. This was not because he did not love peace, and solitariness to study Philosophy, and that he was not more fearfull of them he had in his charge then for himself, using always to watch and forhear his meat, when the THEBANS were at their banquets and feafts going themselves to all pleasure: but he knew them well enough, and he was never more carefull of any thing, then to keep his Army from idleness. For on a time the ARCADIANS intreating that his troops might enter into one of their Towns, to lie dry there in covert all the Winter, he would by no means yield to it. For now (faid he to his fouldiers) that they see you exercise your selves in Arms, they wonder at you as brave Epanimendas and valiant fouldiers : but if they should see you at the fire fide parching of Beans, they would esteem carefull o keep and valiant fouldiers: but if they mount for you at the mix pay parting of the formerine he has army no better of you then of themselves. No more could he endure coverofines: for the formerine he identify the state of the former of themselves. gave his men leave to go a booting, his meaning was, that whatloever they got should be belt wed in furnishing of Arms. For if any man went about to fill his purse with money, he thought him unworthy to be a fouldier. As on a time when he perceived that his Target-bearer had received a great fum of money for the ranfom of a prisoner, he faid unto him: Give me my Target, and go thou thy ways, and buy thee a Tavern to lead the rest of thy life there: for I perceive thou wilt no more like anhonest man put thy self in danger in the Wars, as before thou hast done, because thouart now rich and wealthy. Now Epaminondas being such a one as you have heard, Meneclides notwithstanding would never cease controuling of him: and one day he went so far as to reproach him that he had no children, that he was not married, and that he magnified himself more then ever King Agamemnon had done. Epaminondas answered him, thou hast nothing to do to counsell me to marry: | for in that respect there is never a man here in all this Council whom I would less use then thou. And this he spake, because the other was suspected to be an adulterer. And whereas thou thinkest that I do envy the glory and fame of Agamemnon, thou art fouly deceived : yet I tell thee he was not a little troubled to win a Town in ten years : where I to the contrary putting the LACEDEMONIANS to flight in one day, have delivered our City and all GREECE from them. But thanks be to you, my Lord THEBANS (speaking to all the whole assembly) through you I did it, and overthrew and ruined the power and government of our enemies. Nevertheless, Pelopidas and he were very evil recompensed for this good service of theirs: for at their return from LACONIA, they with some other of the Bactarches were accused, for that after the time of their charge and government was expired, they had kept it four moneths beyond the time the law had appointed them. With much ado Pelopidas was absolved: but Epaminondas willed his companions to lay all the fault upon him, as being forced unto it by his authority : and that for his part his words could be no better then his deeds, So upon this he being called before the Judges, and after he had justified that he had passed the time limited of his authority: inflead of excufing himfelf, he went and told bravely his worthy exploits he had done in this journey at that time; adding withall, that he was willing and ready to die, fo they caused his condemnation to be written upon the pillar of his Tomb, to the end the GREEKS should understand that they had put Epaminondas to death, because he had compelled the THEBANS, against their wills to burn the Country of LACONIA, the which in five hundred years before had never once been spoiled; that he had restored the City of Massina with inhabitants again; two hundred and thirty years after the LACEDAMONIANS had laid it waft : that he had brought all the people and Towns of ARCADIA to be as one body in league together, and had fet all the GREEKS at liberty: and all these things, said he, we did in our journey. The Judges understanding this worthy and true defence, they all arose from their seats and laughed a good, and would never take their balls to ballot against him.

But as for his fecond acculation, that he had shewed favour unto the LACEDEMONIANS for Engineeries his own particular honour, he would make no answer before the people of Thebes to this falls reducen to animpuration, but he role out of the Theatre, and passing through the assembly walked into the park swer to a sale of exercises. The people being in uproar against him, made no choice of him again as they were reputation. wont to do, although there was no great need: but created other Bactarches to go into Tuiss-SALY. And the more (as they thought) to despite Epaminondas, they commanded him to go that voyage as a private fouldier: the which he refused not, but went very willingly, and upon this occa- Pelevides infion. Pelopidas being fent the second time into Thessalr, to make accord between the people prisoned. and Alexander the Tyrant of PHERES, was by this Tyrant (not suspecting the dignity of an Ambaffador, nor of his Countrey) made prisoner with Ismenias. Whereupon the Thebans being justly offended, sent thither an Army of eight thousand footmen, and five hundred horse, howbeir under the leading of unskilfull Captains: who wanting judgement to ute the time, thought it good to return home again without doing anything. But as they went their way, Alexander being stronger in horsemen then they, tollowed them, and gave charge upon the Rear, killed some, and grievoully wounded others. So they knowing neither how to go forward nor backward, were in great distress, and the rather because their victuals fell shorter every day then other. But being now almost out of all hope to retire home with safety, Epaminoudas being then amongst the foot, was earnestly intreated by the fouldiers and Captains to help to redress this disorder. Thereupon he chole certain footmen light armed, and all the horsemen, and so falling himself amongst them in the rereward of the Army, he so lustily repulsed the enemies, that the rests of the Army afterwards marched in great fafety: and did fo well, fighting at times, making head as occafion served, and keeping his Troops in so good order, that he brought them all away sale. This act crowned him with a new glory, confounded his enemies, and wan him great honour every where, besides the love and good will of his Citizens: who see great fines upon their Captains, because they had behaved themselves so evil in this journey. Again, the people seeing that by so many worthy deeds Epaminondas razed out all the flanders and accufations which his evil willers had vomited out against him: they chose him they cho chofen again Army. At whole coming all the Countrey straight rejoyced for the reputation of so great and famous a Captain, and there wanted little even to break this Tyrants neck altogether, his friends and Captains flood in fuch fear, and his subjects in good mind to rebell, and very joyfull for the hope they had shortly to see the Tyrant at one blow well recompensed for all his cursed and wicked deeds he had done long before. Neverthele's Epaminondas fetting afide the confideration of his honour and glory, in respect of the deliverance and fafety of his friend Pelopidas, and being afraid that Alexander, when he should fee his estate in danger to be overthrown, would take revenge in his madness upon Pelopidas: he purposely drew his War in length, wheeling about in every place, mauners upon recopiant: he purposery new his vvar in rengin, whereing about in every place, refraining to fet on him in earneft, diffembling to make his preparations, and frill delaying, because he would prepare and soften the heart of this Tyrant by this device, not to leave him too much to his bold unbridled will, neither to stir up (to the danger of Pelopidas) the sharp and inhumane anger of this blood-fucker. Who being a Monster, compounded of cruelty and cowardice, was to afraid onely of the name and reputation of Epaminondas, and hanging the Wing, as they fay: that he presently sent men unto him to excuse and justific him. But E paminondas would not that the THEBANS through his flackness should make peace and alliance with so wicked a man, but onely he was contented to take a truce with him for thirty days, taking Pelopidas and Immiar out of hishands. So with them he returned back again to THERES, and always coninsued faithfull friendship with Pelopidas, refusing ever to have any part of his goods, but did fill perfevere in his wonted fimplicity and discipline. Now speaking of this friendship, they report that Epaminondas having committed a man of base condition for some light fault to prison, Pri lopidas prayed him to fet the poor man at liberty, but he denied him : and yet afterward being intreated by a woman he kept, he did it at her request, faying that harlors were to be granted such request, not Captains.

This boldness he shewed in all places, and to all men, yet mingled with a great sweetness, and with a good lively grace: whereof we will bring many examples, befides that he spake at Sparta a-Bainst the LACEDAMONIANS and Agestians, in the prefence of all the Commissioners of GREECE. The ARGIANS having made league with the THEBANS, the ATHENIANS for their Ambassadors into ARCADIA, to see if they could gain the ARCADIANS to be their friends. So these Ambassadors began roundly and hotly to charge and accuse both the one and the other: informuch as Callifratus speaking for them, reproved the other two Cities ORESTES and OEDI-rus. Epaminondas being present at that assembly of counfell, stood up, and said: My Lords, we confefs that in times paft we had a man that killed his father in our City, and in ARCOS one that killed his mother: but for us, we have driven out of our Countrey, and banished all such wicked murtherers, and the ATHENIANS have received them both. And to the SPARTANS that had laid many great and grievous imputations upon the THEBANS: If they have done nothing elfo, my Lords of SPARTA, answered Epaminondas, yet at the leaft they have made you lorget to speak listle. The ATHENIANS had made league with Alexander the Tyrant of PHERES, morral enemy of the THEBANS, who promifed the THEBANS that he would let them have a pound of fielh for an half peny. Epaminandas hearing of it, Well faid he, and we will find them wood that final cont them nothing to feeth this flesh withall: for we will go fell and cut down all the Trees they have in their Coursey, if they go about to make any alteration other then good. So when he went into THESSALY, and brought back Pelopidas again, the ATHENIANS made no great fir againft him: and the tyrant that had promifed flesh so good cheap, had much ado at that time to keep his skin whole. But afterwards he had his payment, as you may read in the latter end of Pelopidas. But that which did excell in Epaminondas, and did cut the throat of envy it felf, was his moderation and temperance, knowing how to use any state or condition offered him, and never to rage against himself nor others, The moderati- always bearing this mind, that howfoever they took him, and in what place foever they fet him, he was on and tempe- well contented, and all for the good of his Countrey: for proof whereof I will fhew you this carance of Eps- ample. His evil willers on a time thinking to bring him in difgrace, as they fay, for spite they made him superintendant and over-seer of all the customs, whilst others his inferiors, unworthy to becompared to him, were placed in the most honourable offices. This notwithstanding he despited not this office, but did discharge it very faithfully: for, said he, office or authority sheweth not onely what the man is, but also the man what the office is.

But now further: (horsly after Epaminondas return out of THESSALY, the ARCADIANS were overcome by Archidamus and the LACEDEMONIANS, and they loft not aman: and therefore this days journey was called for them, the tearless battle. Epaminondas forefeeing that the Ascapians should yet have a florm, gave them counfell to fortifie themselves: whose counsell they following, they built the Town which afterwards was called MEGALIPOLIS, fituated in a very convenient place. Whilft they made War with the ELTAN's their neighbours, Epaminondas heart never fainted, but his mind was always given to high enterprifes for the good of his Countrey; where being respected and honoured above all others, he made an Oration unto his Citizens periwading them to make themselves ftrong by sea, and to attend the conquest of the principality, making themselves Lords of it. This Oration of his had been long thought of before, being full of lively research fors, which did flew and prove unto them that the enterprile was both honourable and profitable, as well by other Arguments he alledged, as also for that he told them it was an easie thing for them that were now the stronger by Land, to make themselves also the strongest by Sea : and the rather for that the ATHENIANS in the War against Xerxes, notwithstanding that they had armed and fet forth two hundred Galleys well appointed with men; they nevertheless willingly submitted themselves unto the LACEDEMONIANS. So alledging many other reasons to this purpose he prevailed fo much, that the THEBANS inclined to undertake the Enterprize by Sea. Thereupon the People gave present order they should build a hundred Galleys, and withall an Arsenall with fo many Kooms to lay them under covert in the Dock; and that they should send to them of RHODES, of CHIO, and of BYZANCE, to pray them to further them in this Enterprize. And for this purpose Epaminendas was fent with an Army unto these Cities. So in this course he met with Laches, a Captain of the ATHENIANS, and a good number of Ships in his Fleet. fent of purpole to hinder the intention of the THEBANS. Notwithstanding, Epaninendas made him so afraid, that he drave him back again : and he holding on his Voyage, brought the Cities before named to make league with the THEBANS, who on the other fide were at War with the City of ORCHOMENE, which had done great hurt and mischief in their Estate. So they having won it by affault, they flew every man that was able to bear Armes, and moreover made all the Woputation of this Captain : they immediatly fent unto the ATHENIANS and LACEDEMONIANS. the greatest Enemies of the BOEOTIANS for aid, which both the Cities granted. Whereupon there fell out often many great Skirmishes in divers parts of PSLOPONNESUS. Epaminonaus being

way then Agefilam, he had taken SPARTA without one stroke striken, but for a Post of CANDIA that with speed brought Agefilam word of it : who forthwith sent out a Horseman to give them intelligence that were left at SPARTA, that they should beware they were not surprised upon the suddain: and he himself came speedily after, and arrived there a little before the THEBANS coming thither: who being very near the City by break of day, gave affault to them that were within to defend the Town. Then Ageflam bestirred him throughly, beyond the power of an old man. But his Son Archidamus, and Ifadas the Son of Phabidas, fought valiantly on all parts. Epaminondas feeing the SPARTANS in order of Battell, began then to mistrust that his Enterprise was discovered. This notwithstanding, he left not off to force them all he could, albeit he fought with great disadvantage for the inconvenience of the places he occupied; and continued always couragioully doing and receiving hurt, untill the Army of the LACEDEMONIANS came on, and the night also: whereupon he made them found the Retrait. Now he being advertised that the

MANTINEANS came on also with their Forces , he drew his Troops somewhat further off the Town , and there camped. After that he caused his men to refresh themselves with Victuals and having left certain Horsemen in the Camp, he commanded them to make Fires in the morning and he himself went in the mean space, to surprise those that remained at MANTINEA before any man wift he was gone. Nevertheless he failed of his purpose, albeit he had forethought him of all misfortunes that any man possible could have considered in so weighty a Cause.

on the other fide of the Town there arrived fix thousand ATHENIANS led by their Captain Hegeleem: who having put sufficient force into the Town, he ordered all the rest in Battell without the Town-walls, as though he meant to have fought a Field: and immediatly after them came also the LACEDAMONIANS and MANTINEANS together, who prepared themselves to put all to the hazard of a Battell, and therefore fent for their Allies out of all parts. They were in all five

the ATHENIANS finding the THEBANS in Front, were the weaker: not because they were less valiant and hardy then the other, but because they had not so good Leaders, and had few Archers amongst their Troops. The THEBANS on the other fide they were well appointed, and specially of THES-men and Children Slaves. Sometime after Pelopidas death, certain private men of MANTINEA, fearing to be called to account for their bad behaviours and robberies they had done, if the ARCADIANS and FLIANS fell to agreement : they practifed fo, that they raifed up a new quarrell within the Countrey divided A new quarrel into two Factions, of the which the MANTINEANS were chief of the one fide, and the TEGE- betwirt the ATES on the other part.
